The Supreme Court took both cases on appeal and, in Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997), and Vacco v. Quill, 521 U.S. 793 (1997), unanimously ruled that under neither the equal protection clause nor the due process clause did a constitutional right to assisted suicide exist. The opinions by Chief Justice William Rehnquist relied primarily on history—namely, that such a right had not been recognized at the time the Fourteenth Amendment had been adopted and could not be read into the document now; that the existence of a right to die recognized in Cruzan did not lead to such a right; and that states had the authority under their police power to forbid and criminalize the assistance of suicide.

But the unanimity in result is deceptive. Five justices wrote concurring opinions that in effect were dissents. They argued that while a right to physician-assisted suicide did not yet exist and the states had the power to ban such activity, if states tightened up end-of-life choices for the ill, then they would be willing to reopen the matter. Justice David Souter in his opinion explained how new rights could be developed under the Fourteenth Amendment and laid out the criteria for doing so. Those criteria, he believed, had not at the moment been met.

Also, the justices made it quite clear that this was an issue for the states and that if a state wanted to permit physician-assisted suicide, then it could so. Rehnquist pointed to the fact that Oregon had only recently adopted such a law and that it was within its authority to do so. In effect, the Court was trying to avoid the mistake it had made with abortion, deciding a question on broad constitutional grounds before the states had a chance to work out reforms at the local level.

Oregon had passed its law in 1997 as a result of two separate referendums. The law allowed physicians to prescribe lethal doses of barbiturates to patients who met very clearly delineated criteria. They had to be terminally ill, defined as being within six months of death by the best estimate of the attending physician; they had to be mentally capable; they had to make the request twice, and it had to be approved by two doctors; and so forth. The resulting deaths would not be considered suicide for insurance purposes, and neither the prescribing physician nor the pharmacist filling the prescription could be held criminally or civilly liable. Doctors could prescribe the medication, but could not administer the lethal doses.

Despite cries that Oregon would become the death capital of the world, in the first seven years that the law was in operation, only 208 persons (an average of about 30 persons a year) actually ingested their medication. The median age of those doing so was seventy. A larger number received prescriptions, but died before using them or chose not to take them. All in all, the careful conditions laid down by the law appear to have prevented abuse, and polls show that many people are happy that the law exists, even if they do not know whether they would use it. It provides a security blanket if they become terminally ill and risk losing quality of life. Moral critics decry the act as murder, while libertarians argue it should be extended to all sick and suffering persons, not just to the terminally ill.

Reflecting his moral views, John Ashcroft, attorney general in the first term of President George W. Bush, tried to negate the Oregon law by claiming that he had authority to punish doctors who prescribed the medication under federal law. A federal district court as well as the Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit rejected his claim, and in essence declared that he was an intermeddling busybody without any power over the states in this area. The Supreme Court took the case on appeal.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Rosenfeld, Barry. Assisted Suicide and the Right to Die: The Interface of Social Sciences, Public Policy, and Medical Ethics. Washington, D.C.: American Psychological Association, 2004.
- Urofsky, Melvin I. Lethal Judgments: Assisted Suicide and American Law. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.

PICKERING v. BOARD OF EDUCATION, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)

Pickering, a high school teacher, was dismissed from his position by the board of education for sending a letter critical of the board and of recently proposed tax increases to benefit schools to the editor of the local newspaper. The board held a hearing on the dismissal, as required by Illinois law and determined that the allegations made by Pickering were false and damaging to the board and administration. The Illinois Supreme Court rejected Pickering's claim that his dismissal violated his freedom of speech as guaranteed by the First and Fourteenth Amendments.

The Supreme Court found that most of the statements made by Pickering were true, and that the false statements were not made knowingly or recklessly and did not harm the school system. The Court ruled that threat of dismissal from public employment constitutes a damper on the right of free speech. In cases where the speaker's job is only tangentially and insubstantially related to the subject of the speech, the speaker will be regarded as a member of the general public and his speech subject to the actual malice standard set out in New York Times Co. v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964). Pickering's dismissal violated his rights to free speech.

The decision of the Illinois Supreme Court was reversed and the case remanded. Justice White filed an opinion concurring in the result, but dissenting on the grounds that once Pickering's false statements were found to be neither reckless nor knowing, the question of harm to the school system was irrelevant.

Pickering was a watershed case in freedom of speech jurisprudence, extending to public employees the protections afforded the general public by the New York Times case.

STEPHEN WATKINS

References and Further Reading

- Hudson, David L., Jr. "Balancing Act: Public Employees and Free Speech." First Reports 3 (2002): 1-46.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)

PICKETING

Picketing is a form of organized, nonviolent protest marked by marching or standing near a place of employment, government agency, or another protest target. Individuals or groups can picket by carrying signs or distributing literature. Pickets seek to publicize their grievances against the target and, sometimes, to dissuade others from doing business with the target. As a form of "expressive conduct," picketing involves communication protected under the First Amendment speech, petition, and assembly clauses. Yet, because picketing also involves "conduct," courts have often permitted governments to regulate picketing somewhat more than other forms of communication.

In contrast to many types of communicative activities, picketing often is designed to pressure the target into changing its behavior by discouraging others from crossing the picket line. For some, picketing raises special First Amendment concerns because, like boycotts, picketing is a form of pressure the courts are reluctant to put on the same plane as less confrontational speech activities like writing letters or books, speaking before an assembled group, or even passing out literature. In addition, picketing can be employed in labor disputes, consumer protests, or political conflicts—distinctions that have proven important.

Since much picketing occurs in public places, there is a close relationship between picketing and the traditional public forum. Under the forum doctrine, streets and parks have “immemorially been held in trust” for the public to assemble and communicate. Traditional public forums are presumptively open for communicative activities, including picketing. This means that the government cannot simply prevent public streets from being used for picketing without compelling justification. Indeed, in Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988), the Supreme Court noted that “we have traditionally subjected restrictions on public issue picketing to careful scrutiny.”

In Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963), for example, nearly two hundred students were arrested and convicted of “breach of the peace.” The students had peacefully picketed on the grounds of the South Carolina State House, protesting discrimination against African Americans. Reversing the convictions, the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment “does not permit a State to make criminal the peaceful expression of unpopular views.” Edwards illustrates two principles: open access to a public forum for the expression of (at that time) controversial views; and a government opposed to those views may not target the speakers for punishment.

In some instances, states or municipalities have attempted to ban picketing in certain places. In Carey v. Brown, 447 U.S. 455 (1980), the Court overturned a statute that banned picketing in residential areas, but that exempted “the peaceful picketing of a place of employment involved in a labor dispute.” The Court held that the statute unconstitutionally favored certain communications over others (in this case, labor speech) and thus fell within the general rule that government may not discriminate for or against certain speech based on the content of the communication. Since Carey addressed the unequal treatment of two communications, however, the ruling might have permitted total bans on picketing in residential areas.

In Frisby, the Court foreclosed such a result while considering an ordinance prohibiting all picketing “before or about” any residence. The ordinance did not exempt any type of picketing, so did not violate the “nondiscrimination” principle of Carey. In order to avoid running up against First Amendment concerns, the Frisby Court interpreted the ordinance narrowly. Since public streets are presumptively open for speech activities under the public forum doctrine, the Court held the ordinance must be interpreted to prohibit only “targeted” picketing, defined as picketing directed at a specific residence. Thus limited, the ordinance was constitutional because it was narrowly tailored to achieve an important governmental interest: protecting residential privacy.

The clear import of the Frisby decision is that pickets have a constitutional right to march in the “traditional public forum,” even including residential areas. Government may restrict “targeted” residential picketing, but may not generally restrict picketing in a residential neighborhood or even picketing that cycles throughout a neighborhood but does not target a particular residence.

Regulating the “Time, Place, or Manner” of Picketing

Although picketing in the public forum may not be completely banned, the Court has allowed regulations of public forum picketing based on time, place, and manner (TPM) of the communication. TPM rules permit the government to accommodate “conflicting demands on the same place.”

To be valid, TPM regulations must be content neutral. In addition, such regulations must meet three tests: (1) they must serve important governmental goals; (2) the means chosen must reasonably relate to the ends sought; and (3) the regulations must leave open sufficient other outlets for the communications.

Generally, reasonable efforts to accommodate conflicting demands for use of public spaces are constitutional provided the government does not choose on the basis of the content of the communication. For example, if the Nazi and Christian groups wish to use the bandshell of a public park that is typically open for use by community groups, a municipality could choose between them based on which group asked first (that is, a content neutral reason), but could not choose the Christian group because the official liked Christians or disliked Nazis.

The government may also take limited steps to protect passersby or others in the vicinity from being held “captive” to a picket’s message. Furthermore, the government may prohibit obstruction of the streets, loud noises that seriously interfere with other activities, or disorderly conduct, provided again that it applies such regulations consistently across the board and enforces them neither specifically against pickets (and no one else) nor against certain pickets and not other pickets. In Grayned v. City of Rockford, 408 U.S. 104 (1972), for instance, the Court upheld an ordinance prohibiting making loud noises adjacent to school if the noise threatened to disturb school operations. The regulation was upheld as a neutral TPM regulation and was valid because it applied equally to loud construction and loud demonstrations and was necessary to protect the functioning of the school.

Consider how the Court evaluated a District of Columbia regulation that prohibited the display of any sign within 500 feet of a foreign embassy if the sign tended to cast “public odium” or “public disrepute” upon the foreign government. The ordinance was overturned as content based because only certain messages that triggered that response were banned. The District had argued that the ban functioned like a “place” regulation, but this was rejected. Essentially, if one must read the sign or hear the message in order to know whether a regulation is violated, it is content based and subject to searching judicial review.

In contrast, the Court upheld as a valid place regulation another aspect of the District’s ordinance that prohibited three or more persons from congregating within 500 feet of an embassy. The Court found that the no-congregating rule had been applied only to groups who targeted an embassy that the authorities reasonably believed presented a threat to the peace or physical security of the embassy.

Sometimes the Court’s decisions in this area have been inconsistent. In Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965), a case arising at the height of the civil rights movement, two thousand students gathered near a courthouse jail to protest the prior day’s arrest of 23 black students who had picketed stores that maintained segregated lunch counters. Their leader was convicted of violating a state statute that prohibited any person from picketing or parading near a courthouse “with the intent of interfering with, obstructing, or impeding the administration of justice.” Although the conviction was overturned on other grounds, the Court suggested in dictum that the state had a compelling interest in protecting the administration of justice from the appearance that proceedings had been influenced by the demonstrations.

Cox should not be read as forbidding criticism rendered against judges, or outrage at the judicial process. Indeed, in Bridges, decided a few years earlier, the Supreme Court overturned “contempt” sanctions issued against the head of a union who published his telegram to the secretary of labor threatening to call a strike that would shut down the entire Pacific Coast to shipping if a particular legal ruling against the union were enforced. The Bridges Court determined that before such publications could be punished as an intimidation of courts, the probability that a judge would feel threatened would need to be much greater. As Laurence Tribe has argued, “if Bridges’s threat to cripple the economy of the entire West Coast did not present danger enough, the lesson of [Bridges] must be that almost nothing said outside the courtroom is punishable as contempt.”

The Cox Court distinguished Bridges on the ground that Bridges involved “mere” publication, whereas a crowd of two thousand demonstrators picketing outside a courthouse is more likely to “threaten the judicial process.” The Court’s analysis is problematic, for it is not clear why peaceful picketing would be any more “threatening” to the judicial process than proposing to shut down the economy of the West Coast. Nonetheless, if understood as a limited “place” regulation, the Cox decision might be defensible: picketing “near” a courthouse may increase the risk of intimidation of judges, jurors, or witnesses because of the proximity of the demonstrators to the courthouse and their number. By analogy, the Court has also upheld 100-foot distance limitations upon picketing or distribution of literature near polling stations on election days.

Such limited restrictions upon picketing targeted at specific “places” find support in Frisby, discussed earlier, as well as in Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 313 (1988), upholding the District of Columbia ordinance restricting congregation within 500 feet of an embassy. In contrast, the Court overturned a restriction on carrying signs on the sidewalks outside the Supreme Court building, since the rule did not sufficiently advance the asserted purposes of maintaining order, protecting the building and grounds, or insulating judicial decision-making from undue influence.

Picketing Abortion Clinics

Picketing has also figured in demonstrations outside abortion clinics. In Madsen v. Womens’ Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994), a lower court issued an injunction forbidding protesters from picketing within 36 feet of clinics, blocking entrances, holding aloft images of fetuses, and making loud noises with bullhorns. The lower court also enjoined picketing within 300 feet of clinic employee residences. The injunction had been issued after the lower court heard substantial evidence that the demonstrators had physically blocked entrances and interfered with access to the clinic building and parking lot.

Applying a slightly higher standard of review to the injunction because a potential prior restraint was involved, the Supreme Court found that the 36-foot “buffer zone” to protect access to clinic entrances was a valid “place” regulation. Evidence had shown that the picketers were interfering with entrance to and egress from the clinic. The noise regulation was also upheld because of its impact on patients and the performance of medical procedures. However, other portions of the injunction, such as the prohibition on picketing within 300 feet of residences and the ban on “images observable” from the clinic were overturned as burdening “more speech than is necessary” to serve the government’s interest.

In Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997), the Court considered another injunction that prohibited anti-abortion protestors from demonstrating within 15 feet of an abortion clinic’s entrances and driveways or approaching within 15 feet of vehicles and patients entering or leaving a clinic. The goal of promoting the free flow of traffic on streets and sidewalks and protecting women’s freedom to seek health-related services was substantial enough to warrant the injunction, given evidence that the demonstrators repeatedly obstructed access to the clinics. The Court struck down the “approach” part of the injunction, however, because it “would restrict the speech of those who simply line the sidewalk or curb in an effort to chant, shout, or hold signs peacefully.” In short, as long as the pickets did not interfere with others’ capacity to travel the sidewalk, enter the clinics, or obtain medical services, the pickets could not be prohibited.

More recently, in Hill v. Colorado, 530 U.S. 703, 730 (2000), the Court encountered a “place” regulation affecting medical facilities, this time involving the validity of a statute rather than an injunction. A Colorado statute established special rules involving approaching persons within a 100-foot radius of the entrance to any health care facility. Within that radius, the statute made it unlawful “knowingly [to] approach” within 8 feet of anyone entering or leaving any health care facility, without that person’s consent, “for the purpose of passing a leaflet or handbill to, displaying a sign to, or engaging in oral protest, education, or counseling with such other person.”

Abortion protesters contended that the statute was targeted at abortion opponents and argued the statute was therefore invalid as a “viewpoint” discrimination. Rejecting their argument, the Court pointed out that the statute applied to all persons, regardless of viewpoint, and the reach of the statute was not confined to abortion clinics. When evaluated as a “place” regulation, the state’s interests—protecting access to the clinic and privacy of the patients—were sufficiently strong to validate the law as a TPM regulation.

The First Amendment and Labor Picketing

The courts have permitted governments more latitude to regulate picketing in labor disputes than picketing on public issues. Although this distinction is a “content based” distinction, courts have permitted the government to regulate labor pickets more stringently. From the perspective of the judiciary, labor picketing is a tool of economic bargaining. Since the 1930s, the courts have allowed the government substantially greater leeway under the Constitution to regulate economic affairs as opposed to political communications, and this general distinction has carried over to communicative activities by labor unions as well. Picketing by workers objecting to working conditions or pay is regarded as a form of economic conflict subject to greater regulation than what the Court has called “public issue” picketing.

In view of the distinction between “labor” and “public issue” picketing, it is ironic that the first Supreme Court case protecting picketing arose in a labor context. In Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U.S. 88 (1940), a labor picket was convicted for violating a municipal ordinance that banned loitering or picketing for the purpose of influencing others not to patronize a place of business, or to attempt to injure a business. The Court overturned the conviction:

Every expression of opinion on matters that are important has the potentiality of inducing action in the interests of one rather than another group in society. But the group in power at any moment may not impose penal sanctions on peaceful and truthful discussion of matters of public interest merely on a showing that others may thereby be persuaded to take action inconsistent with its interests.

In subsequent cases, however, the Court has not been as solicitous of labor picketing. In several cases, for example, the Court has confronted issues of “secondary” boycotts and pickets. A primary boycott is directed at the place of employment. Secondary boycotts, in contrast, focus on the companies doing business with the primary company, seeking to pressure the secondary company to cease doing business with the primary one. Many secondary boycotts violate a statute known as the National Labor Relations Act. Because picketing is a means by which the public and other laborers are alerted to the secondary boycott, the Court has allowed the government to restrict even peaceful picketing directed at the secondary employer. The basis of the Court’s ruling is that the legislature may prohibit picketing directed towards an unlawful end—drawing the secondary employer into the labor dispute.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Baker, C. Edwin, Unreasoned Reasonableness: Mandatory Parade Permits and Time, Place, and Manner Regulations, Northwestern University Law Review 78 (1984): 937.
- Estlund, Cynthia, What Do Workers Want? Employee Interests, Public Interests, and Freedom of Expression Under the National Labor Relations Act, University of Pennsylvania Law Review 140 (1992): 921.
- O'Neill, Kevin Francis, Disentangling the Law of Public Protest, Loyola Law Review 45 (1999): 411.
- Pope, James, The Three-Systems Ladder of First Amendment Values: Two Rungs and a Black Hole, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 11 (1984): 189.
- Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boos v. Barry*, 485 U.S. 313 (1988)
- Burson v. Freeman*, 504 U.S. 191 (1992)
- Carey v. Brown*, 447 U.S. 455 (1980)
- Cox v. Louisiana*, 379 U.S. 559 (1965)
- Edward J. DeBartolo Corp. v. Florida Gulf Coast Building & Construction Trades Council*, 485 U.S. 568 (1988)
- Edwards v. South Carolina*, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
- Frisby v. Shultz*, 487 U.S. 474 (1988)
- Grayned v. City of Rockford*, 408 U.S. 104 (1972)
- Hill v. Colorado*, 530 U.S. 703, 730 (2000)
- Madsen v. Womens' Health Center*, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
- NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co.*, 458 U.S. 886 (1982)
- Perry v. xxx*, 460 U.S., at 45
- Police Department of Chicago v. Mosley*, 408 U.S. 92 (1972)
- Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York*, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)
- Schneider v. State*, 308 U.S. 147, 163 (1939)
- Thornhill v. Alabama*, 310 U.S. 88 (1940)
- United States v. Grace*, 461 U.S. 171 (1983)
- Ward v. Rock Against Racism*, 491 U.S. 781, 798 (1989)
- National Labor Relations Act*, § 8(b)(4) of the NLRA, 29 U.S.C. § 158(b)(4) (1988)

See also Abortion Protest Cases; Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Civil Rights Laws and Freedom of Speech; Clear and Present Danger Test; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 536 (1965); Demonstrations and Sit-ins; Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963); Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 108 Stat. 694 (1994); Frisby v. Schultz, 487 U.S. 474 (1988); Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Hate Speech; Heckler's Veto Problem in Free Speech; Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994); Marches and Demonstrations; Public/Nonpublic Forum Distinction; Public Forum Doctrines; Speech and Its Relation to Violence; Speech versus Conduct Distinction; Symbolic Speech; Time, Place, and Manner Rule; Traditional Public Forums; Tribe, Laurence H.

PIERCE v. SOCIETY OF SISTERS, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)

Pierce v. Society of Sisters addressed the constitutionality of a state statute requiring children's attendance in public schools. The Oregon law required every parent or guardian of a child between eight and sixteen years to send that child to a public school. Under this law, a parent or guardian would be guilty of a misdemeanor for each day a student failed to attend public school. The plaintiffs, a Catholic school serving orphans and a military academy, argued that the state was depriving them of property and their ability to remain in business, and thus sought a preliminary injunction barring enforcement of the statute. The two schools taught the same subjects traditionally pursued in the public schools with some additional instruction.

In a unanimous decision, the Supreme Court held that the Oregon law was unconstitutional because it exceeded the type of reasonable regulation of education under the state's police powers. Relying on the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Court held that the statute deprived private schools of their property interests to remain in business and the parents of their liberty interest in deciding how best to raise their children:

No question is raised concerning the power of the State reasonably to regulate all schools, to inspect, supervise and examine them, their teachers and pupils; to require that all children of proper age attend some school, ... and that nothing be taught which is manifestly inimical to the public welfare (268 U.S. at 534).

The Court rejected the state's argument that the statute was required to effectuate compulsory education, noting that private and public schools can, and have, existed in harmony. Following Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923), the Court found that the Oregon statute unreasonably interfered with the liberty of parents, individually and as a group, to guide their children intellectually and religiously (Pierce, 268 U.S. at 534). Thus, as in Meyer, the Court applied a mere rationality test rather than any type of strict scrutiny to invalidate the statute. The state's power to legislate in the area of education did not give it the right to prohibit and suppress private schools that are qualified to provide students with an education. The state does not have the power to "standardize its children," by forcing public instruction on them (268 U.S. at 535). Nevertheless, the Court recognized that states, in their interest in developing an educated citizenry, could regulate private schools, requiring them to meet minimum standards of instruction also required of public schools.

The Pierce case has been cited in most cases concerning compulsory school attendance, where nonpublic school attendance or home schooling is involved, and in cases involving government interference with the family realm. Together with Meyer v. Nebraska, states cannot interfere with private school practices unless such practices are harmful to the public welfare. The case is also significant for its early use of the substantive due-process doctrine in the area of noneconomic rights (parental rights).

EMILY R. FROMISON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Meyer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)

PLAIN VIEW

The Fourth Amendment guarantees, among other things, that “[t]he right of the people ... against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.” In Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), the Supreme Court carved out an exception to the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement, holding that “under certain circumstances the police may seize evidence in plain view without a warrant.”

Following Coolidge, most lower courts agreed that a warrantless seizure would be upheld under the plain view doctrine when the following four conditions were satisfied:

The police must show that they did not violate the Fourth Amendment in arriving at the place from where the evidence could be plainly viewed. Thus, seizures of items observed in plain view are permissible during the execution of a search or arrest warrant or when a valid exception to the warrant requirement exists.

The evidence must be in plain view, or the police must otherwise have a lawful right of access to the evidence. To this end, a police officer may stand on a public sidewalk and observe incriminating evidence by looking through a window without violating the Fourth Amendment. But the officer would still need a warrant to enter and seize the evidence because the officer’s location on the sidewalk does not give him or her access or authority to seize the evidence observed in plain view.

The incriminating character of the evidence seized must be immediately apparent. Reaffirming Coolidge, in Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), the Court clarified that this condition is satisfied only if, after an inspection of “what is already exposed to view,” the police are able to determine that the evidence is incriminating. According to Hicks, an officer may not move an object even a few inches without running afoul of the Fourth Amendment’s warrant requirement unless the incriminating character of the item was apparent before the officer moved it.

Most lower courts interpreting Coolidge held that the evidence’s discovery must have been inadvertent. Nearly twenty years after Coolidge and just three years after Hicks, in Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128 (1990), the Court rejected the inadvertence requirement. Thus, a plain view seizure will now be upheld if the first three conditions noted previously are satisfied.

In Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993), the Court expanded the plain view doctrine to include plain touch seizures. The requirements for such seizures are nearly identical to those required for a plain view search. First, a police officer must lawfully be in the position from which he or she touched the evidence. Second, the evidence’s incriminating character must be immediately apparent when touched. Finally, the officer must have a lawful right of access to the evidence. Several lower courts have expanded Dickerson and recognized “plain smell” and “plain hearing” corollaries to the plain view and plain touch doctrines. The “plain smell” corollary has been used most frequently in cases where the smell of marijuana has been immediately apparent to officers lawfully in the marijuana’s vicinity—for example, outside a vehicle transporting large amounts of marijuana—or when officers were conducting a lawful detention of the possessor of marijuana. Likewise, the “plain hearing” corollary has been used in cases where officers were lawfully in the vicinity of incriminating remarks—for example, in an adjacent hotel room.

While courts’ recognition of the plain smell and plain hearing corollaries demonstrates an emerging expansion of the plain view doctrine, discernable limits have already been demarcated. Most significantly, the Supreme Court has held that police officers may not use sense-enhancement technologies not in “general public use” to aid their detection of incriminating evidence. In Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001), which rejected the government’s argument that its use of a thermal imager to detect an indoor marijuana cultivation operation was a plain view search, the Court stressed that, until a sense-enhancement technology becomes readily available to the public, individuals' privacy expectations against the use of such technologies remain protected by the Fourth Amendment's warrant requirement.

PLAIN VIEW

JEAN-CLAUDE ANDRÉ

References and Further Reading

- Hilber, Katherine A., Casenote, Criminal Law—Fourth Amendment—Search Under “Plain Touch” Corollary to “Plain View” Must Stay Within the Confines Under Which It Originated, University of Detroit Mercy Law Review 71 (Spring 1994): 713–731.
- Kamisar, Yale, Wayne R. LaFave, Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King, eds. Modern Criminal Procedure: Cases, Comments, and Questions, 11th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2005.
- Sorenson, Quin M., Comment, Losing a Plain View of Katz: The Loss of a Reasonable Expectation of Privacy Under the Readily Available Standard, Dickinson Law Review 107(1) (Summer 2002): 179–207.
- Wallin, Howard E., Plain View Revisited, Pace Law Review 22(2) (Spring 2002): 307–345.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arizona v. Hicks*, 480 U.S. 321 (1987)
- Coolidge v. New Hampshire*, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)
- Horton v. California*, 496 U.S. 128 (1990)
- Kyllo v. United States*, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
- Minnesota v. Dickerson*, 508 U.S. 366 (1993)

See also Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001); Minnesota v. Dickerson, 508 U.S. 366 (1993); Warrant Clause (IV); Warrantless Searches

PLANNED PARENTHOOD

See Planned Parenthood (“Nuremberg Files”) Litigation; Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 506 (1983); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Sanger, Margaret

PLANNED PARENTHOOD

(“NUREMBERG FILES”) LITIGATION

The Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act (FACE) proscribes using threat of force to intimidate a person accessing reproductive health services. In 1995, abortion providers sued several anti-abortion organizations and individuals for violating FACE by means of threatening posters and a Website.

The defendants were responsible for posters containing the caption “WANTED” or “unWANTED,” along with an abortion provider's name, address, and other personal information. Shortly after some of those posters appeared, the featured physicians were killed by anti-abortion extremists. The defendants were also responsible for the “Nuremberg Files” Website, which identified a number of abortion providers. The names of those providers who had been killed were crossed out, and the names of those who had been wounded were grayed out.

The physicians won a verdict of $107 million, but the defendants contended that the posters and Website were protected speech under the First Amendment and therefore could not be punished. The defendants won initially on appeal before a panel of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals, but subsequently lost after rehearing by a larger panel. That court decided that the context of anti-abortion violence had to be taken into account in determining whether the posters and Website were illegally threatening violence, as opposed to (permissibly) endorsing others' violent acts. A true threat, unprotected by the First Amendment, is one that a reasonable person would expect the listener to understand as an expression of intent to harm, though the speaker need not have the intention of carrying it out. Since the posters and the Website met the criteria of true threats, the defendants had violated FACE and the verdict was upheld.

B. JESSIE HILL

References and Further Reading

- Elrod, Jennifer, Expressive Activity, True Threats, and the First Amendment, Connecticut Law Review 36(2) (2004): 541–608.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances Act, 18 U.S.C. § 248

See also Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 108 Stat. 694 (1994); Threats and Free Speech

PLANNED PARENTHOOD OF MISSOURI v. DANFORTH, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)

In its first abortion case after Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court in Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, reviewed seven components of Missouri's new, post-Roe abortion law. The Court struck down requirements of parental and spousal consent, a ban on a common method of abortion called saline amniocentesis, and a criminal penalty on doctors who fail to seek to preserve the life and health of the fetus at all stages of pregnancy. It sustained the statute's viability definition, informed patient consent requirement, and medical recordkeeping and reporting obligation.

Danforth is best known for its analysis of spousal consent and parental-consent requirements. Justice Blackmun wrote for a six-member majority that requiring a husband's written consent unconstitutional afforded him authority to veto his wife's choice, a power that "the state itself is absolutely and totally prohibited from exercising" during the first trimester and thus cannot delegate to the husband. The Court recognized that, ideally, both spouses would agree whether to continue a pregnancy, but underscored that when they do not, "the view of only one of the two marriage partners can prevail." In such a case, the woman, who physically bears the child, must have the choice.

A five-member majority applied a similar rationale to the requirement that a pregnant minor obtain her parent's written consent as a condition of terminating a pregnancy. Missouri did not require parental consent for any other medical procedure, and the Court held that requiring it for abortion violated Roe. Justices Stewart and Powell, concurring, suggested that a parental consent requirement might be constitutional if it provided for a "judicial bypass" of the requirement when a court determined "that the minor is mature enough to give an informed consent without parental concurrence or that the abortion in any event is in the minor's best interest." Justice Stevens parted with the majority on the parental-consent requirement, which he viewed as justified by the state's interest in the welfare of its youth.

A six-member majority also struck the saline amniocentesis prohibition and fetal protection requirement. The Court found no valid health rationale for barring saline amniocentesis, noting that it was safer than permitted alternative methods, less risky than childbirth, and was the most common, medically accepted method of second-trimester abortions. The requirement that doctors seek to preserve the life of the fetus to the same extent that they would a child intended to be born alive effectively precluded even abortions before viability, also in conflict with Roe.

The Court unanimously sustained the three remaining provisions. The statute set viability as "when the life of the unborn child may be continued indefinitely outside the womb by natural or artificial life-supportive systems," which the Court held was consistent with Roe's concept of viability as "a matter of medical judgment, skill, and technical ability." The Court concluded that Missouri's requirement that a woman obtaining an abortion during the first twelve weeks of pregnancy certify in writing "that her consent is informed and freely given and is not the result of coercion" was consistent with woman's reproductive choice. The Court also upheld the requirement that doctors record and report to public health authorities the numbers and types of abortions performed as "reasonably directed to the preservation of maternal health" while properly respecting women's confidentiality and privacy.

Justice White, joined in dissent by Chief Justice Burger and Justice Rehnquist, would have upheld every provision of the Missouri statute, leaving the regulation of abortion primarily in the hands of state legislators.

In the decades since Danforth, many states have enacted restrictions, including parental and spousal involvement requirements, on providers and on women seeking abortions. The Danforth concurrence's suggestion that parental consent cannot be required absent provision for a prompt, confidential judicial bypass has been embraced by a majority of the Court. (See Planned Parenthood Assn. of Kansas City v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476, 1983.) Under the flexible modern standard of Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992), the Court also has reaffirmed the unconstitutionality of spousal consent requirements first struck down in Danforth.

NINA PILLARD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Planned Parenthood Assn. of Kansas City v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)

Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)

Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992)

Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

See also Abortion; Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 462 U.S. 476 (1983); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

PLANNED PARENTHOOD v. ASHCROFT, 462 U.S. 476 (1983)

Following the Supreme Court's decision in Roe v. Wade (410 U.S. 113, 1973) recognizing a woman's right under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to terminate her pregnancy, several states, including Missouri, enacted legislation aimed at discouraging women from choosing abortion over childbirth. Some of the barriers placed by Missouri included a requirement that second-trimester abortions be performed in hospitals, that tissue removed during the abortion be examined by a pathologist, that a second physician be present during third-trimester pregnancies, and that minors secure parental or judicial consent. These rules imposed additional costs for and delay in the performance of abortions. In Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, the Supreme Court struck down the hospital requirement but sustained the other restrictions.

Planned Parenthood Association of Kansas City, Missouri, two physicians who performed abortions, and an abortion clinic filed a suit in federal district court challenging several sections of the Missouri abortion statutes as unconstitutional. The trial court invalidated all the sections except the pathology requirement. The U.S. Court of Appeals upheld the requirement that a minor secure parental or judicial consent to an abortion.

In Akron v. Akron Center of Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983), decided the same day as Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, the Court invalidated a city ordinance requiring physicians to perform all second-trimester abortions in a hospital. Such a restriction, said the Court, unreasonably infringes upon a woman's constitutional right to obtain an abortion. Abortion clinics are a safe, reasonable, and much less costly alternative. The Court found the Missouri hospital requirement unconstitutional for the same reason.

The Court found that the requirement that a second physician be in attendance when a doctor is performing a late-term abortion furthers the state's compelling interest in protecting potential human life. The Court acknowledged that a small percentage of abortions performed after the fetus has reached the point of viability (the stage in which it can survive outside the mother's womb) result in live births. The purpose of the second physician's attendance is to save the life of the child born under such circumstances while the first doctor attends to the needs of the mother. The Court struck down efforts by states to ban late-term, or partial-birth, abortions in Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000).

Immature minors do not enjoy the same constitutional rights as adults. In Planned Parenthood v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976) the Court held unconstitutional Missouri's parental-consent requirement for all unmarried minors. In response Missouri passed a new statute that included a judicial bypass procedure. In Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, the Court upheld the revised statute, saying that a state can require that adolescent girls obtain the consent of one parent or a judge before procuring an abortion. After finding that the minor is not mature enough to make her own decision, the juvenile court will give consent if it finds that the abortion is in the best interest of the minor. The involvement of the juvenile court furthers the state's interest in protecting the well-being of children.

The Court held that the small additional cost of a pathologist's examination of tissue removed during an abortion was outweighed by the substantial benefits obtained. Because the pathologist's microscopic examination might reveal the presence of cancer or other serious disease, the requirement of such an examination advances the state's interest in safeguarding the woman's health. None of the restrictions upheld by the Court was a serious obstacle to the exercise of the abortion right found in Roe v. Wade.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Buss, Emily, The Parental Rights of Minors, Buffalo Law Review 48 (2000): 785-833.
- Dolgin, Janet L., The Fate of Childhood: Legal Models of Children and the Parent-Child Relationship, Albany Law Review 61 (1997): 345-431.
- Katz, Kathryn D., The Pregnant Child's Right to Self-Determination, Albany Law Review 62 (1999): 1119-1166.
- Tradition of Choice: Planned Parenthood at Seventy-Five*. New York: Planned Parenthood Federation of America, Inc., 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Akron v. Akron Center of Reproductive Health*, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
- Planned Parenthood v. Danforth*, 428 U.S. 52 (1976)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)

See also Abortion; Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)

PLANNED PARENTHOOD v. CASEY, 112 S.CT. 2791 (1992)

The Supreme Court assessed the constitutionality of five provisions of the Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act of 1982 (amended in 1988 and 1989). The Court upheld four of the five provisions, rejecting the third one (which required spousal notification for an abortion) based on the undue burden standard: "A finding of an undue burden is a shorthand for the conclusion that a state regulation has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion of a nonviable fetus.”

This standard departs from Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), and its progeny, which required that abortion restrictions be subject to strict scrutiny: limits on abortion must be essential to meeting a compelling state interest. The Casey Court claimed that its holding was more consistent with the spirit and letter of Roe than most of the Court’s post-Roe abortion opinions.

Thus, the Court held that a state may restrict abortion by passing laws that may not withstand strict scrutiny but do not result in an undue burden for the pregnant woman. The Court upheld provisions in the Pennsylvania statute that would have most likely not survived strict scrutiny: “a woman seeking an abortion [must] give her informed consent prior to the abortion procedure, and ... she [must] be provided with certain information at least 24 hours before the abortion is performed” (that is, she must be given the facts of fetal development, risks of abortion and childbirth, and information about alternatives), and “the Act imposes certain reporting requirements on facilities that provide abortion services.” The other two surviving provisions would likely have passed strict scrutiny: parental informed consent for minors (with a judicial bypass option) and a medical emergency exemption from the 24-hour informed consent and the parental and spousal notification provisions.

Although the Court upheld Roe as precedent, it rejected not only Roe’s strict scrutiny standard but also its trimester framework (which Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490, 1989) had already discarded). This framework, according to the Court, was too rigid as well as unnecessary to protect a woman’s right to abortion. The Court did reaffirm Roe’s claim that fetal viability is the place in pregnancy when the state has a compelling interest in protecting prenatal life. But this is at the state’s discretion, since, according to the Court, the Constitution does not require that a state protect prenatal life after viability and prior to birth.

Casey affirmed abortion as a liberty grounded in the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause, though it offered two reasons why the Court could not overturn Roe. First, because people arrange their lives with the abortion right in mind, they have a reliance interest in the preservation of the right. Second, overturning Roe would result in the Court losing respect and legitimacy in the public’s eye, even if rejecting Roe would have in fact corrected a constitutional error.

Casey is an important decision because it upheld Roe while at the same allowing for some restrictions on abortion that would not likely have passed the strict-scrutiny standard of prior Courts.

FRANCIS J. BECKWITH

References and Further Reading

- Beckwith, Francis J. “Roe v. Wade: Its Logic and Its Legacy.” The Southern Baptist Journal of Theology 7.2 (Summer 2003): 4–29.
- Boonin, David. A Defense of Abortion. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2002.
- Bradley, Gerard V. “Shall We Ratify the New Constitution? The Judicial Manifesto in Casey and Lee.” In Benchmarks: Great Constitutional Controversies in the Supreme Court, ed. Terry Eastland. Washington, D.C.: Ethics & Public Policy Center: Grand Rapids, MI: Eerdmans, 1995.
- Dworkin, Ronald. Life’s Dominion: An Argument About Abortion, Euthanasia, and Individual Freedom. New York: Random House, 1993.
- George, Robert P., Public Reason and Political Conflict: Abortion and Homosexuality, Yale Law Journal 106 (1997).
- Lee, Patrick. Abortion and Unborn Human Life. Washington, D.C.: Catholic University of America Press, 1996.
- Pojman, Louis P., and Francis J. Beckwith, eds. The Abortion Controversy 25 Years After Roe v. Wade: A Reader, 2nd ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 1998.
- Simmons, Paul D. “Religious Liberty and Abortion Policy: Casey as ‘Catch-22.’” Journal of Church and State 42.1 (Winter 2000).
- Tribe, Laurence. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. New York: W. W. Norton, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Pennsylvania Abortion Control Act of 1982*, 18 Pa. Cons. Stat. §§ 3203–3220 (1990)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
- See also Abortion; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Privacy; Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

PLEA BARGAINING

Plea bargaining is the process by which the parties in a criminal case settle a case before trial. As the term suggests, it is a negotiation between the prosecutor and the defense attorney concerning whether, and if so the conditions under which, the defendant will agree to plead guilty (or sometimes “no contest” through a plea of nolo contendere) and thus waive the right to contest the charges at a trial. Although plea bargaining can cover a number of issues, most negotiation centers on (1) which charges, if any, the prosecutor will reduce or dismiss; (2) which charges the defendant will admit to; and/or (3) the sentence that the parties will recommend to the judge.

Notwithstanding the constitutional guarantee of a trial in every criminal case, over 90 percent of all criminal cases in the United States are resolved by a guilty plea. Whether this is good or bad has been long debated, but the reasons for the phenomenon are clear. First and probably foremost is necessity. The courts would soon be overwhelmed if every criminal case had to be tried. Formal plea procedures require very little of a court's time, typically less than an hour. In contrast, a jury trial even of a simple case ordinarily takes several hours at a minimum, and trials of complicated cases can last weeks, even months. Absent a dramatic increase in judges, courtrooms, and support staff, plea bargaining is a permanent part of the system.

Beyond necessity, there are systemic and individual benefits that flow from guilty pleas. For both parties, a guilty plea provides certainty. For the defendant, a trial may result in an acquittal, but it may also end with a conviction bringing substantially greater punishment than that resulting from a guilty plea to less serious charges accompanied by a prosecutorial promise to seek a lesser sentence. A defendant who pleads guilty can accept responsibility (perhaps causing the judge further to reduce the punishment) and can conclude the matter much earlier than if the case is tried. For the prosecutor, beyond avoiding possible acquittals, guilty pleas permit focusing limited trial resources on fewer cases. More controversially, plea bargaining provides an opportunity for prosecutors—through charging and sentencing concessions—to secure the cooperation of defendants as witnesses against other criminal defendants in cases that might be far more difficult or impossible to prove without such cooperation.

In view of the high percentage of criminal cases resolved by guilty pleas, it is perhaps surprising that there is very little formal regulation of the plea-bargaining process. While criminal trials are governed by a complex set of rules designed to protect a defendant's rights, the system presumes that the mutuality of advantage and risk that informs parties in plea bargaining will assure an acceptably fair result. What constitutional limits there are flow from the right to a trial and the right to effective assistance of counsel.

Before a guilty plea can be accepted, the judge must be assured in open court that there is sufficient evidence supporting each charge; that the defendant has voluntarily decided to waive the right to trial and its associated protections; that in making this decision the defendant has been informed of and understands these trial rights as well as the consequences of the guilty plea; and that the defendant is satisfied with the lawyer's advice. The parties must also inform the judge of the plea agreement—usually some reduction of charges, dismissal of charges, and/or limitation of sentencing recommendation—and the judge then decides whether to accept the agreement in the interests of justice. Other than perhaps to indicate to the parties why a rejected plea agreement is not acceptable, the judge plays no part in the bargaining process.

Plea bargaining is thus left to the prosecutor and the defendant, ordinarily represented by counsel, and it is principally up to the profession to regulate the process. The American Bar Association has promulgated standards for plea bargaining, and the states' respective rules of professional conduct have provisions applicable to plea bargaining. These rules and standards are designed to assure, as much as possible, a fair process in which the defendant is able to make the kind of informed and voluntary plea decision on which the system's confidence in the process rests. Thus, in the course of plea discussions, neither party may make false statements to the other.

The prosecutor may not withhold from the defendant information otherwise required to be disclosed and may not seek to gain bargaining leverage by bringing charges unsupported by the evidence or threatening to bring further charges. Defense counsel may not initiate plea bargaining without the consent of the defendant and must ensure that the defendant is able to make an informed decision concerning a plea. Defense counsel must fully investigate the case and communicate the results to the defendant, must keep the defendant informed of the plea discussions, and must provide advice to the defendant in a manner that permits the defendant to make a rational, fully informed decision about whether to plead guilty or go to trial.

Notwithstanding these protections and plea bargaining's ostensible benefits, critics doubt its fairness. By design, plea bargaining reduces a defendant's exposure to punishment. While this provides a benefit to a defendant who pleads guilty, some argue that it punishes a defendant who asserts the right to trial and that it results in uneven treatment of defendants similarly situated. Some believe that, particularly when high mandatory sentences are involved, the process is heavily skewed in favor of the prosecution, leaving a defendant little choice but to accept the offered bargain. Also, when the result of a plea bargain is an agreement by a defendant to testify against another, some view this as little better than a bribe. Nevertheless, no one has yet suggested a viable alternative to plea bargaining. There are simply too many criminal cases to try every one, and thus reform is aimed principally at curbing the excesses and abuses of plea bargaining, not its abolition.

ARTHUR LEAVENS

References and Further Reading

- ABA Standards for Criminal Justice—Pleas of Guilty*, 3rd ed. 1999.
- Easterbrook, Frank, Plea Bargaining as Compromise, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1969–78.
- LaFave, Wayne, Jerold Israel, and Nancy King. Criminal Procedure, 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2000.
- Schulhofer, Stephen, Plea Bargaining as Disaster, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1979–2009.
- Scott, Robert, and William Stuntz, Plea Bargaining as Contract, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 1909–1968.
- , A Reply: Imperfect Bargains, Imperfect Trials, and Innocent Defendants, Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 2011–2015.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bordenkircher v. Hayes*, 434 U.S. 357 (1978)
- Brady v. United States*, 397 U.S. 742 (1970)

See also Due Process; Right to Counsel; Sentencing Guidelines

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE ("UNDER GOD")

One of the more contentious legal issues in recent years has been the question whether the words “under God” in the Pledge of Allegiance render recitation of the pledge in public schools a violation of the establishment clause.

Francis Bellamy, a Baptist minister, drafted the initial Pledge of Allegiance in 1892 for use in the public schools. Fifty years later, in 1942, the U.S. Congress officially recognized the pledge as part of its efforts to “codify and emphasize existing rules and customs pertaining to the display and use of the flag of the United States of America.” In doing so, Congress approved the following language for the pledge: “I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one Nation indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.” The following year, the U.S. Supreme Court decided that Jehovah Witness schoolchildren who had religious objections to reciting the Pledge of Allegiance could not be required to do (West Virginia v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624, 1943).

In 1954, Congress amended the Pledge of Allegiance by joint resolution to include the words “under God” after the words “one Nation.” Enacted at the height of the cold war, many favored the change as a way of distinguishing the United States from the “godless” Soviet Union. The House report accompanying the legislation stated that the purpose of the new language was to “recognize the guidance of God in our national affairs” and to affirm “the dependence of our people and our Government upon the moral directions of a Creator.” The Senate sponsor of the amendment explained the purpose as recognizing “the Creator who we really believe is in control of the destinies of this great Republic.”

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE (“UNDER GOD”)

Over the years, the pledge has been frequently recited on government property under the direction of government officials. For example, many public schools conduct a daily recitation of the pledge. Similarly, many governmental meetings, such as legislative sessions, begin with a recitation of the pledge. In recent years, however, questions have been raised whether the inclusion of the words “under God” in the pledge when recited under the direction of a governmental official such as a school teacher violates the establishment clause. The U.S. Supreme Court considered a case raising this issue in 2004, but ultimately dismissed it without reaching the constitutional question, concluding that the plaintiff, a noncustodial parent of a child in a school in which the pledge was recited, did not have standing to bring a legal challenge (Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow, 542 U.S. 1, 2004).

In that case, three justices—William Rehnquist, Sandra Day O’Connor, and Clarence Thomas—rejected the majority’s standing argument and considered the merits of the plaintiff’s claim. These justices concluded that the recitation of the pledge with the “under God” language did not offend the establishment clause. (A fourth justice, Antonin Scalia, recused himself in the case because of prior public comments critical of the lower court’s ruling that the pledge recitation with the “under God” language was unconstitutional.)

Chief Justice Rehnquist, in a concurring opinion joined by Justice O’Connor, concluded that the use of the “under God” language did not violate the establishment clause because the recitation of the pledge was not a “religious exercise.” “Instead,” wrote Rehnquist,

It is a declaration of belief in allegiance and loyalty to the U.S. flag and the Republic that it represents. The phrase “under God” is in no sense a prayer, nor an endorsement of any religion.... Reciting the Pledge, or listening to others recite it, is a patriotic exercise, not a religious one; participants promise fidelity to our flag and our Nation, not to any particular God, faith, or church.

Justice O’Connor, in addition to joining the Rehnquist opinion, filed her own concurring opinion, arguing that the recitation of the pledge did not violate the endorsement test. O'Connor concluded that the “under God” language in the pledge constituted an expression of “ceremonial deism” that did not offend the establishment clause:

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE (“UNDER GOD”)

I believe that the government can, in a discrete category of cases, acknowledge or refer to the divine without offending the Constitution. This category of “ceremonial deism” most clearly encompasses such things as the national motto (“In God We Trust”), religious references in traditional patriotic songs such as the Star-Spangled Banner, and the words with which the Marshal of this Court opens each of its sessions (“God save the United States and this honorable Court”).

Finally, Justice Thomas filed his concurring opinion in which he argued that under the Court's prior precedents, particularly Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), the recitation of the pledge did violate the establishment clause because it “coerced” young children “to declare a belief” that this is “one Nation under God.” Hence, for Thomas, “as a matter of our precedent, the Pledge ... is unconstitutional.” But, Thomas went further, arguing that Lee v. Weisman was wrongly decided because the establishment clause does not apply to the states. Thomas recognized that the Court in prior cases had “incorporated” the establishment clause through the Fourteenth Amendment to apply to the states, but he concluded that that incorporation was inappropriate as a matter of history. Because, in Thomas's view, the establishment clause does not apply to the states, the recitation of the pledge in the California public schools did not offend the Constitution.

Because the Supreme Court in the Newdow case dismissed the case on standing grounds, we do not have a conclusive decision from that court on the constitutionality of the recitation of the pledge in a governmental context. But some federal courts of appeal have also considered the question of the constitutionality of the “under God” language in the pledge. The U.S. Courts of Appeals for the Fourth and Seventh Circuits have found that the use of “under God” in the pledge recited by schoolchildren does not violate the establishment clause so long as the children are free to refrain from joining the recitation (Sherman v. Community Consolidated School District 21 of Wheeling Township, 980 F.2d 437, 7th Cir.1992; Myers v. Loudon County Public Schools, 418 F.3d 395, 4th Cir. 2005). On the other hand, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit has found that the use of the phrase “under God” in the pledge does violate the establishment clause even if schoolchildren are free not to participate in the recitation (Newdow v. U.S. Congress, 292 F.3d 597, 2002).

The issue of the constitutionality of the Pledge of Allegiance remains highly controversial. In September 2005, a federal district court judge in California concluded that the recitation of the pledge in the public schools with the “under God” language violated the establishment clause (Newdow v. Congress of the United States, 383 F. Supp. 2d 1229, E.D. Cal., 2005). The controversy is likely to continue.

DAVISON M. DOUGLAS

References and Further Reading

- Sanford, Bill W., Jr., Perspective: Separation v. Patriotism: Expelling the Pledge from School, St. Mary's Law Journal 34 (2003): 461–503.
- Thompson, John E., Note. What's the Big Deal? The Unconstitutionality of God in the Pledge of Allegiance, Harvard Civil Rights–Civil Liberties Law Review 38 (2003): 563–597.
- Werhan, Keith, Navigating the New Neutrality: School Vouchers, the Pledge, and the Limits of a Purposive Establishment Clause, Brandeis Law Journal 41 (2003): 603–629.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Elk Grove Unified School District v. Newdow*, 542 U.S. 1 (2004)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Myers v. Loudon County Public Schools*, 418 F.3d 395 (4th Cir. 2005)
- Newdow v. Congress of the United States*, 383 F. Supp. 2d 1229 (E.D. Cal. 2005)
- Newdow v. U.S. Congress*, 292 F.3d 597 (2002)
- Sherman v. Community Consolidated School District 21 of Wheeling Township*, 980 F.2d 437 (7th Cir.1992)
- West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette*, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

See also Ceremonial Deism; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing

PLEDGE OF ALLEGIANCE AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

When Congress first adopted an official “Pledge of Allegiance” in 1942 as part of the U.S. Flag Code, it based the pledge on the words of Francis Bellamy, who penned them for a Columbus Day ceremony in 1892. States thereafter enacted laws stipulating that teachers in public schools should lead their students in daily recitations of the pledge. In 1954, however, after legislators felt the need to distinguish the pledge from slogans propagated by communist governments, Congress amended it by adding the words “under God” so that it would read in full: “I pledge allegiance to the Flag of the United States of America, and to the Republic for which it stands, one Nation under God, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all.”

With this amendment, Congress made more explicit the pledge's rhetorical resonances with Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. Congress also wished to use the pledge's image of a nation standing under the sovereignty of God to "acknowledge the dependence of our people and our Government upon the moral directions of the Creator." These moral directions, Congress noted in the House report, were the basis for individuals' "inalienable rights," which the American government recognized "no civil authority may usurp." Congress's invocation of this natural law tradition was to provide a direct counterpoint to "the atheistic and materialistic concepts of Communism with its attendant subservience of the individual."

States' policies enforcing the recitation of the pledge in public schools promptly raised constitutional challenges over the freedom of religious exercise. Soon after the pledge was first codified, Jehovah's Witnesses brought suit against schools that expelled or punished them for refusing to recite the pledge. Jehovah's Witnesses regarded such an act as an idolatrous misplacement of allegiance. In West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), the Supreme Court acknowledged the potential for expressions of patriotic devotion to place the same burden upon the conscience as expressions of religious devotion. It was inconsistent with free exercise of religion to force students to participate in a civic exercise contrary to their faith. Students could freely refrain from reciting the pledge by remaining silent in class.

Since the 1954 amendment, the Pledge has also been scrutinized for potential violations of the establishment clause because it leads school children to invoke the name of God. In Sherman v. Cnty. Consol. Sch. Dist., 21, 980 F.2d 437 (1992), the Seventh Circuit ruled that official recitation of the pledge does not compel religious expression so long as students are entitled to remain silent. The Ninth Circuit, however, ruled in Newdow v. U.S. Congress, 292 F.3d 597 (2002), that the pledge is unconstitutional because Congress left the impression, when codifying the amendment, that it endorsed or preferred monotheism over other beliefs such as atheism. It also applied a definition of coercion, used to ban prayer at school ceremonies in Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), that embraced situations of potential peer pressure. Although the Supreme Court did not overturn the latter ruling on its merits, it has acknowledged in dicta in prior opinions that the pledge is not inconsistent with the First Amendment because it qualifies as a civic act rather than a prayer.

HANS LEAMAN

References and Further Reading

Ellis, Richard. To the Flag: The Unlikely History of the Pledge of Allegiance. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Elk Grove Unified Sch. Dist. v. Newdow, 124 S. Ct. 2301 (2004)
Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
Newdow v. U.S. Congress, 292 F.3d 597 (2002)
Sherman v. Cnty. Consol. Sch. Dist., 21, 980 F.2d 437 (1992)
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)
 4 U.S.C.S. Chapter 1.
 H.R.REP. 83- 1693, 1-3 (83rd Cong. 1954)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence

PLENARY POWER DOCTRINE

The plenary power doctrine arose from the 1824 Supreme Court opinion in Gibbons v. Ogden, 22 U.S. 1 (1824), in which Justice Marshall wrote that "... the sovereignty of Congress, though limited to specified objects, is plenary as to those objects, ..." Ever since, lawyers and courts have seized on that phrase to argue for a broad construction of congressional power. The word "plenary" historically means "full, complete, or unrestricted." But is a delegation of power to, say, regulate "commerce among the states" really unrestricted as long as what is "regulated" is "commerce"? Is the discretion of Congress really unlimited, within a subject, or is it constrained by some standard of reasonableness or public purpose? This question can be more easily answered by examining a different delegation of power:

The Times, Places and Manner of holding Elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by Law make or alter such Regulations, except as to the Places of chusing [sic] Senators.

Would it really be constitutional for Congress to "alter such regulations" to, say, restrict the time to a single microsecond, or the place to the Moon, or the manner to restrict ballot choices to those approved by some political body? Such regulations would be semantically within the delegation if it is considered plenary, but they would clearly be abuses of discretion, and it is not an answer to say that the remedy is political rather than judicial. The people cannot vote out abusive officials if they do not have a choice or cannot vote. Clearly, for at least this delegation, the power is not plenary. It may legitimately be exercised only in the direction of making voting more efficient, convenient, and fair. It is thus constrained to what is reasonable and for a legitimate public purpose.

If its direction is otherwise, that would be an abuse of discretion that is justiciable. Is this delegation exceptional in this respect? No. Other delegations are also worded in a way that indicates the delegation is not plenary, but constrained by a reasonable purpose.

The word “unreasonable” is used in the Fourth Amendment, which also uses the term “probable cause,” to require that the power to issue warrants is constrained to be exercised only in reasonable ways and not as a plenary delegation of power.

Consider the power to tax. The Constitution states, “The Congress shall have Power to lay and collect Taxes, ...”, but does not define what or who may and may not be taxed, or how, other than to prohibit taxes on imports from states or to require that “direct” taxes be “apportioned” without defining what “direct” means. Is that a delegation of a plenary power to tax anyone and anything? No. Courts have held that “fundamental” rights are not taxable if the tax imposes a burden on the exercise of the right. But which rights are “fundamental” and which are not? The Constitution makes no such distinction, and the Ninth Amendment suggests there may be some fundamental rights that are not even specifically mentioned in the Constitution or its other amendments. A historian can conclude from reading the legal and political literature of the era that only certain kinds of profitable activities and articles were deemed suitable objects of taxation, and that some parties, such as eleemosynary organizations, should not be taxed. There was historical precedent for a small “head” tax on every individual, just for being alive, but trying to tax people on every breath they take would incite an insurrection.

Furthermore, the tax clause has a purpose restriction, “to pay the Debts and provide for the Common Defence and General Welfare of the United States; ...” Is this a delegation of a plenary power to spend money for anything? It has been argued that it is, even in the early years of the Republic, but Madison refuted that position in his veto message to Congress, in which he stated that it was not a delegation of a power but a restriction of the power to spend in a way that did not favor or disfavor any state or region. It was the complaint of the violation of this clause in the ways tariffs were imposed to disadvantage the South that was given as a main justification for secession in 1861. There is no explicit delegation of a power to spend, only to lay and collect taxes and a restriction on the purpose for doing that, which we can take as a restriction on the power to tax. The only question would then be whether a violation is justiciable or only a “political question” for the courts to refuse to hear and decide.

Consider the militia clauses. They delegate power “to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States, ...” but the Second Amendment declares that “the right of the people to keep and bear Arms, shall not be infringed.” Does this mean Congress could authorize the president call up everyone, permanently, and then order them all to disarm? No. That might seem to fall within the delegation if it were considered plenary, but in stating that “a well regulated Militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, ...” they were clearly expressing the intent that any regulation be only in the direction and for the purpose of enhancing the effectiveness of militia, and not to impair it, to make militia “well regulated.” If the intent of the Fourteenth Amendment was to extend the protection of all rights to the states, including the Second Amendment and the militia clauses, then the states may also not impair the effectiveness of militia, which founder George Mason declared were “the whole people, except for a few public officials.”

Finally, consider the clause, “All legislative Powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, ...” Does Congress have the legislative power to delegate its legislative powers to officials of other branches or to staff members of Congress? It has long been understood, although not explicitly stated in the Constitution, that legislative and judicial powers are not subdelegatable. Yet they have designated administrative agents to exercise powers beyond what the Constitution and statutes seem to allow, maintaining it is not really a delegation because their actions are subject to the supervision of courts bound by the Constitution and statutes. But they then allow the courts to “defer” to the agents in a way that allows them to exercise almost unlimited discretion. This is the basis of the administrative state, against which some posit the nondelegation doctrine.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Debates in Virginia Convention on Ratification of the Constitution*, vol. 3. Elliot, June 16, 1788. http://www.constitution.org/rc/rat_va_13.htm.
- Gibbons v. Ogden*, 22 U.S. 1 (1824). <http://www.constitution.org/ussc/022-001.htm>.
- Madison, Veto Message to Congress, March 3, 1817. http://www.constitution.org/jm/18170303_veto.htm.

U.S. Const. Art. I Sec. 4 Cl. 1. <http://www.constitution.org/cons/constitu.htm#con1.4.1>.

U.S. Const. Art. I Sec. 8, Cl. 15 & 16. <http://www.constitution.org/cons/constitu.htm#con1.8.15> ; Second Amendment. <http://www.constitution.org/cons/constitu.htm#bor4>.

U.S. Const. Fourth Amendment. <http://www.constitution.org/cons/constitu.htm#bor6>.

PLESSY v. FERGUSON, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)

Plessy was a U.S. Supreme Court case declaring state laws mandating “separate but equal” facilities based on race as constitutionally permissible. This case regarding civil rights and liberties imposed a narrow interpretation of the Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, as well as sanctioned segregation laws passed by state governments in the era of “Jim Crow.”

Along with other southern states, Louisiana segregated railroad cars by mandating “equal but separate accommodations for the white and colored races.” The law was subsequently challenged by Plessy; even though he appeared white, he was classified as “colored” under Louisiana state law because he was one-eighth black. After being arrested for not moving to the colored car in a prearranged encounter with railroad officials, Plessy argued that his constitutional rights under the Thirteenth and Fourteenth amendments were violated by the Louisiana law. Specifically, Plessy argued that the state law reimposed a form of slavery on him, thus violating the Thirteenth Amendment, and that he was denied the “equal protection of the laws” as mandated by the Fourteenth Amendment. State courts rejected his arguments, and Plessy appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

Upon appeal, a majority of the justices used a narrow interpretation of both Civil War amendments to allow the Louisiana law to stand. In rejecting the arguments concerning the Thirteenth Amendment’s prohibition on slavery, Justice Brown held that all distinctions based on race were not necessarily acts of slavery, thus dismissing the claim of Thirteenth Amendment violations. Justice Brown also rejected the notion that the “equal but separate” law violated the Fourteenth Amendment’s equal protection clause. The justice declared that “in the nature of things [the Fourteenth Amendment] could not have been intended to abolish distinctions based upon color, or to enforce social, as distinguished from political equality, or a commingling of the two races unsatisfactory to either.” This judicial opinion rested upon an 1847 case involving the segregation of blacks from Boston schools. In the end, the U.S. Supreme Court sanctioned the concept that state governments could impose requirements mandating separate facilities based on race because laws were “powerless to eradicate racial instincts or to abolish distinctions based upon physical differences.”

In his dissent, Justice John Marshall Harlan sought to uphold the protection of the civil rights for blacks against state discrimination and chastised his brethren on the Court for consenting to racial discrimination in the guise of “separate but equal.” Harlan wrote that the U.S. Constitution was “color blind” by the fact that the Civil War amendments removed all distinctions based on race. Citing the case that heralded the Civil War, Harlan believed that the Plessy decision would be equal to the Dred Scott decision (19 How., 60 U.S., 393, 1857).

The Plessy decision enshrined the concept of “separate but equal” in racial terms within American law. This decision would be used in later cases and statutes to deny blacks their constitutional and legal rights within many venues of American society. From birth in a hospital through education to the cemetery, Jim Crow laws were written to regulate and discriminate between the races. In other U.S. Supreme Court cases, the use of Plessy’s doctrine upheld racial classification and separation in educational settings (Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Ed (GA), 175 U.S. 528, 1899; Gong Lum v. Rice, 274 U.S. 78, 1927).

As one scholar has noted, however, blacks used Plessy to fight against segregated schooling, particularly by challenging states to uphold the “equal” part of “separate but equal.” Through organizations such as the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, blacks would challenge Plessy’s “separate but equal” finding through the first half of the twentieth century. Again, the focus on educational opportunities would serve as the foundation for these challenges, starting with graduate education and law schools (Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337, 1938; Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629, 1950; McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 816, 1950). Ultimately, these challenges culminated in the U.S. Supreme Court’s declaration, in Brown vs. Board of Education (347 U.S. 483, 1954), that “in the field of public education, the doctrine of ‘separate but equal’ has no place. Separate educational facilities are inherently unequal” and thus the rejection of the Plessy decision.

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Further Reading

Fireside, Harvey. Separate and Unequal: Homer Plessy and the Supreme Court Decision That Legalized Racism. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2004.

Lofgren, Charles A. The Plessy Case: A Legal-Historical Interpretation. New York: Oxford University Press, 1987.

Medley, Keith Weldon. We as Freeman: Plessy v. Ferguson. Gretna, LA: Pelican Publishing, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, KS, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)

Cumming v. Richmond County Board of Ed., (GA) 175 U.S. 528 (1899)

Gong Lum v. Rice, 274 U.S. 78 (1927)

McLaurin v. Oklahoma State Regents, 339 U.S. 816 (1950)

Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337 (1938)

Sweatt v. Painter, 339 U.S. 629 (1950)

PLYLER v. DOE, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)

Undocumented immigrants have long been criticized as one of the main problems in U.S. immigration policy. As a matter of fact, very few public benefits have been granted to them. In Plyler, the U.S. Supreme Court refused to do more damage and take away their (children's) right to public education.

In 1975, the Texas legislature revised its education statutes to deny free public education (enrollment and state funds) to children who were illegally admitted into the United States. Plyler was a class action on behalf of a group of school-age children of Mexican origin, and it complained of the exclusion of such children from public schools. The district court held that illegal aliens were entitled to the protection of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and that the discrimination embodied in the Texas statutes failed a rational-basis test and violated the equal protection clause. The court of appeals upheld the district court's decision.

The Court affirmed and held that "the protections of the Fourteenth Amendment extend to anyone, citizen or stranger, who is subject to the laws of a State, and reaches into every corner of a State's territory." Unlike their parents, who entered the nation illegally, the Court recognized that children in this case "can affect neither their parents' conduct nor their own status" and there is no rational justification to punish them in concord with conceptions of justice. Though education is not a right granted to individuals by the Constitution, the Court believed that education has a fundamental role in society and that, denied proper education, children of illegal entrants would likely become locked into their low socioeconomic status and never be able to move ahead.

In its balance test, the Court turned down the state's claimed interest in the preservation of limited resources for the education of its lawful residents. The Texas education statutes failed to offer an effective means to cure the claimed problems caused by the influx of illegal immigrants. The record failed to show that illegal entrants imposed any significant burden on the state's economy and that exclusion of undocumented children was likely to improve the overall quality of education in the state. Moreover, given the fact that many of these children potentially could remain in the states and become lawful residents or citizens, minimal savings that might be achieved by denying them proper education would not counter potentially more substantial costs suffered by these children, the state, and the nation.

Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Powell filed separate opinions supporting a more fundamental status for education. Justices Burger, White, Rehnquist, and O'Connor dissented in their opinion and argued that the majority crossed the political boundary of the Court and acted for Congress in establishing a national policy. The dissenters believed that the claimed interest by the state bore a rational relationship to its legislation and therefore passed the constitutional test.

Plyler was a major victory for illegal immigrants. By safeguarding their children's educational right, the Court reaffirmed its traditional responsibility to protect politically powerless minorities.

BIN LIANG

References and Further Reading

Biegel, Stuart, The Wisdom of Plyler v. Doe, Chicano-Latino Law Review 17 (1995): 46-63.

Bryce, Brendan M., Plyler v. Doe: Progressivism and Undocumented Aliens, Widener Law Symposium Journal 4 (1999): 357-400.

DeSipio, Louis, and Rodolfo O. de la Garza. Making Americans, Remaking America: Immigration and Immigrant Policy. Westview Press, 1998.

Hull, Elizabeth, Undocumented Alien Children and Free Public Education: An Analysis of Plyler v. Doe, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 44 (1983): 409-432.

Perry, Michael J., Equal Protection for Illegal Aliens: Equal Protection, Judicial Activism, and the Intellectual Agenda of the Constitutional Theory: Reflections on, and Beyond Plyler v. Doe, University of Pittsburgh Law Review 44 (1983): 329-350.

POE v. ULLMAN, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)

Poe v. Ullman challenged the constitutionality of Connecticut's 1879 law that prohibited using or giving advice about contraceptive devices, but it is best known for its definition of justiciability or the authority of courts to decide only bona fide cases and controversies. A number of separate challenges to the anticontraception law were combined under this single title: one involving a married couple who had given birth to three children, all of whom died shortly after birth due to congenital abnormalities; a second involving a married woman who had been pregnant once and suffered a critical illness as a result, leaving her partially paralyzed and with impaired speech; and a third initiated by an obstetrician who alleged that he could not prescribe appropriate birth control materials for fear of prosecution. All asked that the U.S. Supreme Court declare the law invalid.

The five-justice majority chose not to decide the constitutionality of the case, but rather refused to hear it because it was not a real and substantial controversy involving adversarial parties. Justice Felix Frankfurter called the lawsuits unreal because of the lack of immediacy of any threat of prosecution. He noted that though the law had been on the books for more than three quarters of a century, there had only been one prosecution because of a seeming tacit agreement whereby Connecticut did not enforce the statute. The case was, therefore, abstract and hypothetical and not a truly adversarial contest involving honest antagonistic assertions of rights. Neither the doctor nor the individuals bringing suit had any realistic fear of prosecution. It did not, in short, qualify as a real case or controversy as required by Article III of the Constitution.

Justices Harlan, Douglas, Stewart, and Black disagreed and would have decided the cases on their merits. Justice Douglas argued in his dissenting opinion not only that the cases met all of the requisites for legitimate cases or controversies, but also that the concept of “liberty” in the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause extended to rights not included in the first eight amendments to the Constitution. The right to travel and the right to marry and have children were not enumerated rights and yet had received judicial protection from an intrusive state. Justice Harlan’s dissent also argued that the case was not a hypothetical, friendly, or feigned suit and that it did not lack “ripeness.” He also would have struck down the law since “making it a criminal offense for married couples to use contraceptives is an intolerable and unjustifiable invasion of privacy” and prohibited by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Notably, just four years later, the same gynecologist-obstetrician was involved in another challenge to the anticontraception statute, Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965), for which Justice Douglas wrote the majority decision; the statute was declared unconstitutional as a violation of the right to privacy.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

Cases and Statute Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965)

POELKER v. DOE, 432 U.S. 59 (1977)

This case involved the right to privacy as it has been applied to a woman’s right to an abortion, as upheld by the Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade. Jane Doe was an indigent woman who attempted to obtain a non-therapeutic abortion at one of two public hospitals owned and operated by the city of St. Louis, Missouri. Notably, the hospital used many doctors and medical students from St. Louis University School of Medicine, a Jesuit-operated institution that opposes abortion, in the obstetrics and gynecology clinic. The policy of the city’s hospitals was to prohibit abortions except when there was a threat of significant physical injury or death to the mother. Doe also brought a class action suit against the mayor of St. Louis and the director of health and hospitals, but was unsuccessful in her constitutional challenge at the district court level. However, the court of appeals decided in her favor on both the facts and the legal issues.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, issuing only a per curiam decision that represented the views of six members of the Court. Though the court of appeals had based its decision in favor of Doe on an equal protection argument and asserted that the city hospitals’ policies discriminated against women who chose not to carry their pregnancies to term and against indigent women who could not afford to pay for a privately funded abortion, the majority of the Supreme Court concluded that the guiding precedent was Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977). In the Maher case, the Court had decided that a state’s refusal to offer Medicaid benefits for abortions while offering them for childbirth was constitutional. The Constitution does not forbid a state or a city to express a preference, through the democratic process, for childbirth.

Justices Marshall, Blackmun, and Brennan dissented; the essence of their dissent was that, under this ruling, an indigent woman can be barred by a city policy from exercising her constitutional right to choose to terminate her pregnancy. Justice Brennan further noted that during 1975 only about 18 percent of public hospitals in the country offered abortion services and that in ten states there were no public hospitals that would perform abortions. Thus, according to Justice Brennan, policies such as the one upheld by the majority presented an “insurmountable obstacle to indigent women” who attempted to exercise their constitutional rights.

MARY L. VOLCANSEK

References and Further Reading

O'Brien, David M. Storm Center: The Supreme Court in American Politics. New York: W. W. Norton & Company, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

POLICE INVESTIGATION COMMISSIONS

Independent commissions to investigate the police have been an important part of the history of the American police. Commissions have been created to investigate local law enforcement agencies and also at the national level to examine the law enforcement profession as a whole. Commission investigations generally publish a report with recommendations for police reform.

In the twentieth century, commissions adopted a social scientific approach, utilizing recognized police scholars and often engaging in extensive data collection and analysis. The first investigating commission of this type was the Cleveland Survey (1922). The first national investigating commission was the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement (known popularly as the Wickersham Commission, 1929–1931). Its report on police abuse of citizens' rights had a major influence in stimulating police reform. In 1967, the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and the Administration of Justice published a task force report on the police that also had a major impact on reform.

There have been many local police investigation commissions. The New York City Police Department was the subject of several investigations of police corruption in the twentieth century. The most famous recent police investigating commission was the 1991 Christopher Commission, which investigated the Los Angeles Police Department after the highly publicized beating of Rodney King by Los Angeles Police officers.

The weakness of investigating commissions is that they have no power to implement their recommendations for reform. Nonetheless, commissions have played a major role in the reform of the police by documenting existing problems and recommending reforms that have guided the efforts of federal, state, and local officials.

SAMUEL WALKER

References and Further Reading

Chin, Gabriel J., ed. New York City Police Corruption Investigation Commissions, 1894–1994. William S. Hein & Co., 1997.
Christopher Commission. Report of the Independent Commission to Investigate the Los Angeles Police Department. Los Angeles: Christopher Commission, 1991.
Cleveland Foundation. Criminal Justice in Cleveland. Cleveland, OH: The Cleveland Foundation, 1922.
National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement. Lawlessness in Law Enforcement. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1931.
President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice. Task Force Report: The Police. Washington, D.C.: Government Printing Office, 1967.
Walker, Samuel. "Setting the Standards: The Efforts and Impact of Blue-Ribbon Commissions on the Police." In Police Leadership in America: Crisis and Opportunity, William A. Geller, ed. New York: Praeger, 1985, pp. 354–370.

POLICE POWER OF THE STATE

The term "police power" is usually defined as a broad power to legislate for the health, safety, order, and morals of the public and includes civil and criminal powers. State constitutions generally delegate such powers, leaving it to the discretion of the state legislature to exercise its judgment on how best to do that, restrained only by political pressures from voters. Since such legislation normally requires only a simple majority to adopt, this has often led to legislation that operates to the disadvantage of individuals and minorities. Such abuse was part of the motivation for the Fourteenth Amendment, which was intended to extend the jurisdiction of federal courts to cases between a citizen and his state that involved a federally protected right and delegated to Congress the power to legislate civil and criminal remedies for such abuses of rights.

Prior to the twentieth century, general police powers were usually held to be confined to the states and, for the federal government, to its nonstate territories and enclaves created under U.S. Const. Art. I Sec. 8 Cl. 17. Starting with New York v. Miln (1837) the Supreme Court developed the notion of state police powers that exempted states from the reach of the commerce clause. Thus, under the police powers doctrine, antebellum states were able to regulate the sale of liquor and the influx of poor immigrants. The slave states asserted their police power to prohibit free blacks—even those who were citizens of other states or foreign nations—from entering their jurisdiction. Similarly, the northern states asserted their police powers to emancipate the slaves of visiting masters to pass personal liberty laws to protect their black residents from being kidnapped or seized as fugitive slaves. However, for about the last 100 years, Congress has increasingly been asserting the power to legislate police powers on state territory, usually on the alleged authority of the commerce clause and the necessary and proper clause, the interpretation of which has been extended to include almost anything. This has led to the adoption of criminal legislation that would previously have been deemed unconstitutional.

Many of the cases before the federal courts that invoke the Fourteenth Amendment against a state are complaints about the exercise by the state of its claimed police powers. Most of these cases, following a line of precedents that emphasize the equal protection and due process clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment and ignore or deprecate the privileges and immunities clause and the Ninth Amendment, have resulted in overturning or restricting the application of many state statutes and practices. They have also brought the doctrine of "rational basis" as a test for whether the statute or practice is reasonable, pursuant to a legitimate public interest, and not an undue burden on the exercise of a protected public right. Thus, state police powers are coming to be seen as not plenary.

This has, however, provoked many persons to complain that such federal court decisions infringe on the reserved powers of the states and threaten the federal system of divided power between state and central governments. The argument is that, even if the states infringe a right, it is better that the federal courts not intervene and, by not intervening, compel dissatisfied parties to use the political process to enact reforms at the state or local level. They express fears that it is unhealthy for people to become too dependent on the federal courts for redress. This has led to many recent decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court to defer to states or decline to intervene, even when it would seem logical it should, on constitutional grounds, making a prudential rather than a constitutional determination that it is unwise to intervene when the political processes to remedy the complaint at the state level are available.

One of the effects of ever broader exercise of such police powers by states has been to depart in significant ways from the standards established for criminal prosecutions in the common law tradition. This tradition prescribed that to convict someone of a crime, the state had to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, to a jury of twelve, which had to render a unanimous verdict on five elements:

mens rea, or criminal intent actus reus, or actual commitment of the act concurrence of mens rea and actus reus in location and time harm done to some actual victim causation of the harm by the act

These elements are for offenses that are mala in se, or inherently bad, but state police powers have been invoked to adopt legislation to make some things mala prohibita, or bad because they are prohibited, and to relax the requirements for all of the elements listed previously. Behaviors that cause no demonstrable injury to individuals have been made subject to criminal or civil penalties because they offend a prevailing view of what is moral or in good taste, present a nuisance, reduce property values, or appear to pose a risk of future public injury based on a theory of risk that may not be scientifically valid. While people in the founding era were certainly familiar with laws that imposed civil penalties not for past acts but to prevent possible future injury, they were generally adverse to imposing criminal penalties for preventive purposes. This was discussed by Charles de Montesquieu in his treatise, Spirit of Laws, under the topic of "sumptuary laws," which he held to be bad public policy and likely counterproductive, even if well-intended.

The "police powers" are the broad powers of regulation. As stated in Lawton v. Steele, 152 133 (1894):

The extent and limits of what is known as the "police power" have been a fruitful subject of discussion in the appellate courts of nearly every state in the Union. It is universally conceded to include everything essential to the public safety, health, and morals, and to justify the destruction or abatement, by summary proceedings, of whatever may be regarded as a public nuisance.

The police powers are a power of the state (and its local county and municipal manifestations.) In U.S. v. Knight Co., 156 U.S. 11, the Court declared:

It cannot be denied that the power of the state to protect the lives, health and property of its citizens and to preserve good order and the public morals, the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion, is a power originally and always belonging to the state, not surrendered to the general [federal] Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

The potential for conflict between the police powers and fundamental rights is an ongoing area for controversy. This appears in the case of Reynolds v. United States (98 U.S. 145, 1878). Reynolds was a Mormon man who claimed that he had a religious duty to commit polygamy, even though this was outlawed by a federal statute. The Supreme Court ruled against Reynolds and, in the opinion of the Court, Chief Justice Waite stated, Laws are made for the government of actions, and while they cannot interfere with mere religious belief and opinions, they may with practices. Suppose one believed that human sacrifices were a necessary part of religious worship, would it be seriously contended that the civil government under which he lived could not interfere to prevent a sacrifice? Or if a wife religiously believed it was her duty to burn herself upon the funeral pile of her dead husband, would it be beyond the power of the civil government to prevent her carrying her belief into practice? So here, as a law of the organization of society under the exclusive dominion of the United States, it is provided that plural marriages shall not be allowed. Can a man excuse his practices to the contrary because of his religious belief? To permit this would be to make the professed doctrines of religious belief superior to the law of the land, and in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself. Government could exist only in name under such circumstances.

In the case of Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 562 (1925), Benjamin Gitlow, the appellant and a member of an American communist organization, was indicted and convicted of “criminal anarchy.” This case arose as part of the “red scare,” an intense fear of Communism spreading to the United States during the 1920s and 1930s, motivated in large part by opposition to labor unions. Gitlow held that the statute ran contrary to the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the opinion of the Court, Justice Stanford held that though the First Amendment protects the freedom of speech and press as fundamental rights and liberties, these rights are not absolute and can be abridged in the interest of preserving the government or cultural identity of the United States. The main effect of the decision, however, was to incorporate the First Amendment under the Fourteenth Amendment.

In the case of Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 561 (1969), the Supreme Court reversed a lower court conviction for knowing “possession of obscene material.” Justice Marshall delivered the Court’s opinion, which stated that the First Amendment “prohibits making the private possession of obscene material a crime.” Justice Marshall went on to state that the mere fact that the materials were considered “obscene” was not enough of a justification to invade the personal rights of citizens that possess them. In this decision, the justice makes the bold claim that the state is not interested in what is morally right (a concept that would later be expounded in Lawrence v. Texas, U.S. 123 S.Ct. 2472, 2003) by stating that:

Yet in the face of these traditional notions of individual liberty, Georgia asserts the right to protect the individual’s mind from the effects of obscenity. We are not certain that this argument amounts to anything more than the assertion that the State has the right to control the moral content of a person’s thoughts. To some, this may be a noble purpose, but it is wholly inconsistent with the philosophy of the First Amendment.

In the Court’s opinion in Lawrence v. Texas (2003), Justice Kennedy made the point that “freedom extends beyond spatial bounds,” and that “liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, belief, expression and certain intimate conduct.” Justice Kennedy’s opinion makes it clear that the people of the United States should be free to choose and pursue their preferred way of life. This decision also made it clear that mere appeals to morality were not enough to restrict a person’s liberties, and that the only clear outer boundary to personal liberties would be the harming of a nonconsenting party. This was of particular importance because homosexuality is widely held to be immoral and is a controversial topic among many Americans, particularly those of strongly conservative religious convictions.

We need a doctrine to identify those powers that the people of the states may, if they choose, delegate to their state governments by means of their state constitutions without violating the Constitution of the United States. The most obvious power of states that follows from the original meaning of the privileges or immunities clause is the power to prohibit any violations by some citizens of the liberties or rights of other citizens. In addition to the power of prohibiting wrongful conduct, the power of states may also properly include the power of regulating rightful behavior.

In 1868, the same year in which the Fourteenth Amendment was enacted, the first edition of Thomas M. Cooley’s A Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest Upon the Legislative Power of the United States of the American Union was published. Cooley sought to address the question of “conflict between national and State authority” as well as the question of “whether the State exceeds its just powers in dealing with the property and restraining the actions of individuals.” The answers to these questions turned on the content of the police power, which he defined in light of previous judicial opinions as follows:

The police of a State, in a comprehensive sense, embraces its system of internal regulation, by which it is sought not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offences against the State, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizen with citizen those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent a conflict of rights, and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as is reasonably consistent with a like enjoyment of rights by others.

After Cooley, the leading nineteenth-century theorist of the police power was Christopher Tiedeman. In his 1886 Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States, he repeatedly relied on the power to prevent rights violations to identify reasonable and therefore constitutional exercises of the police power. To explain the police power and its limits he began with the concept of natural rights:

The private rights of the individual, apart from a few statutory rights, which when compared with the whole body of private rights are insignificant in number, do not rest upon the mandate of municipal law as a source. They belong to man in a state of nature; they are natural rights, rights recognized and existing in the law of reason.

Tiedeman contended that legislation prohibiting gambling “would be open to serious constitutional objections. Gambling or betting of any kind is a vice and not a trespass, and inasmuch as the parties are willing victims of the evil effects, there is nothing that calls for public regulation.” According to this view, “[n]o law can make vice a crime, unless it becomes by its consequence a trespass upon the rights of the public.” For Tiedeman, the protection of rights is the measure of proper police power regulations.

Tiedeman discusses at some length why temperance laws were not only bad policy, but also beyond the state’s police power. “[N]o trade can be subjected to police regulation of any kind,” he wrote, “unless its prosecution involves some harm or injury to the public or to third persons, and in any case the regulation cannot extend beyond the evil which is to be restrained.” Moreover, “no trade can be prohibited altogether, unless the evil is inherent in the character of the trade, so that the trade, however conducted, and whatever may be the character of the person engaged in it, must necessarily produce injury upon the public or upon individual third persons.” The implication of this argument is that it is beyond the police power to license occupations, for that is tantamount to prohibiting the occupation unless it is permitted.

After a lengthy examination of the effects of the use and sale of alcohol, Tiedeman concluded that prohibition was not constitutionally justified under these principles of the police power. “[T]he liquor trade can not ... be prohibited entirely, unless its prosecution is essentially and necessarily injurious to the public. Even the prohibition of saloons, that is, where intoxicating liquor is sold and served, to be drunk on the premises, cannot be justified on these grounds.” Although the courts of his day rejected this view, Tiedeman contended that it was “the duty of a constitutional jurist to press his views of constitutional law upon the attention of the legal world, even though they place him in opposition to the current of authority.”

How can a proper regulation of rightful activity be distinguished from an improper abridgment of the private rights of the people? As with the federal laws, the key is whether state laws are a pretext for purposes other than the prevention of future or rectification of past rights violations. Charles Bufford, in “The Scope and Meaning of Police Power,” said, “[A] regulation in the exercise of the police power must not be unreasonably or unnecessarily burdensome, and must have some appreciable tendency towards accomplishing a result within the scope of police power.” One sign that a law is pretextual is when it benefits a particular group rather than the general public.

Glenn Reynolds and David Kopel summarize the contrast between the position of Tiedeman with that of another legal scholar, Ernst Freund, as follows: “[T]he traditional view, espoused by Tiedeman, was that state power could legitimately be employed to protect individuals from direct harm; the newer view, represented by Freund, was that the state could regulate even to permit harms that might not occur, or that might not have been considered a harm at all by the common law.” Reynolds and Kopel note, however, that even Freund, “the expositor of the broad police power theory that dominated legal thought in the twentieth century, emphasized that judicial review was still essential.” As Freund put the matter:

Effective judicial limitations on the police power would be impossible, if the legislature were the sole judge of the necessity of the measures it enacted.... [T]he maintenance of private rights under the requirements of the public welfare is a question of proportionateness of measures entirely. Liberty and property yield to the police power, but not to the point of destruction.... The question of reasonableness usually resolves itself into this: is the regulation carried to the point where it becomes a prohibition, destruction, or confiscation?

This position would therefore seem to argue against court deference to legislative findings, including the deference of federal courts to the findings of state courts or legislatures. The state may regulate, as opposed to prohibit, a rightful exercise of liberty, but such a regulation would have to be shown to be necessary to the protection of the rights of others. A bare assertion that the conduct in question is immoral is inadequate.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

Barnett, Randy, The Proper Scope of the Police Power, Notre Dame Law Review, 79 (August 21, 2003). <http://ssrn.com/abstract=437201>.

- Becraft, Lowell, Jr., Limits of Congressional Powers, <http://www.constitution.org/becraft/limits1.htm>.
- Bufford, Charles, The Scope and Meaning of Police Power, California Law Review 4 (1916): 269–272.
- Cooley, Thomas M. A Treatise on the Constitutional Limitations Which Rest Upon the Legislative Powers of the States of the American Union, 1868, 1883.
- de Montesquieu, Charles. The Spirit of Laws, 1748, tr. Thomas Nugent 1752.
- Finkelman, Paul. An Imperfect Union: Slavery, Federalism, and Comity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.
- Freund, Ernst. “The Police Power.” Public Policy and Constitutional Rights 6 (1904).
- Hastings, W. G. “The Development of Law as Illustrated by the Decisions Relating to the Police Power of the State.” Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society, 39 359 (1900): 359–360.
- <http://www.constitution.org/cm/sol.htm>.
- Morris, Thomas D. Free Men All: The Personal Liberty Laws of the North, 1780–1861. Baltimore, MD: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1974.
- Reynolds, Glenn H., and David B. Kopel, The Evolving Police Power: Some Observations for a New Century, Hastings Con. L. Q. 27 (2000): 512.
- Tiedeman, Christopher G. A Treatise on the Limitations of Police Power in the United States: Considered From Both a Civil and Criminal Standpoint, 1886.

POLITICAL CORRECTNESS AND FREE SPEECH

The First Amendment’s guarantee of free speech has long been qualified by the exclusion of protection for “fighting words”—expression that constitutes a threat of violence and invites a violent reaction. Spurred by what is often described as a concern with political correctness, many public institutions have sought to extend the fighting words rationale to restrict speech that may be considered offensive or insensitive, especially as perceived by women or minorities.

Borrowing legal terminology from cases involving workplace harassment under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, some state-supported universities have adopted speech codes aimed at preventing expression that could create the perception of a hostile environment on the part of members of protected classifications. Such codes are commonly couched in terms of banning “hate speech” and provide for sanctions against violators, up to and including suspension or termination.

The fundamental problem with such codes—irrespective of whether they expressly restrict students’ speech or purport merely to regulate their conduct—is that they necessarily amount to content based restriction of expression, thereby conflicting with core First Amendment values. The Supreme Court has shown little tolerance for such restrictions. Indeed, in its 1992 decision in R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992), the Court rejected a traditional “fighting words” rationale in striking down a statute aimed at banning the use of racial epithets, since the law targeted a particular type of expression based on its content. Nevertheless, speech codes have proliferated on college campuses since the 1980s.

No constitutional challenge to a campus speech code has come before the Supreme Court, but such measures have not fared well in the lower courts. Typical is Bair v. Shippensburg University, 280 F. Supp.2d 357 (M.D.Pa., 2003), wherein a federal court in Pennsylvania enjoined the enforcement of a school’s speech code because its vague directives (such as requiring students to communicate their beliefs in a “nonprovoking manner”) were unconstitutionally overbroad. The court of appeals reached a similar result in Dambrot v. Central Michigan University, 55 F.3d 1177 (6th Cir.1995), holding that a ban on “stigmatiz[ing] or victimiz[ing]” individuals was overbroad, despite a provision that the code would not be enforced inconsistently with the First Amendment.

The tension between political correctness and free speech extends into many other realms of public discourse, of which only a small sample can be mentioned here. University faculty members as well as students have run afoul of restrictions on classroom discussion. Although courts normally afford greater latitude to the regulation of student speech in public high schools than in institutions of higher learning, a federal court in West Virginia held, in Bragg v. Swanson, 371 F.Supp.2d 814 (S.D.W.Va., 2005), that a high school’s prohibition of clothing displaying the Confederate flag was overbroad. Absent any evidence of racial animus or disruptive incidents stemming from such displays, the court held that equating display of the flag with racism violated the students’ First Amendment rights. School mascots derived from Native American prototypes have been challenged as offensive, and references to such mascots (in particular, “redskins” and variations thereon) have been banned from personalized license plates in several states.

R. S. RADFORD

References and Further Reading

- Kors, Alan Charles, and Harvey A. Silvergate. The Shadow University: The Betrayal of Liberty on America’s Campuses. New York: Harper Perennial, 1998.
- Robbins, Wayne Lindsey, Jr., When Two Liberal Values Collide in an Era of “Political Correctness”: First Amendment Protection as a Check on Speech-Based Title VII Hostile Environment Claims, Baylor Law Review 47 (1995): 789.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bair v. Shippensburg University*, 280 F.Supp.2d 357 (M.D. Pa., 2003)
Bragg v. Swanson, 371 F.Supp.2d 814 (S.D.W.Va., 2005)
Dambrot v. Central Michigan University, 55 F.3d 1177 (6th Cir.1995)
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
 Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub. L. 88-352 (Title VII), 42 USC § 2000e (1964)

POLITICAL PATRONAGE AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

Traditional political patronage was the exchange of government jobs for political support—in other words, hiring people who belong to the party or faction of a candidate for political office and requiring them to do electoral work and/or give financial support, and firing them if they do not. The Democratic Party Organization of Cook County, Illinois, for example, totally dominated Chicago city government in this way under Mayor Richard J. Daley from 1955 to 1976. Daley controlled about thirty-five thousand patronage jobs and used the power to hire and fire to secure election of his candidates. City and county employees were required to buy tickets to party fundraising events and to work the precincts before elections. In this fashion, the Cook County political “machine” was able to mobilize the vote for Daley and his candidates every election day and exercised a virtual monopoly over Chicago politics.

Following the common patronage practice, in 1970 the newly elected Democratic sheriff of Cook County, Richard Elrod, fired various Republican employees of the sheriff’s office. The dismissed employees filed a lawsuit, on the grounds that firing them for their political affiliation constituted an unacceptable burden upon an employee’s First Amendment rights. How could employees feel free to associate with the party of their choice, support the candidates of their choice, even say what they thought, if their jobs hung in the balance?

In Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976), the U.S. Supreme Court agreed. Drawing upon its earlier cases finding that it was unconstitutional to require a loyalty oath as a condition of public employment, the Court held that politically motivated firing violated the rights of the individual employee and harmed the electoral process as a whole, discouraging present employees as well as anyone who might want to seek a public job from the free exercise of their rights of speech and association. Under the standard applied to government actions interfering with First Amendment rights, a public employer could do so only if it was necessary to a compelling governmental interest.

In Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980), the Court made an explicit exception to Elrod for policymaking employees, thus permitting employment decisions on political grounds for positions where loyalty to and identification with the goals of a candidate were important to carrying out his or her program.

It was not until 1990 that the Supreme Court found that it was also unconstitutional to hire public employees on political grounds—or to promote, transfer, or take other adverse job actions against them. Ironically, that case, Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990), also came out of Illinois but involved patronage practices engaged in by the Republican governor instead of the Cook County Democratic machine. Four judges dissented in Rutan, however, arguing that patronage was essential to the operation of democratic politics and the American party system.

After Elrod and Rutan had made patronage hiring and firing illegal, contract patronage became more important. Many governmental functions were being privatized in the 1980s anyway, and the contracts to fulfill those functions (waste hauling, for example) were awarded to persons and companies who were political supporters of the party or faction in power and contributed to its coffers. The money received could be used to pay for the television ads, mass mailings, and telemarketing that were beginning to replace door-to-door campaigning.

In a pair of cases decided in 1996, the Supreme Court held that the prohibition against patronage hiring and firing extended to contract patronage as well. In one case, O’Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712 (1996), a contract to do business for the city had been taken away from a trucking company whose owner supported the candidate opposing the incumbent mayor. The Court found that this was directly prohibited by Elrod.

In the other case, Board of County Commissioners of Wabaunsee County v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996), an exclusive trash-hauling contract had been terminated because the company’s owner had repeatedly and publicly criticized the county board. In other words, Umbehr was punished for speech, rather than for association with a particular party. The Supreme Court held that this case should be decided not under the Elrod line of cases, but instead under the Pickering balancing test (Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563, 1968) applied to speech by public employees, which is easier for employers to satisfy. Under that test, if a governmental employer’s interest in workplace discipline outweighs the employee’s interest in commenting on matters of public concern, the employee may be fired despite the impact upon his or her First Amendment rights.

The decision in Umbehr thus opened up a competing standard that may be applied to public employees exercising their First Amendment rights. As Justice Scalia commented in his dissenting opinion, this creates a confusing situation for courts and for potential litigants, who must distinguish between an employee's or contractor's exercise of the First Amendment rights of political association (which is protected for all but policymaking employees) and of free speech (which may be outweighed by the employer's need for workplace discipline).

The prohibition of political patronage was unpopular with political parties, and there is evidence that the practice has persisted in some areas of the country, including Chicago. As the dissenting justices in Elrod, Branti, and Rutan pointed out, patronage was a practice of long standing that had played a major role in the American political party system, especially in big cities. Yet patronage also resulted in excluding later arriving minority groups (African Americans and Latinos, for example) from the political process in many areas, as earlier groups (such as the Irish) were able to make government offices into their private preserve. Awarding contracts or hiring friends in return for money or political favors often leads to corruption, inefficiency, and unduly costly government as well. Finally, and most important, political patronage impairs the functioning of the electoral process by discouraging political opposition and criticism of the party in power, reducing the electoral chances of opposition candidates, and entrenching the party in power—abuses the guarantees of the First Amendment were designed to prevent.

CYNTHIA GRANT BOWMAN

References and Further Reading

- Bowman, Cynthia Grant. "The Supreme Court's Patronage Decisions and the Theory and Practice of Politics." In The U.S. Supreme Court and the Electoral Process, David K. Ryden, ed. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 2000, 124–141.
- Royko, Mike. Boss: Richard J. Daley of Chicago. New York: Dutton, 1971.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of County Commissioners of Wabunsee County v. Umbehr*, 518 U.S. 668 (1996)
- Branti v. Finkel*, 445 U.S. 507 (1980)
- Elrod v. Burns*, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)
- O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake*, 518 U.S. 712 (1996)
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
- Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois*, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

See also Branti v. Finkel, 445 U.S. 507 (1980); Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976); Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990); Speech of Government Employees; Unconstitutional Conditions

POLITICS AND MONEY

The relationship of money to politics has always been conceded and so, too, the effect on speech of restricting political money. The relationship became a source of active contention when, in the latter half of the last century, the Congress enacted comprehensive campaign finance controls to address corruption or its appearance. Many states rapidly followed suit. Those restrictions included strict limits on contributions to candidates and on spending by political parties. Long-standing prohibitions on union and corporate spending were strengthened, and public disclosure requirements were tightened and extended.

The Supreme Court subsequently heard a number of claims that this expansive regulation of political money undermined the right to speech and association. In Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976), the Court held that some limits, such as limits on how much of their own money candidates could spend, indeed infringed on those rights. The Court distinguished for constitutional purposes between "contributions" to candidates—which it termed "speech by proxy" and hence entitled to lesser constitutional protection—and more fully protected "expenditures."

Congress has since enacted additional restrictions, including restrictions on "soft money"—certain monies raised and spent by parties for general party activities. When this law was challenged, the Supreme Court in McConnell v. FEC, 124 S.Ct. 619 (2003), appeared to adopt a more permissive test for regulation than the one favored by the Buckley Court. By 2003, when this case was decided, the law had perceptibly shifted in favor of those who would strike the balance between political regulation and speech more in favor of the former.

ROBERT F. BAUER

References and Further Reading

- Drew, Elizabeth. Politics and Money. 1983.
- Hasen, Richard L. Supreme Court and Election Law: Judging Equality from Baker v. Carr to Bush v. Gore. 2003.
- Redish, Martin H. Money Talks: Speech, Economic Power and the Values of Democracy. 2001.
- Sorauf, Frank J. Inside Campaign Finance: Myths and Realities. 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)
McConnell v. FEC, 124 S.Ct. 619 (2003)

POPE v. ILLINOIS, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)

The three-part test for judging if sexually explicit material is obscene as enunciated in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), required an assessment of “whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value.” Pope v. Illinois posed the question of whether judges could instruct juries to use community standards when they decided this “value question.”

Two employees of an adult bookstore were separately charged of the offense of “obscenity” under Illinois law after they sold magazines to police detectives. At their trials, the judges instructed the juries to determine the value of the magazines based on how they thought “ordinary adults in the whole State of Illinois” would view them. The defendants argued Miller’s value question should be judged “solely on an objective basis,” which the trial courts and state appellate courts rejected.

The Supreme Court, voting six to three, vacated Pope’s conviction and remanded the case to the state courts for reconsideration. Justice White’s majority opinion was joined by Justices Rehnquist, Powell, O’Connor, Scalia (who wrote a concurring opinion), and Blackmun, who concurred in part and dissented in part. Justice Brennan dissented, as well as Justice Stevens whose dissent was joined by Justices Brennan, Marshall, and Blackmun.

Justice White flatly declared, “There is no suggestion in our cases that the question of the value of an allegedly obscene work is to be determined by reference to community standards. Indeed, our cases are to the contrary.” The justice stressed that the majority opinion in Miller was “careful to point out” that the First Amendment protects works of serious value “regardless of whether the government or a majority of the people approve of the ideas these works represent.” The value of such work, moreover, does not vary from community to community according to whether or to what degree the work wins public acceptance.

Justice White concluded that the “proper inquiry,” contrary to the approach taken in Illinois, did not rest on how “ordinary members” of a particular community view the social value of an allegedly obscene work; rather it depended on whether a “reasonable person,” using by implication a national standard, found social value in the work taken as a whole. In a footnote, Justice White, trying to clarify his position, stated that “the mere fact ... only a minority of a population may believe a work has serious value does not mean the ‘reasonable person’ standard” would not be met.” The justice’s adoption of this legal fiction in effect followed Justice Brennan’s holding in Jacobellis v. Ohio, 503 U.S. 540 (1964), where he stated Roth’s (Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476, 1957) three elements had to be separately applied; the Illinois courts conflated Miller’s second and third elements by answering the value question according to community standards.

Justice Scalia agreed only with Justice White’s interpretation of the intent of the Miller test but quickly cast doubts on whether an objective assessment of literary or artistic value was possible and suggested the “fabled ‘reasonable man’” will be of “little help” in the inquiry. Justice Brennan’s dissent restated his view that criminalizing the sale of obscene materials to consenting adults is unconstitutional. Justice Stevens’ lengthy dissent critiqued Justice White’s incorporation of the “reasonable person” into the Miller test. He stressed in particular the improbability that this legal fiction would produce a consensus on obscenity that had eluded the justices’ best efforts or allow purveyors of pornography like Pope to know when a magazine or other material crossed the legal threshold and became obscene and thus when they were violating the law.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
 Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook With Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Jacobellis v. State of Ohio, 503 U.S. 540 (1964)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
Pope v. Illinois, 481 U.S. 497 (1987)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

POSADAS DE PUERTO RICO ASSOCIATION v. TOURISM
 COMPANY OF PUERTO RICO, 478
 U.S. 328 (1986)

In Posadas, a key commercial speech case, the Court confronted the question of whether Puerto Rico could limit the scope of advertising by casinos so as to shield residents from the advertising. The operator of a casino sought a declaratory judgment that the regulations governing casino advertising violated the First Amendment. Although prior to Posadas the Court had tended to construe the regulatory power relatively favorably to commercial speakers and thus to protect most truthful speech against governmental interference, in Posadas the Court found the state's purpose rational and its limitations were largely upheld. Justice Rehnquist also suggested a controversial justification. He noted that because Puerto Rico could undoubtedly have banned casino gambling altogether, it seemed axiomatic that it could regulate advertising of gambling under the theory that the greater power to ban must include the lesser power to regulate.

Some observers initially thought the decision heralded the emergence of a "vice exception"—that is, a willingness to accept more paternalistic speech restrictions when the subjects of regulation were items that had always been subject to stricter regulatory control such as alcohol and gambling. However, this speculation was ended in the Court's later repudiation, in the 44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island (517 U.S. 484, 1996) case, of some of the reasoning in Posadas. In 44 Liquormart the majority characterized the First Amendment analysis in Posadas as "erroneously performed." The 44 Liquormart opinion is generally regarded as a shift from greater deference to regulatory efforts to more protection for commercial speech.

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

- Epstein, Richard A., Foreword: Unconstitutional Conditions, State Power, and the Limits of Consent, Harvard Law Review 102 (1988): 5.
- Langvardt, Arlen W., and Eric L. Richards, The Death of Posadas and the Birth of Change in Commercial Speech Doctrine: Implications of 44 Liquormart, American Business Law Journal 34 (1997): 483.
- Vladeck, David C., Lessons From A Story Untold: Nike v. Kasky Reconsidered, Case Western Reserve Law Review 54 (2004): 1049.

Cases and Statutes Cited

44 Liquormart v. Rhode Island, 517 U.S. 484 (1996)

POWELL v. ALABAMA, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)

It was not until 1963, in the seminal case of Gideon v. Wainwright, that the Supreme Court finally decided that indigent criminal defendants in state courts had the constitutional right under the Sixth Amendment to have counsel appointed for their defense. But, as far back as 1932, in Powell v. Alabama, the Court decided, under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution, that counsel must be appointed for indigent defendants in capital cases and that such counsel had to provide "effective" assistance.

The Powell decision involved the criminal trial of the so-called "Scottsboro Boys," a prosecution of seven poor, illiterate, black teenagers accused of the gang rape of two teenage white girls on a freight train on its way through Alabama on March 25, 1931. Despite the existence of an Alabama state statute requiring the appointment of counsel in capital cases, no defense counsel was actually appointed for any of the defendants until the morning of trial; then, without any investigation on their behalf and only six days after their indictment, their trials began. Each of these trials was completed within a day, and each resulted in a death sentence for each defendant. In a setting rife with heated racial animosity, as the Court observed, "the proceedings, from beginning to end, took place in an atmosphere of tense, hostile, and excited public sentiment."

A majority of the Court, in an opinion authored by Justice Sutherland, concluded that the denial of counsel in these circumstances violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Although the Sixth Amendment had not yet been selectively incorporated to apply to the states as it would later be in Gideon, the Court held:

[W]here the defendant is unable to employ counsel, and is incapable adequately of making his own defense because of ignorance, feeble-mindedness, illiteracy, or the like, it is the duty of the court, whether requested or not, to assign counsel for him as a necessary requisite of due process of law; and that duty is not discharged by an assignment at such a time or under such circumstances as to preclude the giving of effective aid in the preparation and trial of the case.... The prompt disposition of criminal cases is to be commended and encouraged, ... [b]ut, in reaching that result a defendant, charged with a serious crime, must not be stripped of his right to have sufficient time to advise with counsel and prepare his defense. To do that is not to proceed promptly in the calm spirit of regulated justice but to go forward with the haste of the mob.

In addition to the subsequent application of the Sixth Amendment's "right to counsel" clause to the states in 1963, the Supreme Court also expanded in a 1984 decision, Strickland v. Washington, 466 U.S. 668 (1984), upon the meaning of the requisite "effective" assistance of counsel language used in Powell. In Strickland, the Court concluded that a criminal defendant is denied effective assistance of counsel under the Sixth Amendment when he demonstrates that his or her counsel's performance was deficient in that it fell below an objective standard of reasonableness, and that such deficiency prejudiced the defendant by creating a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different.

JOHN M. BURKOFF

See also Betts v. Brady*, 316 U.S. 455 (1942); Due Process; Fourteenth Amendment; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Ineffective Assistance of Counsel; Race and Criminal Justice; Right to Counsel; Scottsboro Trials

POWELL v. TEXAS, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)

Leroy Powell was arrested for, charged with, and convicted of "intoxication in a public place" in violation of Texas law. Powell appealed the conviction claiming that he suffered from the disease "chronic alcoholism," which did not allow him control over his drinking and that to charge him for public drunkenness would be cruel and unusual punishment. The trial judge held that "chronic alcoholism" was not a defense and affirmed the conviction.

The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the state court's decision, holding that since there was little consensus within the medical field that "chronic alcoholism" was a disease that rendered an individual unaccountable for his behavior, it would be improper for the Court to make this determination. The Court also refused to create a constitutional "chronic alcoholism" defense, saying that to do so would interfere in an area generally considered within the power of states to decide. Finally, the Court differentiated between punishment that targets a mere status such as being a chronic alcoholic and punishment that targets behavior that society deems inappropriate such as being drunk in public. Under this analysis and in light of that fact that there was no viable alternative to treatment of public drunkenness at the time, the Court found that the Texas statute, which punished Powell for being drunk in public, was not cruel and unusual punishment.

MARCEL GREEN

References and Further Reading

Loewy, Arnold H. Criminal Law in a Nutshell. St. Paul, MN: West, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Texas Penal Code, Art. 477 (1952)

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Due Process

POWELL, LEWIS FRANKLIN, JR. (1907–1998)

Lewis Powell, a very successful lawyer in Richmond, Virginia, had no desire to go on to the U.S. Supreme Court, especially at age 64, but he finally gave in to the entreaties of the Nixon administration, and the Senate quickly confirmed the nomination by a vote of eighty-nine to one. Powell served fifteen years and when he retired declared it the saddest day of his life. He had easily adapted to the role of justice, and during most of his tenure provided the swing vote in numerous five-to-four decisions.

Prior to joining the Court Powell had been involved in Virginia school affairs in Richmond and on the state level. During the days of massive resistance to the Court's decision in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954), Powell had worked quietly but effectively to keep the schools open in the city and in most of the state. Although the snail's pace of desegregation did not satisfy leaders of the black community, they came to admire Powell and at his confirmation hearings testified to his integrity, his ability to reach across racial lines, and his concern for the common people.

Once on the Court, Justice Powell continued to show these concerns. According to one scholar, [Powell's] jurisprudence was governed to a considerable degree, indeed a decisive one, by his strivings for fairness, compassion, equity, and an adherence to his perception of genuine societal consensus. Lewis Powell quickly came to be regarded as the conscience of the Court on such emotion-charged issues as race and gender, as well as the omnipresent contentious questions of religion, suffrage, and criminal justice.

It is impossible to label Justice Powell a judicial liberal or a judicial conservative. He voted occasionally with the liberal bloc headed by Justice William Brennan, and just as often with the conservatives led by William Rehnquist. He refused to put a label on his jurisprudence, but a key is the fact that his judicial hero was the second John Marshall Harlan. Powell had known him and believed in the same cautious, case-by-case evaluation; like Justice Harlan, Justice Powell was a centrist, moderately conservative, and historically conscious. As Justice Sandra Day O'Connor, who joined him in the center, said upon his retirement, "at times he may have been willing to sacrifice a little consistency in order to reach for justice in a particular case."

Justice Powell's most famous opinion—indicative of his entire approach—was in Regents of the University of California v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265 (1978). Joined by the four conservative members of the Court, he held that racial quotas in affirmative action programs could never meet constitutional scrutiny. Then, joined by the four liberal justices, he ruled that race could be a consideration in college admission programs. Although often derided as a Jesuitical opinion that split hairs and evaded the real issue, over time the wisdom of the justice's cautious approach came to be more widely appreciated, and the Court reconfirmed Powell's position in Grutter v. Bollinger (539 U.S. 306, 2003).

While Justice Powell usually voted in favor of giving women equal rights, he was not willing to give Justice Brennan a fifth vote in Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973), to make gender a suspect classification along with race. Rather, reflecting his cautious views on the matter, he went along with giving gender classifications an "increased" rather than a "strict" scrutiny standard. In another five-to-four decision in which his was the key vote, Justice Powell refused to recognize privacy rights for homosexuals in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986). After his retirement he told an interviewer that he regretted the vote he had cast in that case and would now have voted differently. In 2003, the Supreme Court reversed Bowers in Lawrence v. Texas, U.S. 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003).

In civil liberties, Justice Powell's greatest influence lay in First Amendment cases involving the religion clauses. As a proud son of Virginia, he believed fervently in Thomas Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom (1786). Although he was not an absolutist, there had to be very good reason provided to him before he would violate the idea of a strict wall of separation between church and state. In the thirty establishment clause cases decided during his tenure, Justice Powell was on the winning side in all of them. In nineteen, the Court found that various state actions violated the clause, and in the rest the Court supported what the state had done.

Unlike his more conservative brethren on the Court, Justice Powell found Chief Justice Burger's three-pronged test in Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971), to be a perfect measure for evaluating potential violations of the establishment clause. To him it made perfectly good sense to ask whether the challenged law had a secular legislative purpose; whether its primary purposes would neither advance nor inhibit religion; and whether it did not foster an excessive entanglement between religion and the government. The Lemon test allowed him in Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1973), to support a Minnesota law allowing tax deductions to parents of all elementary and secondary schoolchildren, whether in public or parochial schools, for legitimate educational expenses such as secular textbooks, tuition, and instructional materials. On the other hand, his was the key vote in striking down a Grand Rapids, Michigan, law that authorized state payments for personnel, supplies, and materials to forty religious schools (Grand Rapids School District v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373, 1985), since here the money could potentially underwrite religious activities.

While the justice joined a highly criticized opinion by Chief Justice Burger upholding the constitutionality of a city-government-sponsored display of a crèche in a Christmas display in a public park (Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668, 1984), he fully agreed with the majority in Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987), that Louisiana's "balanced treatment" law requiring the teaching of "creationism" along with evolution in the public schools violated the First Amendment. In a concurring opinion Justice Powell elaborated eloquently on the work of Jefferson and James Madison to secure religious freedom and a ban on any form of religious establishment.

Because of his prior experience as a member of the city and state school boards in Richmond, Justice Powell played a key role in the various education cases that came before the Court in the 1970s and 1980s. Aside from those involving aid to religious schools, there were cases on finance and local control that the Court addressed. Here, the justice's basic conservatism and his respect for localism determined his vote, and in nearly all cases he wanted to know whether the action under consideration furthered the education of children. Education cases well reflect Justice Powell's careful, case-by-case manner and his effort to weigh all of the competing constitutional interests.

The most important decision he wrote in this area is San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973). Latino parents in San Antonio challenged how Texas funded its public schools, mainly through local property taxes. As a result the funds available for instruction, buildings and maintenance, and supplies were far greater on a per-pupil basis in the rich districts than in poorer areas. The plaintiffs claimed that Texas violated the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause in that their children did not receive an education of the same quality as did those living in wealthier districts.

Justice Powell wrote for a five-to-four majority that refused to add poverty to the list of suspect classification covered by equal protection. While admitting that education played an important role in contemporary society, he found no evidence that it constituted a basic right protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. States could, as Texas had done, establish minimum funding requirements and then provide state aid to bring the poorest districts up to that level; but it had no obligation to raise those districts to the funding level of richer districts or force the wealthier districts to cut back on the amount they spent. Education had always been a state matter and, aside from overt constitutional violations such as racial segregation or the imposition of religious activities, control of education should remain in state and local hands.

This view also informed the justice's vote in other education cases. He wrote a strong dissent in Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. (1982), in which the majority, led by Justice O'Connor, ordered what had been primarily a women's school of nursing to admit a male student and to end its policy of gender segregation. The decision, based on the Civil Rights Act of 1964, offended Powell in several ways. He believed that the law allowed traditional single-sex schools to remain as such. He wrote in praise of the educational benefits found in single-sex schools, but above all, he believed that as long as an alternative existed for male nursing students, then the state should decide whether it wanted to continue a single-sex school. Neither the Constitution nor the civil rights law required that principles of federalism in the control of education be overridden.

Justice Powell's belief in local control led him to leave disciplinary matters in the hands of local school authorities (Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651, 1977) and also to determine what books should or should not be in a school library (Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853, 1982). Nonetheless, perhaps an example of what Justice O'Connor termed his sacrificing of consistency for the sake of justice, is his vote in the rather remarkable case of Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982). There he concurred with Justice Brennan upholding the right of minor children of undocumented aliens to receive a free public school education. But in his concurrence the justice re-emphasized his views in Rodriguez—namely, that education was not a fundamental right. Instead he spoke to the practical concerns of the issue and the profound consequences of denying educational opportunity to thousands of children who, in all likelihood, would grow up and continue to live in the United States.

In criminal justice, Justice Powell also adopted a balancing approach. He often took a "tough" stance in favor of the police forces and believed that the Bill of Rights did not require the nation to sacrifice public safety. He therefore opposed what he considered excessive multiple habeas corpus appeals in Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976); Wolff v. Rice, 428 U.S. 465 (1976); and United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433 (1976). While he believed strongly in procedural fairness, he also felt that constitutional safeguards had to be interpreted in a common-sense manner and thus joined his vote to create the "good faith" limitations on the exclusionary rule in United States v. Leon, 468

U.S. 897 (1984), and Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984).

Although he was an opponent of the death penalty, Justice Powell's jurisprudence required deference to legislative policy-making absent any clear constitutional prohibition. He was one of the four dissenters in Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972), which outlawed capital punishment as then applied. In his dissent he attacked the majority for what he termed their flagrant disregard of the "root principles" of precedent, judicial restraint, separation of powers, and federalism. When every state that had the death penalty revised its statutes to conform to the Furman decision, Justice Powell, in the lead opinion for the seven-to-two majority in Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976), upheld the right of the legislatures to impose capital punishment as long as they adhered to due process of the law.

In the 1979 case of Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979), a split Court rejected a newspaper publisher's challenge to a court order closing the courtroom to the press during a trial. Although concurring in the result, Justice Powell wrote separately to examine the First Amendment implications and suggested that in order to ensure a fair trial, courts ought to find other means than barring the press. The absence of the press, he believed, undermined the public's confidence in the fairness of the criminal justice system. The following year, seven members of the Court adopted his view in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980), and held that while a defendant was entitled to a fair trial, the public also had a right, as exercised through the press, to witness the trial and judge its fairness for themselves.

Justice Powell's fifteen years on the bench created what had long been absent on the Court: an influential center. He more often than not was the key vote in five-to-four decisions and was rarely on the losing side. In Bakke he constituted the middle by himself. By the time he retired, Sandra Day O'Connor stood poised to take over that role, and she was soon joined by others. Justice Powell's case-by-case analysis and his balancing of facts and interests do not provide the stuff of a consistent jurisprudence. But in terms of civil liberties, they allowed him on more than one occasion to choose justice over doctrinal consistency.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

- Gunther, Gerald, A Tribute to Lewis F. Powell, Jr., Harvard Law Review 101 (1987): 409.
- Jeffries, John Calvin, Justice Lewis F. Powell, Jr.: A Biography. New York: Scribner's, 1994.
- Wilkinson, J. Harvie, III, Serving Justice: A Clerk's View. New York: Charterhouse, 1974.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Board of Education v. Pico, 457 U.S. 853 (1982)
Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
Frontiero v. Richardson, 411 U.S. 677 (1973)
Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
Gannett Co. v. DePasquale, 443 U.S. 368 (1979)
Grand Rapids School District v. Ball, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Ingraham v. Wright, 430 U.S. 651 (1977)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984)
Mississippi University for Women v. Hogan, 458 U.S. 718 (1982)
Mueller v. Allen, 463 U.S. 388 (1973)
Plyler v. Doe, 457 U.S. 202 (1982)
Regents of the University of California v. Bakke (1978)
Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
San Antonio School District v. Rodriguez, 411 U.S. 1 (1973)
Stone v. Powell, 428 U.S. 465 (1976)
United States v. Janis, 428 U.S. 433 (1976)
United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984)
Wolff v. Rice, 428 U.S. 465 (1976)

PRAYER IN PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Few issues have generated more intense feelings than prayer in public schools. Although it was once a common practice in many public schools, the Supreme Court in two landmark cases in the early 1960s held that state-sponsored prayer in public schools was unconstitutional. In a series of subsequent decisions the Court has continued to prohibit any government effort to promote prayer in public schools. This has included instances where students recite government composed prayers and also clergy-led prayers at graduation ceremonies and student-led prayer at athletic events. At the same time the Court has emphasized that truly voluntary student prayer in schools is constitutionally permissible and, in some circumstances, even protected speech. This distinction between voluntary student prayer on the one hand and state-sponsored prayer on the other is the central consideration in analyzing school prayer cases and best balances the competing constitutional concerns that are present.

The debate over prayer in public school long preceded the Supreme Court's involvement with the issue. As originally envisioned in the mid-nineteenth century, public education in America was to be "non-sectarian," although it was commonly understood that Bible readings could be used as the basis of a common morality. In reality, however, many schools went beyond this, often incorporating a distinctly Protestant piety in the classroom, especially in the post-Civil War years. At times this included Bible readings, devotional exercises, and prayer.

Almost twenty states in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries took the issue a step further, passing laws that mandated prayer and Bible readings in public schools. Most of these laws went unchallenged, but lawsuits were initiated in several states, with state courts splitting as to the constitutionality of such laws. More generally, the issue of prayer in public schools, whether mandated by law or not, continued to be a volatile one throughout the first half of the twentieth century, with a number of state courts eventually addressing the issue. Although most courts held the practices constitutional, a substantial minority of lower court decisions struck them down as contrary to our freedoms and constitutional order.

The Early Supreme Court Decisions

The Supreme Court first addressed and struck down school prayer as unconstitutional in two landmark cases in the early 1960's: Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962), and Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963). In Engel the Court reviewed a school board policy requiring that a prayer, adopted by the New York State Board of Regents, be said aloud by each class at the start of the school day. In finding that this practice violated the establishment clause, the Court primarily focused on the fact that students were required to recite a government-composed prayer. The Court stated that, at a minimum, the establishment clause means that "it is no part of the business of government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as part of a religious program carried on by government."

The Court noted that the practice of government-composed prayers by the Church of England was a major impetus for early colonists to come to this country. Thus, according to the Court, the First Amendment was in part designed to prohibit government from using its power "to control, support or influence the kinds of prayer the American people can say."

Significantly, the Court did not rest its holding on the coercive effect such prayers would have on students. It acknowledged that even when students were asked to be excused there might be a significant indirect coercion to conform to the officially approved religion, but the Court emphasized that the establishment clause went much further than prohibiting coercive activities. Unlike the free exercise clause, which the Court suggested requires a showing of government coercion, the establishment clause is violated by establishing an official religion, whether or not it coerces nonobserving individuals. Thus, even though the Court acknowledged that indirect coercion might have existed in Engel, it rested its decision on the official establishment of religion through prescribed prayer.

In Schempp, decided one year after Engel, the Court again struck down a religious exercise in a public school, this time involving a Bible reading over a school intercom followed by recitation of the Lord's Prayer by students in their classrooms. The Court began its analysis by stating that the government must be neutral toward religion, requiring that government actions have a secular purpose and "a primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion." The religious exercise before the Court clearly failed that test, since it appeared designed to promote religion and the state sponsorship of such activities clearly advanced religion. Moreover, the exercises violated the neutrality principle emphasized by the Court throughout the opinion since the state was actively involved in promoting religion.

The Court's Continuing Resolve

Engel and Schempp established that state-sponsored prayer in public schools is unconstitutional, at least when it involved a state-promoted and prescribed prayer on a daily basis. It would be more than two decades before the Court again addressed the question of school prayer, leaving some uncertainty of the scope of the earlier decisions. When the Court finally addressed the issue again, in a series of cases beginning in 1985, it left no doubt that the constitutional prohibition applied to all state-promoted efforts at prayer, no matter how minor they might appear to some. At the same time, however, the Court clarified that voluntary student prayer in schools was permissible and, in some circumstances, even constitutionally protected.

The first of these cases, Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985), involved an Alabama statute that required a minute of silence in public elementary and secondary schools for the purpose of "meditation or voluntary prayer." Even though the statute avoided some of the more coercive features found in Engel and Schempp, the Court said it violated the establishment clause. The Court stated that to be constitutional, the statute must have a secular purpose according to Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971). The Alabama statute, however, was clearly designed to promote prayer, which the constitution prohibits the state from doing in schools. The legislative record lacked any purpose other than promoting prayer, a fact acknowledged in the legislative record by the bill's sponsor. In addition, a prior Alabama statute already required a minute at the start of the school day for meditation; the only difference between the two statutes was the added words "or voluntary prayer" in the statute reviewed in Wallace. The Court concluded that adding these words served no purpose other than "to convey a message of state approval of prayer," which the Constitution does not permit.

Wallace made clear that the state could not promote school prayer in any manner, even when it left the content entirely up to the individual student. It is important to emphasize, however, that Wallace did not declare all moment of silence statutes unconstitutional, but only those designed for no other purpose than to promote prayer. The Court approvingly spoke of the earlier statute permitting truly voluntary prayer during a moment of silence. Moreover, in concurring opinions Justices Powell and O'Connor explicitly stated that moment of silence statutes can be constitutional, even if individual students use them to pray. Such a position makes sense, since the statute is not promoting prayer as such, but a moment of silence, which might serve several secular purposes. Moreover, the choice to pray as well as the content of the prayer would belong solely to the student.

The Court's next school prayer decision, Board of Education of Westside Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1991), presented a scenario quite distinct from the earlier cases. In Mergens a student religious club sought permission to meet in a high school for the stated purpose of fellowship, Bible study, and prayer. Although a number of other student clubs were allowed to meet, the school denied access to the religious club because of establishment clause concerns. The Supreme Court held for the students, stating that when a school creates a forum for student speech, which it did when it allowed other clubs to meet, it cannot deny a group based on the religious content of the speech. Importantly, it also held that the establishment clause is not violated when a school permits a religious club to meet as part of a broader forum, since religion is being treated neutrally compared to other speech. Moreover, any decision to engage in prayer in such an instance would be initiated by students, rather than the school, and is therefore permissible.

Mergens is an important decision because it clarifies the distinction between government-promoted prayer, which is always unconstitutional, and student-initiated prayer, which is permissible and at times protected. As stated in Justice O'Connor's plurality opinion, "there is a crucial difference between government speech endorsing religion, which the establishment clause forbids, and private speech endorsing religion, which the free speech and the free exercise clauses protect.” This does not mean that students can pray whenever and wherever they want, since their speech rights are subject to reasonable controls to protect the school’s educational mission. Yet, the Court indicated that when other student speech is allowed, religious speech, including prayer, must be accommodated.

The two most recent school prayer cases, Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992), and Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000), involve more conventional fact patterns and demonstrate the Court’s resolve in finding any state-promoted prayer in public schools unconstitutional. In Lee the Court reviewed a school’s decision to have a rabbi deliver a prayer at a middle-school graduation. The Court held this was unconstitutional, stating that the prayer was a state-sponsored religious exercise that was coercive on those attending the ceremony. They began their analysis by finding that the prayer, though delivered by a private clergyman, could be attributed to the state in three ways: the school principal made the decision to include a prayer, the principal decided who would pray, and principal gave the rabbi a pamphlet containing guidelines for graduation prayers. Thus, unlike the situation in Mergens, this was a state-initiated rather than private prayer.

Second, the Court emphasized the coercive nature of the prayer, which pressured students to participate. After noting the heightened concerns that subtle coercive pressure presents in public elementary and secondary schools, the Court stated that the school’s extensive involvement in the ceremony put substantial pressure on students to engage in actions, such as standing during the prayer, that the students would consider participation. Although this pressure was indirect, since no one was required to stand, it was nonetheless real and substantial. Moreover, the fact that graduation ceremonies were not compulsory did little to address the problem of coercion since high school graduations play a uniquely important role in our society and cannot truly be considered voluntary. Thus, the Court concluded that the graduation prayers in this case constituted substantial, albeit indirect, coercion of dissenting students that violated the basic tenets of the establishment clause.

The Court’s most recent school prayer case, Santa Fe, involved a challenge to a school district policy governing prayer at football games. The policy, which was an attempt to shift the decision on whether to pray from school officials to students, provided for a bifurcated student election on prayer. Students would first vote by secret ballot on whether to have a prayer at games, and if the students chose to have a prayer, a second election was held to elect a student to pray. Pursuant to this policy the students elected to have a prayer at games and chose a student to deliver the prayer.

The Supreme Court held this policy violated the establishment clause, applying the same two-part coercion analysis used in Lee. The Court began by holding that the prayer was attributable to the state, notwithstanding the school’s argument that the election acted as a “circuit breaker” cutting off state involvement. The Court noted that even posing the question to students promoted prayer, since it initiated a process that, in all likelihood, would result in prayer. This involvement was reinforced by the prayer being delivered at a school function using the school’s public address system, which fostered perceptions of the state’s sponsorship. The Court then discussed the prayer’s coercive effect on students, reiterating the concerns voiced in Lee. It rejected the idea that attendance at football was a truly voluntary activity, noting the important role it played in high school, and stated that the state cannot take advantage of social pressure to coerce those in attendance to participate in what amounted to a state-promoted prayer.

Why the Prayer Decisions Make Sense

Santa Fe demonstrates the Court’s continuing commitment to prohibit any type of state-promoted prayer in public schools, even in what might be considered more subtle forms. This resolve makes sense because the issue of school prayer reflects the intersection of two highly compelling concerns: the avoidance of state-created religious orthodoxy and the particularly impressionable status of public school children. The first of these concerns is that the state has no business promoting prayer because of the threat it poses to religious freedom, a proposition that is historically sound and eminently sensible. Despite the uncertainty surrounding the religious clauses, one very clear purpose was to preserve religious freedom and avoid any state-approved orthodoxy in religious matters. Yet, to tell people how to pray or even whether to pray creates a form of government orthodoxy in an area central to religious expression. There is perhaps no more personal aspect to religion than prayer, and to many it is closely related to the act of worship. Government involvement with prayer is therefore government involvement with a core religious practice.

The danger of state-created religious orthodoxy is present even when prayer and worship are not compelled, but only promoted by the state in a voluntary setting. The state is still trying to direct and influence core religious practices. This is a form of state orthodoxy—the state is putting its stamp of approval on a particular belief as correct and is trying to influence its citizens in that regard. This path is constitutionally and historically a very dangerous one to follow since, as innocent as it may appear, it might well lead to substantial infringement of religious liberty at some point. This concern was at the heart of the Court’s analysis in Engel and Schempp and was strongly affirmed in Lee.

For these reasons state involvement in prayer is a bad idea and raises concerns at the heart of the establishment clause. Yet what makes school prayer especially problematic is its intersection with children, who are particularly susceptible to the impacts of such state involvement. The impressionable and vulnerable nature of school children has often been noted by the Court, requiring that it be particularly sensitive to the coercive nature of school prayer activities. This includes the possibility that not only students will feel coerced to participate in religious activities, but also that children will easily perceive state endorsement of religion in such situations. Taken together, the dangers of state-created orthodoxy and the impressionable nature of school children have properly led the Court to be extremely vigilant in guarding against any state-promoted prayer in public schools.

At the same time, however, the Court has also emphasized that voluntary student prayer is constitutionally permissible. This is most apparent in Mergens, where the Court held that voluntary student prayer not only was constitutionally permissible, but also was constitutionally protected when a speech forum was created. But in other cases the Court has similarly drawn a distinction between state-promoted prayer, which is unconstitutional, and voluntary student prayer, which is permitted and might be protected. As stated by the Court in Santa Fe, “Thus, nothing in the Constitution as interpreted by this court prohibits any public school student from voluntarily praying at any time before, during, or after the school-day. But the religious liberty protected by the Constitution is abridged when the State affirmatively sponsors the particular religious practice of prayer.” This distinction between voluntary student prayer and state-promoted prayer is the central consideration in the school prayer cases and best balances the competing interests at stake.

MARK W. CORDES

References and Further Reading

Boston, Robert. Why the Religious Right Is Wrong About Separation of Church & State. Buffalo, NY: Prometheus Books, 1993.

Morgan, Richard E. The Supreme Court and Religion. New York: The Free Press, 1972.

Smith, Rodney K. Public Prayer and the Constitution. Wilmington, Del., 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
Board of Education of Westside Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)

Engel v. Vital, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)

Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)

Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

See also Abington Township School District v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963); Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990); Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962); Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992); Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe, 530 U.S. 290 (2000); Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

PREFERRED POSITION

The “preferred position” (aka “preferred freedoms”) doctrine is a judicially created interpretive rule that hierarchically ranks—prefers—some constitutional rights over others. While Chief Justice Stone first used the phrase, dissenting in Jones v. City of Opelika, 316 U.S. 584 (1942), and the rule received its widest application during Chief Justice Warren’s tenure (1953–1969), its antecedents are traceable to earlier twentieth century views.

Justice Holmes’s disparate approach to reviewing statutes foreshadowed the preferred position doctrine. Dissenting in Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905), Holmes argued that statutes regulating economic activities should be presumed constitutional so long as they have a rational basis. By contrast, dissenting in Abrams v. U.S., 250 U.S. 616 (1919), Justice Holmes contended that statutes regulating speech should not be presumed constitutional but be held to a stricter standard. Justice Cardozo articulated Justice Holmes’s approach as a hierarchy in Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937), distinguishing federal constitutional rights not enforceable (incorporated) against state statutes under the Fourteenth Amendment—because such rights are not “of the very essence of a scheme of ordered liberty”—from rights “so rooted in the traditions and conscience of our people as to be ranked as fundamental.”

Justice Stone penned the most often quoted statement of the doctrine in his footnote 4 to U.S. v. Carolene Products Co., 304 U.S. 144 (1938). Starting from Justice Holmes's Lochner presumption regarding "regulatory legislation affecting ordinary commercial transactions," Justice Stone famously continued: "There may be a narrower scope for operation of the presumptions of constitutionality when legislation appears on its face to be within a specific prohibition of the Constitution, such as those of the first ten Amendments ..."

The doctrine's critics claim that it results in an arbitrary standard, a double standard, or a shifting standard—in effect no standard at all.

JAMES C. FOSTER

References and Further Reading

- Currie, David P., The Constitution in the Supreme Court: The Preferred-Position Debate, 1941–1946, Catholic University Law Review 37 (Fall 1987): 39.
- Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.
- Mendelson, Wallace. Justices Black and Frankfurter: Conflict in the Court. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1961.

PREJEAN, SISTER HELEN (1939–)

Born on April 21, 1939, in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, Sister Helen Prejean joined the Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille in 1957. A Roman Catholic nun, writer, lecturer, and community organizer, Prejean has lived and worked in Louisiana all her life. She received her bachelor's degree in education and English at St. Mary's Dominion College in New Orleans in 1962. In 1973, she received her master's degree in religious education at St. Paul's University in Ottawa, Canada. She has dedicated her life to uplifting the poor of New Orleans.

As a Roman Catholic nun, Sister Prejean began ministering to prisoners in 1981. In 1983, she wrote a letter to an inmate on Louisiana's death row, and the man wrote back. Thus, while working at a St. Thomas housing project, she became pen pals with Elmo Patrick Sonnier, a convicted killer of two teenagers who was sentenced to die in the electric chair at Louisiana's Angola State Prison. Upon Sonnier's request, Prejean repeatedly visited him as a spiritual advisor. She turned her experience into the book, Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the United States. Her memoir was nominated for the 1993 Pulitzer Prize, spent thirty-one weeks as the New York Times number one bestseller, and was made into a film starring actress Susan Sarandon in the role of Sister Prejean.

While some victims' families launched letter-writing campaigns to the New Orleans Archdiocese to protest Prejean's public stance against the death penalty, Prejean received nominations for the Noble Peace Prize in 1998 and 1999. After her experience with Sonnier, she has continued to counsel inmates on death row as well as families of murder victims. She argues that the effect of capital punishment is as destructive upon those individuals who administer it as it is on those executed. She also stresses that it is a basic human right not to be tortured or killed by anyone, including the state.

Prejean grew up in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, in the 1940s and 1950s with her parents, a brother, and a sister, and was educated in a Catholic school. She came to Saint Thomas as part of a reform movement in the Catholic church seeking to integrate religious faith and social justice. In 1980, her religious community, the Sisters of St. Joseph of Medaille, committed to standing with the community of the poor. Prejean stated that she initially struggled with this recasting of her role in what she felt to be less the role of a nun and more the role of a social worker, but she soon became committed to the cause of social justice.

Prejean tells her account of prison mentorship in the memoir Dead Man Walking. While teaching high school dropouts in 1982, Chava Colon of the Prison Coalition in Louisiana asked Prejean to become a pen pal to a death row inmate. Prejean wrote to Elmo Patrick Sonnier on death row at the Louisiana State Penitentiary. In 1977, Sonnier and his younger brother abducted a teenage couple, raped the woman, and shot and killed both of them. In 1982, Prejean received permission from prison authorities to become Sonnier's spiritual advisor, and she then arranged for her first visit to death row. After the Fifth Circuit Court in New Orleans denied Sonnier's appeal in October 1983, Prejean called attorney Millard Farmer of Atlanta, who defends death-row inmates, to take Sonnier's case. Farmer and Prejean were with Sonnier when the state of Louisiana executed him just past midnight on the early morning of Wednesday, April 4, 1984.

Prejean argued that the state's death penalty made no one responsible for Sonnier's death, for anyone from the governor to the warden could argue they were just doing a job and thus did not see themselves as personally responsible. Prejean spoke widely on her experience of witnessing what she termed the premeditated execution of Sonnier on Louisiana's death row and officials' continual submersion of personal convictions for what many termed public service. Prejean argues that there are rights fundamental to humans, such as the right not to be tortured or killed, that everyone, including governments, should respect. She contends that the moral foundation of a society erodes if its government is allowed to treat what she sees as fundamental, nonnegotiable rights as a privilege to dispense based upon an individual's behavior. She supports the Universal Declaration of Human Rights adopted by the United Nations General Assembly, which argues for the right of every human not to be killed, tortured, or punished cruelly.

In response to criticism that Prejean did not reach out to the victims' families, she helped initiate a yearly mass for the victims of violent crime at the Catholic Diocesan Office in Lafayette, Louisiana. Prejean also contends that evidence that executions do not deter crime is conclusive, and she uses this point to continue her crusade against the death penalty. Following Sonnier's execution, Prejean worked with students at her ministry's Hope House to publish a newsletter and a book of residents' poetry. Prejean also conducted a training session for people interested in becoming spiritual advisors to death-row inmates.

Prejean argued that while public action is the first step, the task of informing people in schools, churches, and civil groups is the crux of agitating against the death penalty in America. She contends that the media and politicians distort the public perception of crime, that the execution of prisoners costs more than their life imprisonment, and, finally, that if a society believes murder is wrong and inadmissible in society, then it must be wrong for everyone, individuals and governments alike. Prejean focuses her concern on the poor and her desire to translate faith into social action. After the execution of Robert Willie, another death-row inmate for whom Prejean served as spiritual advisor following Sonnier, Prejean appeared in a nationally broadcast interview with Peter Jennings on ABC Evening News. Prejean continues to work giving lectures, serving as spiritual advisor to death-row inmates, conducting workshops, and organizing public demonstrations for the abolition of the death penalty.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Foley, Michael. Arbitrary and Capricious: The Supreme Court, the Constitution, and the Death Penalty. Westport, CT: Praeger, 2003.
- Prejean, Sister Helen. Dead Man Walking: An Eyewitness Account of the Death Penalty in the United States. New York: Random House, 1993.
- Steelwater, Eliza. The Hangman's Knot: Lynching, Legal Execution, and America's Struggle With the Death Penalty. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2003.

See also Capital Punishment; Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally

PRESS CLAUSE (I): FRAMING AND HISTORY FROM COLONIAL PERIOD UP TO EARLY NATIONAL PERIOD

The freedom of the press enjoyed by American citizens is instituted in the First Amendment's declaration that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom ... of the press." This pronouncement had its origin in previous American theory and practice, which in turn drew on earlier English roots. In all cases, the freedom was understood to include limits on what could be published, but over time political struggles and philosophical developments decreased many of the limits on political expression. Laws against certain verbal crimes, such as conspiracy, obscenity, and threats, were generally accepted as legitimate and were rarely challenged or even discussed.

The printing press was introduced in England during the fifteenth century and by 1538 Henry VIII instituted the first comprehensive royal licensing system. Licensing required that all printed works receive prior approval from a government censor before publication would be considered legal. For decades this licensing system was effective, if imperfect. Black-market printing occurred (a third of sixteenth-century books went unlicensed) and importation for politics and profit was also a problem for Crown authorities. But for most sixteenth-century Englishmen, the idea that subjects should have the privilege of publishing their sentiments was seen as dangerous. Nevertheless, by 1600, members in Parliament, at least, had freedom of speech, though debates would sometimes erupt over whether this allowed them to discuss certain topics, such as the royal succession. In any event, printing these debates was still illegal and rare.

The political turmoil of the 1640s and especially the English Civil War (1642–1651), left the king and Parliament unable to regulate the press. As a result, political and religious radicals found the press available to them and pamphlet literature exploded, increasing almost one hundred times over from 1640 to 1642. This practical freedom would continue throughout the decade, despite repeated attempts by Parliament to reestablish control.

The prevailing assumption of most Britons was that the liberty of the press led to division and disorder. The printed controversies and bloody violence of the English civil war only reinforced this view. Radical thinkers argued, to the contrary, that liberty of the press would allow the truth—the one truth, God's truth—to prevail and that this truth would unite the country. Radicals like John Lilburne also claimed that if Parliament could speak freely, the people should be able to print freely.

The return of order and ultimately the restoration of the Crown brought the return of moderately effective licensing laws. When these laws expired in 1694 they were not renewed, largely due to practical concerns, including the expanding market for imported publications. Most people still feared the power of the press to bring disorder; accordingly, the government continued to assert the authority to punish authors and printers after publication for dangerous or provocative printed matter that challenged the political or religious order.

The end of prior censorship in England, however, did not change the law for its colonies in America. Colonial governors would traditionally receive the same “instructions” from the king, requiring that they or their appointed censors approve and license all printed matter before it was published. Colonial governors were usually willing to comply because they were also suspicious of press liberty. After the arrival of North America’s first printing press in 1638, governors of Massachusetts Bay saw to it that the press was adequately supervised, feeling it was their duty to God to punish pernicious authors. Punishments then included “bodily correction,” such as whipping, tongue-boring, or ear-cropping.

The paramount reason for this sort of control of expression was that the state had to be preserved, and this in turn required keeping the peace as well as maintaining social, political, and moral institutions. Also, in the small, cohesive communities of early America, the good reputation of any individual, public or private, was critical to his practical ability to interact with anyone in that community. Nevertheless, during the seventeenth and into the eighteenth centuries, enforcement was increasingly more lenient than the statutes suggested.

By the 1720s, the royal instructions requiring prior licensing were being ignored; laws against blasphemy (language that offended religious orthodoxy) were rarely if ever enforced. Subsequent punishment for seditious libel (words that tended to threaten or undermine the authority of government) or breach of legislative privilege (words that offended a sitting legislature) were now the chief response to radical printers and authors. Even these punishments were confined to fines and imprisonment. The first newspaper in America had arrived in 1704 and by 1721 Boston, then the biggest and most developed town, had three newspapers. The entry of the third, the New-England Courant, brought a freer world of print. James Franklin, Benjamin’s older brother, and his radical friends actively took to criticizing the colonial government. James was fined, imprisoned and even banned from publishing a newspaper (at which point Benjamin became the nominal editor in addition to his continuing role as a secret contributor). The fact that this opposition newspaper continued in spite of punishments made it clear that governments would now have a much more difficult time restraining the press.

The philosophical justifications for these practical efforts to expand the liberty of the press largely came from colonial interpretations of British advocates of greater press liberty. While prior licensing was no longer seriously proposed, the nature and extent of subsequent punishment was hotly contested. The most influential source for radical arguments was Cato’s Letters, a series of essays written for publication in London newspapers by two Britons (John Trenchard and Thomas Gordon) who wrote under the pseudonym “Cato.” Cato argued that press liberty was a birthright of Englishmen and that it included the right to print one’s sentiments, leaving it to others to judge the merits. Drawing on the radicals of the English civil war, Cato maintained that the truth—for him, political as well as religious truth—would prevail. Accordingly, this individual right was also a public right because criticism of government would allow the political truth to emerge and thus to protect the public from a despotic government (a constant concern of the opposition theorists that colonial radicals chiefly followed). The New-England Courant and other opposition newspapers took to reprinting these essays—and other similar British and colonial essays—frequently.

One such newspaper was John Peter Zenger’s New-York Weekly Journal (1734). As in Boston, a controversy between political authorities and their critics led to a new, opposition newspaper and soon an expansion in the theory and practice of freedom of the press. From a strictly legal standpoint, Zenger did not have a leg to stand on: He admittedly had printed criticism of the governor and, under the usual British common-law understanding, any “reflections” on the government or its officers were illegal. The truth of the matter was at best immaterial and at worse an aggravation of the offense (since true critiques of government were even more likely to undermine its authority and thus had the “bad tendency” to bring a breach of peace).

Zenger’s attorneys, James Alexander and Andrew Hamilton, challenged this long-standing doctrine and maintained, following earlier theorists, that the truth ought to be allowed to prevail. Accordingly, the truth of the libel was central to the case, in their view. Since the jurymen were likely to believe in the truth of the criticisms of the unpopular governor, this argument greatly helped Zenger’s case. But traditional doctrine also held that a jury in a libel case could not issue a general verdict (guilty or not guilty of seditious libel) but rather a “special verdict” limited to the question of publication only (a point that Zenger’s counsel had conceded). Juries, however, had long had a powerful role as populist counterweight to the conservative authority of the rule of law. Zenger’s jury followed the defense’s pleadings and found Zenger not guilty. This bold action did not set a legitimate legal precedent, but it did solidify a new political culture of a broader free press; Zenger’s would be the last seditious libel trial to appear before a colonial jury.

The Pre-Revolutionary Crisis

As political life became more secular and more popular during the 1740s and 1750s, the public sphere of print expanded and the practice of press liberty was spread more widely. Over time, the popularly elected lower houses of the various colonial legislatures developed into defenders of the people’s liberty against the royal governor and his allies. This fit with the increasingly common opposition, or “Whig,” notion that the people’s liberty is always threatened by royal or ministerial power. But it raised a problem for freedom of the press: What if someone printed criticism of the popularly elected assemblymen?

On one view, this was simply freedom of the press, an individual’s right to voice his sentiments. But on another view, any criticism that undermined the people’s faith in the assembly was abusing one safeguard of the people’s liberty (a free press) to undermine another (the popular branch of the legislature). In keeping with this second logic, popular assemblies throughout the colonies reprimanded, fined, and even occasionally imprisoned their critics during the first half of the century. Though this tension in the theory of press liberty would not be completely resolved before the Revolution, the complexities involved made this a much less useful—and thus much less common—curb on freedom of the press during the 1750s and 1760s.

The Stamp Act (March 22, 1765) presented a simple and much more dire threat to freedom of the press. These taxes on paper goods of all sorts, combined with the difficulty of getting legally stamped paper, seemed a type of censorship particularly aimed at opposition newspapers (which were less able to pay since they were less likely to profit from government printing contracts). These and other new laws and actions seemed to reveal an unfolding conspiracy for arbitrary power on the part of the British ministry, the royal governors, and their “Tory” allies in the colonies. The people, led by outraged newspaper editors, condemned the Stamp Act and worked to subvert it. This controversy and others like it divided the people into two sides. Even with the news of the repeal of the Stamp Act in May 1766, relations failed to return to normal.

As the crisis deepened in the late 1760s and early 1770s, the press teamed with provocative newspaper articles and political pamphlets on both sides. Limits on the press were still debated, but neither the royalist Tories nor the opposition Patriots could gain enough power to control the press. Tories insisted that they defended an individual’s right to print his political views, even if some Patriots might see those printed views as royalist propaganda aimed at gaining the king’s ministers a complete tyranny over the colonists. Where would freedom of the press be then, the Patriots asked. No, they insisted, freedom of the press was properly used to protect the people’s liberty from an overreaching government, as it always had been. True, the Patriots conceded, the truth will prevail, but only if there is a fair fight. With Tories propagandizing their way to complete tyrannical power, all of the people’s liberties—including freedom of the press—were at risk. Rather than risk this, Patriots took to intimidating and even terrorizing Tory printers and authors.

With the commencement of open hostilities on April 19, 1775, the very real threat to the people’s liberties from ministerial forces became unmistakable. Both sides took to allowing only their partisans to print on their side of the war front. But during the war, within a given side, press freedom largely existed as Patriots, for example, debated whether to declare independence and then on what terms to conclude a peace.

The State Constitutions

The Revolution brought significant changes to American society. New, more radical leaders took power and average people entered into public life—and political debate—as they never had before. Members of the revolutionary committees became elected assemblymen and had to answer to the voters, which now usually included white men of all ranks of society. The people expected to have a greater say in the actions and policies of government officials, but the language of the press clauses of the new state constitutions drew on established themes.

The first press clause written in Revolutionary America is found in George Mason’s Declaration of Rights for Virginia (1776) and employs the traditional theory, drawn from Cato and others, that a free press is meant as the protector of the people’s liberty from tyrannical power: “The freedom of the Press is one of the greatest bulwarks of liberty, and can never be restrained but by despotick Governments.” Pennsylvania’s radical constitution (1776) was more specific, insisting that the “printing presses shall be free to every person who undertakes to examine the proceedings of the legislature, or any part of government.” But the early constitutions also voiced the long-standing view that freedom of the press was simply a basic, individual right to print what one pleased. Pennsylvania’s constitution also declared that “the people have a right to freedom of speech, and of writing, and publishing their sentiments; therefore the freedom of the press ought not to be restrained.”

Having just started a war to rid themselves of what they took to be a tyrannical power, the former colonists were careful to emphasize that the people, not a king or even the legislatures, were sovereign. The notion that “the people” were the ultimate source of political power and authority had roots in the English civil war and was a staple of radical theory. But as this idea of popular sovereignty became more widespread in the Revolutionary era, it took on a new cast. Public officials were now “servants” and the people their “masters.” More importantly, one begins to find suggestions of the manner of oversight implied by such a relationship. Virginia’s Declaration of Rights (1776), for example, proclaims in its second clause “that all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the People; that magistrates are their trustees and servants, and at all times amenable [that is, answerable] to them.” In keeping with this emerging logic, many of the new state constitutions called for larger legislatures that better represented the people; some constitutions even gave the people the right to “instruct” their representatives on how they should vote on legislative proposals.

These expansions of the theory of popular sovereignty occasioned new understandings of the role of the press and the nature of freedom of the press. Radical thought had long considered the press, like the popular assembly, primarily as a bulwark against ministerial or royal tyranny. More precisely, the press was seen as a last resort if the more moderate, more continuous safeguard provided by the representative legislature should fail. Pamphlets, broadsides, and especially newspapers were the place for dire warnings rallying the troops against an imminent assault on the people’s liberties. This role for the press would certainly continue, but with the advent of broad-based, annual elections for larger, more representative, and more powerful legislatures, the people’s duty and the press’s role now centered on maintaining and shaping rather than simply defending the republics the former colonists had established.

As always, a crucial, difficult question was how far this liberty should go. The press clauses in the early state constitutions did not specify any particular limit and the later constitutions were no more explicit. The Massachusetts constitution (1780), for example, declared that “The liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a State; it ought not, therefore, to be restrained in this commonwealth.” (The New Hampshire constitution’s press clause [1783] is almost identical.) While this clause does not enumerate limitations, it is worth noting that the language practically quotes the traditionalist English jurist Sir William Blackstone, but where he insists on subsequent punishment of “dangerous or offensive writings,” these clauses reject constraint.

Even the French revolutionaries, in their Declaration of the Rights of Man and Citizen (1789), explicitly include the traditional notion of post facto responsibility for “abuse” of press liberty—but not the American state constitutions. Although we do have evidence of how common people understood their press clause, as we do in the town meeting discussions of the Massachusetts constitution, it is clear that they read the clause to allow no subsequent legal responsibility whatsoever. It was this understanding that led a number of towns to resolve that the clause should be explicitly amended to provide legal damages for defamation of private individuals.

Ultimately, the Massachusetts constitution was not amended to support explicitly the notion of private libel (defaming publications concerning a person’s private matters or characteristics), but the issue would not go away. A person’s private reputation was still seen as sacred and this created complications for freedom of the press in a republic. It soon became clear that if the people are to use the press not merely as a bulwark against tyrannical government, but also as a medium for active, continual, and spirited contribution to the public debate of the republic, some acceptable and relatively distinct dividing line must be fashioned between a people exercising its sovereignty and an individual scandalizing his enemies.

This distinction became more difficult to make as citizens of the new American republic began to wonder whether the truth would really prevail in a raucous, wide-open press. People generally still praised a press open to all sides, believing that even if the press permitted some objectionable or even untrue things to be printed, the benefits of an open press far outweighed the costs and risks of limiting it. Yet there was also an increasing awareness of the disadvantages as well as the advantages of press liberty. Elite figures found their private characters defamed in the press and felt there was little they could do but wait for the truth eventually to prevail and redeem their reputations.

The First Amendment

As the 1780s wore on, many leaders saw weaknesses in the loose union created by the Articles of Confederation (1781), the nation's first constitution. The desire for a stronger, more stable union led to interest in a new constitution with a more powerful central government. Calling themselves "Federalists," these advocates for a stronger national government met in Philadelphia in 1787 and—exceeding their authority to propose revisions to the Articles—crafted a new constitution, which was to be ratified by conventions in the several states. Opponents of ratification came to be called Anti-Federalists; few of them were at the convention. Many of the Anti-Federalists championed maintaining stronger state governments, where popular control was more direct, as a way to ensure limited government and the protection of rights, press liberty chief among them.

Originally, the federal Constitution had no protection for freedom of the press. Anti-Federalists criticized this weakness repeatedly and to great effect in the ratification debates, but the Federalists insisted that the new national government would only have those powers expressly given to it. All other powers and rights would implicitly be reserved to the people and the states. Press liberty, Federalists repeatedly insisted, was thus beyond federal authority; including a provision protecting it would, at best, be unnecessary and, at worst, would mistakenly suggest a federal power over the press. Many Anti-Federalists maintained the traditional republican view that governmental power continuously and inexorably struggles to expand, and thus without a clear declaration protecting press freedom, the national government would soon seek to limit freedom of the press. Such a limitation, they feared, would undermine the more engaged oversight of the government that they expected of republican citizens.

Critics of the Constitution were more likely than its supporters to stress the advantages of an active press. The Anti-Federalists were not merely being naïve about the benefits of an unrestricted press. They admitted that publications might be used for abusive language and false claims, but the political advantages (not to mention the scientific and literary ones) outweighed the disadvantages to the people. Moreover, the disadvantages of an unlimited political press simply had to be borne, since they were interwoven with the advantages. Federalists, on the other hand, were more likely than their critics to stress the disadvantages of an unrestricted political press. The Federalist suspicion of an open press was in part a function of their suspicion of taking republican theory too far and giving too much real power to an ill-informed citizenry.

Though he was the "father of the Constitution" and a coauthor of the famous Federalist Papers, James Madison came to see the importance of a bill of rights protecting basic liberties, freedom of the press especially. After ratification of the Constitution, Madison proposed a number of amendments as a member of the first House of Representatives. He saw more clearly than anyone that while there was still a threat that the government—even though now republican, not monarchical—might tyrannize the people, the bigger threat was that a majority of the people would tyrannize over a minority of controversial printers and authors.

One of Madison's draft press clauses, to be inserted into the body of the text, read: "No State shall infringe the equal rights of conscience, nor the freedom of speech, or of the press, nor of the right of trial by jury in criminal cases." Some Anti-Federalists in the House objected that the federal Constitution already had too much influence over the states, but Madison replied that the clause was "the most valuable amendment on the whole list" of proposed amendments. Madison reasoned that the state governments, since they were more directly tied to the people, were most likely to engage in majority tyranny over individual dissenting voices.

Madison also proposed to add another clause to the body of the Constitution, declaring that "the people shall not be deprived or abridged of their right to speak, to write, or to publish their sentiments; and the freedom of the press, as one of the great bulwarks of liberty, shall be inviolable." The House passed both of Madison's press clauses with nothing more than a slight change in wording. The Senate rejected Madison's prized state-limiting clause and changed the latter press clause to the now familiar First Amendment appended, with the rest of the Bill of Rights, to the end of the Constitution. We have little record of Senate debates to elucidate the meaning given to the clause in that house, but the Senate did reject another version of the clause that would have suggested the possibility of subsequent punishment for libel. Still, it is clear that many Federalists—and perhaps others—understood "freedom of the press" to allow for such limitations.

The Sedition Act Crisis and Beyond

The broad language of the final version of the First Amendment left its meaning unclear. Differences over the proper interpretation of constitutional press liberty became heated as competing parties emerged and the future of the fledgling republic seemed to hang in the balance. The Federalists, led by men such as Alexander Hamilton and John Adams, spent the 1790s debating policy and exchanging newspaper attacks with the emerging opposition party, the Democratic-Republicans (led by Thomas Jefferson and James Madison). Newspaper impartiality—never pure or perfect—became a victim of increasing partisanship, and editors started ridiculing, for the first time, the very idea of impartiality. By 1798, the Federalists used the pretext of a “quasiwar” with France to pass a number of draconian measures, including the Sedition Act (July 14, 1798), which was intended to silence Republican printers and other government critics.

The Sedition Act criminalized—along with actual sedition and insurrection—“any false, scandalous and malicious writing or writings against the government of the United States ... or Congress ... or the President, with the intent to defame ... or to bring them ... into contempt or disrepute.” The act has long been seen as the embodiment of Federalist arrogance and autocracy. But the Federalists were drawing on a wealth of British and, in some cases, American arguments and precedents. Indeed, the law included provisions that echoed the Zenger trial’s successful defense: evidence of the truth of the alleged libel could be presented by the defense and the jury could issue a general verdict, not merely a “special verdict” on the fact of publication only. Despite these provisions, the sedition law seemed despotic to many people.

The Federalists did not see themselves as despotic or even partisan, but rather loyal to the elected government. Still, the political nature of the sedition law was evident from its specified expiration date as well as its execution. The act was to expire not at the end of the international crisis with France, but at the end of President Adams’s current term. Moreover, only Republicans were indicted, and most of the major opposition papers and several minor ones were targets. The act and its execution were timed with hopes that the trials would take place, and thus silence the editors, before the election of 1800. With the help of a Federalist judiciary and some packed juries, the result was a legal attack on opposition voices and the newspapers.

In defending their approach to freedom of the press, the Federalists drew on some traditional concerns about press abuse, adapted to their view of the new republican theory of government. To them, the Republican critics of government were not defending the people, but attacking them through their elected officials. More importantly, the Federalists maintained that America’s republican form of government made regulating the press even more important than in any other form of government, since elective government ultimately rested on a truthfully informed electorate. The general public’s limited information and education were good reason, Federalists maintained, to mandate constrained and decorous press discourse, lest the people be confused or deceived. For the Republicans, to the contrary, limited information was good reason to foster more wide-open political debate. A republican form of government did not rely merely on elections every few years, they contended, but on continuing debate of public men and measures.

That debate, Federalists observed, had led to a world of deceptive half-truths and outright lies. The political discourse of the 1790s was among the most vitriolic and partisan of any era in America. Accordingly, the Federalists maintained, the truth would not emerge, at least not until much too late. As a result, seditious libel had a bad tendency to undermine the people’s confidence in their chosen officials, making it impossible for the government—the democratically elected government—to carry out its public mandate.

Republicans—like the Anti-Federalists before them—increasingly conceded that the truth did not always immediately prevail, but they responded to the Federalists’ theory in a number of ways. First, the centuries-old logic that the “bad tendency” of words might bring a breach of peace was oppressive: It could support the most draconian restrictions on press liberty, since just about any criticism could tend to induce someone to violence. More profoundly, Jefferson, Madison, and their followers maintained that opinion, not “truth,” was really at issue in political debates. Factual truths that could be proven in a court of law were rarely if ever central to a seditious libel case; thus, interpretations of freedom of the press that included protections for provable truth—such as the Sedition Act—were really despotic limitations on press liberty.

Moreover, Republicans insisted that the liberty of the press and its licentiousness—its use and abuse—were inseparable: One simply could not separate and punish what was false and abusive without undermining the necessary and salutary critiques of a spirited, democratic press. One simply had to permit the occasional public (though not purely private) libel.

Republicans like James Madison, then, were formulating and defending a broad notion of press liberty that allowed for civil suits for private defamation, but dispensed with the notion of public libel. Only actual, overt acts of violence or rebellion would be punishable crimes. But this theory was developed by the opposition party at its most extreme and embattled. Once in power, President Jefferson pardoned the victims of the expired Sedition Act, but soon also encouraged a few seditious libel cases against critics of his administration. A few of these cases actually rested on the claim that the federal government, now lacking the statutory jurisdiction of the Sedition Act, could have common law jurisdiction over seditious libel cases; in U.S. v Hudson and Goodwin, 7 Cranch 32 (1812), the Supreme Court held that the Constitution granted no common-law criminal jurisdiction. The few other cases drew on state rather than federal law and so were seen as independent of the First Amendment's declaration that "Congress shall make no law ... abridging the freedom ... of the press."

One of these cases, People v. Croswell (3 Johns. Cas. 337, NY, 1804), gave rise to the theory of press liberty that would animate most states throughout the nineteenth century. Defending the Federalist printer Harry Croswell on appeal, Alexander Hamilton espoused principles that were more restrictive than those that came out of the Zenger trial seventy years earlier and had recently been included in the disputed Sedition Act. Hamilton's theory of freedom of the press permitted seditious libels laws that gave the jury uncontested authority to find a general verdict and made truth a justification if "published with good motives and for justifiable ends." Hamilton lost the case but this standard soon became law in New York and many other states.

Until the twentieth century, the First Amendment's press clause was not understood to apply to these state laws. Nor did it stop the federal postal service from effectively closing the mail to abolitionist newspapers sent to the South, where state laws also criminalized transmission of publications that could be interpreted as inciting slave revolts. It is worth noting that during the War of 1812, in the face of successful British attacks on American soil and arguably treasonous discussions of New England secession, the Madison administration made no attempt to enact federal restrictions on the press. Nevertheless, despite the libertarian theories of Frederick Grimke and Thomas Cooley later in the century, this view of a nearly absolute political press liberty would not hold sway until the twentieth century.

ROBERT W. T. MARTIN

References and Further Reading

- Bailyn, Bernard. Ideological Origins of the American Revolution. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1967.
- Eldridge, Larry D. A Distant Heritage: The Growth of Free Speech in Early America. New York: New York University Press, 1994.

- Levy, Leonard. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Martin, Robert W. T. The Free and Open Press: The Founding of Democratic Press Liberty, 1640–1800. New York: New York University Press, 2001.
- Rabban, David M. Free Speech in its Forgotten Years, 1870–1920. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1999.
- Rosenberg, Norman L. Protecting the Best Men: An Interpretive History of the Law of Libel. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1986.
- Schlesinger, Arthur M. Prelude to Independence: The Newspaper War on Britain, 1764–1776. New York: Knopf, 1958.
- Smith, James Morton. Freedom's Fetters: The Alien and Sedition Laws and American Civil Liberties. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1956.
- Smith, Jeffery A. Printers and Press Freedom: The Ideology of Early American Journalism. New York: Oxford University Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- People v Croswell*, 3 Johns. Cas. 337 (NY, 1804)
- U.S. v Hudson and Goodwin*, 7 Cranch 32 (1812)
- Sedition Act 1 Statutes at Large 596 (1798)

See also Alien and Sedition Acts (1798); Bill of Rights; Structure; Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution; Early History (1791–1917); Legislators' Freedom of Speech; Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in

PREVENTATIVE DETENTION

Traditionally, our system has recognized that an accused in a noncapital offense has a right to freedom before conviction so long as there is adequate assurance he will be available for trial and any subsequent sentencing. This was based on the presumption of innocence, the Eighth Amendment proscription against excessive bail, and the theory that an individual should not be punished for future acts. The exception to this was in the juvenile justice system where virtually all states had some provision for the pretrial preventative detention of juveniles. Many opponents of preventative detention have argued that any attempt to predict future violent or dangerous behavior is unreliable. However, the late 1970s and early 1980s saw a move on the part of several jurisdictions to allow pretrial detention to prevent crime and protect the public. This came to culmination in the form of a federal statute and two U.S. Supreme Court decisions.

The Federal Bail Reform Act of 1984 provides that, under specified circumstances, the accused may be detained following a hearing and written findings based on clear and convincing evidence that no other combination of conditions will reasonably assure the individual's appearance at trial or the safety of others or the community. A hearing must be held if requested by the government in a case involving (1) a crime of violence; (2) a crime for which the maximum sentence is life imprisonment or death; (3) drug offenses with a maximum of ten years or greater; or (4) in any other felony if the accused was previously convicted of two or more of these offenses. In addition a hearing is required in cases where there is an allegation of a serious risk of flight, obstruction of justice, or intimidation of perspective witnesses or jurors.

In Schall v. Martin, 467 U.S. 253 (1984), Justice Rehnquist, writing for a six-to-three court, upheld the constitutionality of a New York statute allowing pretrial detention of juveniles in delinquency proceedings. Schall affirmed the applicability of due process to juvenile proceedings but stressed parens patriae interest in protecting the welfare of the child and the interests of the community. Central to the decision was the Court's finding that the statute contained extensive due-process protections and that it was regulatory in nature, not punitive.

The Supreme Court addressed the issue of preventative detention in the adult criminal justice system three years later in United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987). Again writing for a six-to-three majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist rejected a facial challenge that the Federal Bail Reform Act of 1984 violated the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment and the Eighth Amendment proscriptions against excessive bail. The Court concluded that while pretrial punishment is unconstitutional, the due process clause does not bar all pretrial detention. In balancing the government's regulatory interest in community safety and the individual's liberty interest, the Court determined that Congress intended the statute to address a pressing societal problem, preventing danger to the community, and again held that the goal of the statute was regulatory in nature, not punishment.

Chief Justice Rehnquist concluded that the narrow focus of the statute, individuals charged with a specific category of serious offenses, and the safeguards built into the process (right to counsel, an adversary hearing, and proof by clear and convincing evidence) comported with substantive due process. With respect to the Eighth Amendment claim, the Court held the prohibition against excessive bail was just that and did not prevent "the government from pursuing other admittedly compelling interests through regulation of pretrial release" subject to the limitation that the "conditions of release or detention not be 'excessive' in light of the perceived evil."

VANCE L. COWDEN

References and Further Reading

- Alshuler, Albert W., Preventive Pretrial Detention and the Failure of Interest-Balancing Approaches to Due Process, Michigan Law Review 85 (1986): 510.
 Fagan, Jeffrey, and Guggenheim, Martin, Preventive Detention and the Judicial Prediction of Dangerousness for Juveniles: A Natural Experiment, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 86 (1996): 415.
 Miller, Marc, and Guggenheim, Martin, Pretrial Detention and Punishment, Minnesota Law Review 75(1990): 335.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Schall v. Martin*, 467 U.S. 253 (1984)
United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987)
 Federal Bail Reform Act of 1984, 18 U.S.C. §§ 3141-3150 (2005)

See also Bail; Sentencing Reform Act

PRINCE v. MASSACHUSETTS, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)

Prince, her two children, and a young girl in her legal custody were Jehovah's Witnesses. Each week, Prince distributed religious magazines on the streets. She permitted her children to participate in the preaching with her on the sidewalks. In particular, the child at issue held up the magazines in her hand for passers-by to see. On the side of her bag was printed, "Watch-tower and Consolation 5 cents per copy."

Prince was charged with violating a state child labor law, which prohibited children from selling or offering for sale any magazines, newspapers, or other merchandise in any street or public place. The statute punished any parent or guardian who compelled or permitted the child to work in violation of the statute.

The question presented was whether the state statute, as applied, contravened the Fourteenth Amendment by denying or abridging the appellant's freedom of religion or denying her the equal protection of the laws. Prince further claimed the state violated her parental right as secured by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, arguing that the Fourteenth Amendment guaranteed her liberty, to bring up her child teaching the child the tenets and practices of her faith, and her child's liberty, to observe those tenets and practices.

In rejecting Prince's claims and affirming the lower court, the Supreme Court held that, as applied, the statute neither violated freedom of religion nor denied equal protection of the laws (321 U.S. at 167). The Court recognized the need to balance the freedom of religion and this case, the parental right to control the upbringing of children, with the authority of the state to protect the children's welfare. While the Supreme Court has recognized the rights of children to exercise their religion and of parents to give religious instructions, West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943), and the rights of parents to provide their children religious and private secular schooling, Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) (recognizing the private realm of family life), the state also has a recognized interest in protecting the welfare of children (Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 1925 [requiring school attendance]; Sturges & Burn Mfg. Co. v. Beauchamp, 231 U.S. 320, 1913 [prohibiting child labor]). In this case, the Court recognized the state's interest in protecting children from the "crippling effects of child employment," "especially in public places, and the possible harms arising from other activities subject to all the diverse influences of the street" (Prince, 321 U.S. at 168). The Court rejected the equal protection argument because all children, not only Jehovah's Witnesses, are excluded from engaging in prohibited conduct.

The significance of Prince was its recognition that while parents have a liberty interest in care and nurturing of their children, the state may nevertheless regulate some areas of family life in the interest of the child's welfare.

EMILY R. FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Commonwealth v. Prince, 313 Mass. 223, 46 N.E.2d 755 (1943)

Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)

Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)

Sturges & Burn Mfg. Co. v. Beauchamp, 231 U.S. 320 (1913)

West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

PRIOR RESTRAINTS

Prior restraints are legal actions by the government to prevent publication, in advance, of words, pictures, or other communications. There are two principal types of prior restraint: licensing and injunctions. Licensing schemes require that one seek permission from a state agent prior to speaking. An injunction is a court order that, when applied to communications, forbids future publication or distribution of a particular communication.

A system of prior restraint stands in contrast to a system providing for subsequent punishment. That is, "prior restraint" refers to the timing of regulation: a prior restraint may be unconstitutional even though the particular communication might be validly restricted under a system of subsequent punishment. Because of the special harms associated with prior restraints, they are presumptively unconstitutional.

The First Amendment was enacted against a background of English press licensing. English law once required submission of all publications to government officials in advance of publication. Anything published without a license was a crime—even if the censor would have approved the publication had it been properly submitted. In 1769, William Blackstone, the renowned English law scholar, criticized licensing schemes because they subject the press "to the prejudices of one man, and make him the arbitrary and infallible judge of all controverted points in learning, religion, and government."

In 1694, English law had abandoned the system of prior restraint—a hundred years before the First Amendment was adopted. Yet, many scholars have debated whether the framers of the First Amendment intended to prohibit anything more than prior restraints. The better view is that the Framers were also reacting to English "seditious libel," the crime of criticizing the behavior of the government or government officials.

Special Harms Associated with Licensing; Procedural Safeguards

Prior restraints embody harms unassociated with subsequent punishment. For example, licensing schemes grant enormous discretion to a single person or agency to decide what ideas may be circulated to the public. In Lovell v. Griffin (303 U.S. 444, 1938), for example, the Supreme Court invalidated a city ordinance that prohibited distribution of "literature of any kind" within the city without first obtaining written permission from the city manager. The Court emphasized the sheer breadth of the ordinance, which covered any type of publication, anywhere in the city, at any time, through any means of distribution, at the city manager's sole discretion. In other cases, the Court has underscored "the difficulty of effectively detecting, reviewing, and correcting content based censorship, without standards by which to measure the licensor's action."

When preclearance is required, abuse of power is very difficult to prevent. When the censor is charged with keeping "obscenity" (for example) out of circulation, the pressures all tilt towards overinclusion. With a stroke of a pen, it is easy to ban problematic publications; the censor is likely to face less trouble if he or she denies publication rights to marginal cases, and censors tend to respond more to the immediate pressure of containing “dangerous ideas,” than to an abstract interest in “free speech.”

Licensing schemes are also pernicious because they often lead to self-censorship by speakers. When those who wish to communicate must seek permission before publishing, they often anticipate how the censor will respond and thus “reform” their communication before even seeking a license. If one is turned down for a license, he or she must start the process all over again or else fight with the censor. Meanwhile, the effort takes time and energy, and whatever benefits lodged with timely communications are lost. The system of communication thus risks becoming trite, routine, and responsive only to the arbitrariness of the censor’s personal predilections.

The fact that licensing schemes are presumptively unconstitutional does not mean that they are invariably unconstitutional. The harms of licensing may be ameliorated if the licensing official is given “objective” standards to administer and incorporates other procedural safeguards.

In one case (Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51, 1965), a distributor had exhibited a movie without first submitting the picture to the censorship board, violating Maryland’s statutes forbidding the exhibition of obscene films. He was convicted for failing to obtain preclearance, even though the state would have licensed the movie had it been properly submitted. In its review, the Court emphasized the “heavy presumption” against licensing, but described procedural requirements (in addition to the “objective standards”) that would save such a statute from a finding of unconstitutionality. First, the burden rests with the censor. Second, the censor must expeditiously act to grant the license or to seek a judicial determination that the communication may be barred. Furthermore, the final determination must be made by a court, not the censor, and any temporary restraint on publication must be severely limited to the time absolutely essential to prompt judicial resolution.

These Freedman guidelines have proven important in contexts other than obscenity. The end result is that government may adopt licensing schemes to guard against certain carefully delineated harms of speech, but must adopt appropriate procedures designed to forestall arbitrary censorship decisions.

Injunctions

A second major type of prior restraint is injunctions against speech activities, classically illustrated by Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931). In Near, a Minnesota statute authorized prosecutors to seek “abatement” against nuisance “malicious, scandalous and defamatory” publications. A newspaper published several articles charging that gangsters controlled Minneapolis and that law enforcement failed in its duties. The publication made vague allegations against the chief of police, including “illicit relations with gangsters [and] participation in graft.” Acting on the authority of the statute, a prosecutor sought an order of abatement against the newspaper, and a state judge permanently enjoined the publishers from circulating in the future any “malicious, scandalous or defamatory” publication.

On the basis of past offenses, the order forbade all future publications that might, after the fact, be found “scandalous.” Thus, the publishers would have to take the risk that anything they ever published in the future might violate the lower court’s order. The Supreme Court held that by setting up a system of prior restraint, the statute violated the First Amendment, as did any injunctions issued under the statute’s authority.

The Court reached a similar result in the Keefe case (Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415, 1971), where it held invalid as a prior restraint an injunction preventing distribution of eighteen thousand pamphlets attacking alleged “blockbusting” real estate activities. As the Court later described, the injunction against Keefe “operate[d], not to redress alleged private wrongs, but to suppress, on the basis of previous publications, distribution of literature ‘of any kind’ in a city of 18,000.”

One of the key characteristics of an injunction is that violation is punishable by a contempt prosecution, a violation separate from the underlying offense. Consider Walker v. City of Birmingham (388 U.S. 307, 1967), a case arising out of the civil right movement in 1963. In Birmingham, Alabama, a group of black ministers, including the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr., refused to obtain a parade permit prior to marching during Good Friday. City officials wishing to stop the march obtained an injunction from a cooperative state court judge, who, without hearing from the marchers, issued an order requiring them to comply with the vaguely worded city ordinance. Indeed, the city’s ordinance was ultimately found unconstitutional as an invalid licensing scheme. However, rather than comply with the judge’s order, the marchers openly flouted it and were held in contempt.

The Supreme Court held that the marchers could be held in contempt of the injunction ordering compliance with the ordinance, even though the ordinance was unconstitutional. Moreover, they were not permitted to defend against the contempt charges by asserting the unconstitutionality of the ordinance.

This latter rule, adopted five to four by the Court in Walker, became known as the “collateral bar rule.”

Because injunctions are so powerful, the Court has emphasized the very limited circumstances under which courts may grant them in cases involving speech. For example, the procedure followed in Walker in obtaining the injunction—that is, without giving the marchers notice or an opportunity to be heard—is unconstitutional in all but the most extreme circumstances, such as lack of time or inability to notify. A similar procedure was found unconstitutional in Carroll v. President & Commissioners of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175 (1968), when local officials obtained an injunction forbidding a rally. They feared violence because, at a rally the previous day, the right-wing organizers made “militantly racist” speeches to a crowd of whites and blacks and promised to continue the next day. The Supreme Court held that even in those circumstances, injunctions barring speech activities may not be issued unless the speakers are given an opportunity to be heard.

Although many injunctions against speech might qualify as “prior” restraints, not all injunctions restricting speech activities are prior restraints. The key question is often whether there has been a full adjudication of the merits prior to the issuance of an injunction. Consider a judicial determination that particular materials are obscene and thus may be regulated by the government. May further distribution of the obscene material be enjoined? The answer is yes: the Court has upheld the use of injunctions to restrain continued publication of material deemed obscene. In Kingsley Books v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436 (1957), the Court distinguished Near v. Minnesota as a case in which a state had “empowered its courts to enjoin the dissemination of future issues of a publication because its past issues had been found offensive.”

A similar result occurred when a newspaper published “help wanted” job listings under headings designating job preference by sex, which was illegal in the jurisdiction. The Court explained in Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973), that an injunction forbidding the practice was not a prior restraint where the lower court had enjoined the practice only after a full hearing on the merits that the underlying practice was unlawful. On the basis of the Pittsburgh case, some scholars have argued that only preliminary injunctions are presumptively unconstitutional. On this reading, injunctions entered against communications are not prior restraints if they follow a full hearing on the merits that the communication may constitutionally be regulated.

In the obscenity context and Pittsburgh Press, courts enjoined particular publications that were unprotected communications. A related issue concerns a context in which a speaker has in the past engaged in unprotected communicative activities, and an injunction is sought to prevent the speaker from engaging in future similar behavior. An injunction issued in such a context begins to resemble the Near injunction, which predicated a future-oriented injunction against the press based on the newspaper’s past behavior.

The Court has wrestled with this problem in addressing several abortion-related protests. In Madsen v. Womens’ Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994), abortion protesters surrounded an abortion clinic, obstructing entrances and public thoroughfares and interfering with the rights of patients entering the clinic to seek medical assistance. The state court issued an injunction to protect access to the clinic, including erecting a 36-foot “buffer zone” around the clinic, after narrower orders had not succeeded in protecting clinic access. The injunction applied to the leaders of the protest “and all persons acting in concert” with them.

On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the injunction was not a prior restraint because it had been issued “not because of the content of” the demonstrator’s expression, but “because of their prior unlawful conduct” in earlier demonstrations. Yet, because injunctions against speech activities pose “greater risks of censorship and discriminatory application than do general ordinances,” the Court reviewed the injunction with a heightened standard of review. The test is whether the injunction “burdens no more speech than necessary” to protect the important governmental interest.

Applying this standard, the Madsen Court upheld the buffer zone around street and sidewalk entrances to the clinic, but reversed the order as it applied to the side and rear of the clinic because access had not been impeded in those areas. In this and several subsequent cases, the Court has affirmed a fixed 15-foot protected zone around clinic entrances, but overturned a 15-foot “floating bubble” injunction—one that followed persons entering or leaving clinics. The Court has also overturned a ban on carrying signs or other images outside clinics, but affirmed a noise ban that protected patients within a clinic from raucous noises likely to interfere with medical treatment.

The doctrine of prior restraint came into play in 1977 when Neo-Nazis announced their intention to march through the largely Jewish community of Skokie, Illinois, where one in six residents was a Holocaust survivor. The village obtained an injunction against the Nazis banning parading in uniform, displaying swastikas, or distributing pamphlets that “promote hatred against persons of Jewish faith.”

PRIOR RESTRAINTS

State courts refused to stay the injunction pending appeal. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the delay of a year or more while the case was appealed was a burden on the Nazis' First Amendment rights and that the state was required to adopt "strict procedural safeguards" including immediate appellate review of any such injunctions restraining speech activity.

In general, injunctions restraining speech activity are not always invalid, but because they restrict communicative activity, lower courts must ensure that procedural protections are afforded. Reviewing courts, in turn, must evaluate such injunctions to ensure that they restrict no more speech than necessary to protect important governmental interests.

Injunctions to Protect National Security

An important context in which the appropriateness of a previous restraint forbidding speech has arisen is national security. In Near, the Court had suggested that an injunction might be properly issued against speech to "prevent actual obstruction to [the government's] recruiting service or the publication of the sailing dates of transports or the number and location of troops."

Subsequently, in the important decision in New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971), the Supreme Court explored the extent to which "national security" could justify a prior restraint on publication. The government sought to enjoin publication of a series of studies called "The Pentagon Papers," which analyzed the history of U.S. involvement in Indochina, from clandestine operations in the 1950s to the invasion of Vietnam. By the time of the 1971 study, the American invasion of Vietnam involved over a half-million troops and incited the mobilization of millions of Americans in antiwar protests. The government asserted that publication could interfere with national security, risk lives, and prolong the war. The newspapers countered that, at most, publication would embarrass government officials, but would satisfy the extraordinary public interest in the history of how the war started and was maintained.

The Supreme Court ruled six to three against the government. In addition to an opinion by the Court, every justice authored a separate opinion. Because the majority did not speak with one voice, the reasoning of the justices varied. Some justices argued that a prior restraint is never justified. Others argued that, in any event, no injunction could ever be justified based on bald assertion: the government would have to prove a great threat to national security. Another key group of justices argued that, in the absence of a statute authorizing the issuance of an injunction, the Court had no authority to act. The three dissenting judges were unhappy about the race through the courts and were willing to trust the national security assertions by government officials. Nonetheless, because of the splits on the Court, the key question left open for a future case is whether an injunction would have been granted if Congress had authorized such an extraordinary remedy.

This latter question was addressed in United States v. Progressive, 467 F.Supp. 990 (W.D. Wisc. 1979), a case that did not get to the Supreme Court. A monthly magazine, The Progressive, planned to publish a technical article on hydrogen bomb design in an article entitled, "The H-Bomb Secret: How We Got It, Why We're Telling It." The Progressive claimed that the article merely summarized information already available to the public, but at the request of the government a lower federal court issued a preliminary order forbidding publication. The lower court ruled that the case was different from the Pentagon Papers case because the earlier case had involved historical material; the government had not proved that publication affected national security; here, there was a statutory basis for issuing an injunction. Progressive never reached final decision, however. Before a full hearing, a different magazine published similar information, and the government abandoned its case.

Even if it cannot prevent the press from publishing merely embarrassing information, may the government prevent its employees from disclosing secrets? In Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980), a former CIA employee had agreed not to publish any information without obtaining preclearance from the agency. Without doing so, he published a book about his activities while he was an agent in Vietnam. Even though the book contained no classified information, the Court regarded the government's preclearance procedure as a reasonable means of enforcing its interests in protecting state secrets. It then granted the CIA the relief it sought: all Snepp's profits from the sale of his book, Injunctions to Ensure Fair Trials, Protect Functioning of Governmental Offices, & Guard Privacy were turned over to the CIA.

In addition to national security cases, some courts have issued injunctions to protect the right to a fair trial. The Constitution guarantees criminal defendants the right to a fair trial, which includes the presumption of innocence. Extensive pretrial coverage can jeopardize these rights, especially when potential jury members are likely to be prejudiced against the accused by pretrial publicity.

In Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976), a trial court attempted to protect the fair trial rights of the accused by prohibiting the press from publishing the accused's confessions or any other facts "strongly implicative" of guilt. The Supreme Court overturned the order. Although finding that publicity might impair the defendant's rights, the Court held that alternatives were available short of a gag order on the press that would have protected the defendant without impeding the important public interest in reporting on criminal trials. Such alternatives included moving the trial to another location; sequestering jurors; and issuing gag orders directed to participants in the criminal trial, including the lawyers, police, and witnesses in the case.

Indeed, such gag orders directed to trial participants, which operate like prior restraints, are frequently issued in criminal trials. The Court upheld gag orders directed at lawyers in Gentile v. State Bar of Nevada, 501 U.S. 1030 (1991), holding that lawyers participating in an active case can be prohibited from making statements that have "substantial likelihood of materially prejudicing" the outcome.

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Blackstone, William. Commentaries on the Laws of England, 151–152.
 Blasi, Vincent, Toward a Theory of Prior Restraint: The Central Linkage, Minnesota Law Review 66 (1981): 11.
 Chafee, Zechariah. Free Speech in the United States. 1941.
 Jeffries, John C., Rethinking Prior Restraint, Yale Law Journal 92 (1983): 409.
 Levy, Leonard. Emergence of a Free Press. 1985.
 Monaghan, Henry P., First Amendment "Due Process," Harvard Law Review 83 (1970): 518.
 Redish, Martin, The Proper Role of the Prior Restraint Doctrine in First Amendment Theory, Virginia Law Review 70 (1984): 53.
 Symposium: National Security and the First Amendment, William & Mary Law Review 26 (1985): 715.
 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bantam Books v. Sullivan*, 372 U.S. 58 (1963)
Carroll v. President & Commissioners of Princess Anne, 393 U.S. 175 (1968)
City of Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co., 486 U.S. 750 (1988)
Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)
Kingsley Books v. Brown, 354 U.S. 436 (1957)

- Lakewood v. Plain Dealer Publishing Co.*, 486 U.S. 750 (1988)
Lovell v. Griffin, 303 U.S. 444 (1938)
Madsen v. Womens' Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994)
National Socialist Party v. Skokie, 432 U.S. 43 (1977)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Nebraska Press Association v. Stuart, 427 U.S. 539 (1976)
New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971) [The Pentagon Papers Case]
Organization for a Better Austin v. Keefe, 402 U.S. 415 (1971)
Pittsburgh Press Co. v. Pittsburgh Commission on Human Relations, 413 U.S. 376 (1973)
Poulos v. New Hampshire, 345 U.S. 395 (1953)
Schenck v. Pro-Choice Network of Western New York, 519 U.S. 357 (1997)
Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)
United States v. Progressive, 467 F.Supp. 990 (W.D. Wisc. 1979)
Walker v. Birmingham, 388 U.S. 307 (1967)

See also Abortion Protest Cases; Anti-Abortion Protest and Freedom of Speech; Blackstone and Common-Law Prohibition on Prior Restraints; Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 108 Stat. 694 (1994); Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Gag Rule; King, Martin Luther, Jr.; Madsen v. Women's Health Center, 512 U.S. 753 (1994); Marches and Demonstrations; Movie Ratings and Censorship; National Security and Freedom of Speech; National Security Prior Restraints; Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931); New York Times Co. v. United States, 403 U.S. 713 (1971); Obscenity; Picketing; Public Forum Doctrines; Snepp v. United States, 444 U.S. 507 (1980); Traditional Public Forums; United States v. The Progressive, Inc., 467 F. Supp. 990 (W.D. Wis. 1979); Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

PRISON POPULATION GROWTH

The growth in prison population in the United States during the past eighty-five years has been startling. From the 1920s until the mid-1970s, prison populations remained remarkably stable. But beginning in the mid-1970s, there was a veritable explosion in defendants being sent to prison. The figures speak for themselves. In the first period, incarceration rates hovered around one hundred per one hundred thousand. By 2002, the incarceration rate was 476 per 100,000. Whereas in the 1920s the U.S. rate was comparable to those of many other Western nations, today we have become the "leader" (by a big margin) in incarceration.

There are many hypotheses proffered to explain the dramatic increase. First, the “politicization” of crime in the 1970s led to a clamor for tougher sentences. This in turn led to a proliferation of mandatory sentencing and “three strikes” laws, which required a fixed period of incarceration for particular offenses and very long sentences for defendants with multiple convictions (often even if for minor felonies). Second (and relatedly), the sentencing reform movement that gathered steam late in the 1970s often resulted in fixed (and lengthier) sentences for many offenders, coupled with substantial increases in the time a defendant would serve before becoming eligible for parole. Third, the explosion in drug use and/or dramatically increased enforcement of drug laws—and sentencing guidelines that mandated imprisonment for drug offenders—flooded the state and federal prisons with inmates.

Incarceration rates increased from the 1970s on, even during periods in which crime levels remained constant. Typically, states were spending increasing amounts for prisons while simultaneously cutting expenditures in other areas (including higher education). Some states now are “rediscovering” the possibility that rehabilitation can be a legitimate goal of criminal justice. There seems to be a renewed interest in limiting the actual costs incurred by incarcerating so many; this has taken the form of revisiting the wisdom of some mandatory sentences for some offenders, of developing new “alternatives” to prison, and of reconsidering the wisdom of all drug criminalization programs.

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Blumstein, Alfred. “Prisons: A Policy Challenge.” In Crime, James Q. Wilson and Joan Persilia, eds. Oakland, CA: ICS Press, 2002, pp. 451–482.
- Bureau of Justice Statistics, “Prison and Jail Inmates at Midyear 2004.” Bureau of Justice Statistics Bulletin. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Justice—Office of Justice Programs, April 2005.
- Bureau of Justice Statistics. Sourcebook of Criminal Justice Statistics—2002. Washington, D.C.: U.S. Department of Justice—Office of Justice Programs, 2004.
- The Sentencing Project, “Ten Leading Nations in Incarceration Rates” and “Rate of Incarceration in Selected Nations,” Washington, D.C.: The Sentencing Project, 2005. Available: www.Sentencingproject.org.
- Tonry, Michael. Sentencing Matters. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- . Thinking About Crime. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.

See also Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991); Mandatory Minimum Sentences; Race and Criminal Justice

PRISONERS AND FREE EXERCISE CLAUSE RIGHTS

Prisoners’ freedom to practice their religious beliefs confronts two distinguishing features of imprisonment. First, imprisonment necessarily entails limitations on the rights of inmates. Second, having isolated prisoners from the civilian community, imprisonment renders them dependent on prison staff to accommodate their religious beliefs.

The historical and criminological foundation of the American prison rested in significant part on the exercise of religion. Benjamin Rush—the “father” of the American penitentiary—sought to impart Christian love through a disciplined prison regime. Rush and his allies believed that religious instruction, alongside silence and labor, would return offenders to moral virtue. His prototype prison, Philadelphia’s Walnut Street Jail of the 1790s, prophetically demonstrated that order could not beget virtue: noble aspirations gave way to the prison’s persistent function: warehousing the rabble. The promise of the prison as a rehabilitative institution would be reborn on repeated occasions during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, but prison staff and penal policymakers came to envisage a largely secular prison.

The drafting and ratification of the Bill of Rights, despite its First Amendment guarantee of the free exercise of religion, did little to benefit prisoners with faiths other than the mainstream Protestant denominations. Historically, prison officials have selectively accommodated the religious beliefs of their wards, with Jews, Catholics, Muslims, and other religious “outsiders” experiencing unfair treatment. The complaint of a Muslim plaintiff in Pierce v. LaValle (293 F.2d 233, 2d Cir., 1961, on remand, 212 F. Supp. 865, N.D.N.Y. M 1962, aff’d per curiam, 319 F.2d 844, 2d Cir. 1963) that prison staff denied him a Koran as well as access to a spiritual advisor represented the norm, not the exception.

Until the late 1960s, federal courts refused to safeguard inmates’ civil liberties, including their rights under the free exercise clause. Judges advanced several explanations for keeping their “hands off” prisoners’ civil rights actions, including judges’ lack of expertise in penal issues and the potential for undermining the authority of correctional officers.

Inmates experiencing religious oppression figured prominently in the collapse of the hands-off doctrine. Litigation on their behalf reached the Supreme Court in Cruz v. Beto, 405 U.S. 319 (1972). A Buddhist inmate had complained that Texas prison officials operated a religious program open only to Protestant, Roman Catholic, and Jewish inmates. The Supreme Court ruled that the equal protection clause accorded him a “reasonable opportunity of pursuing [his] faith comparable to the opportunity afforded fellow prisoners who adhere to conventional religious precepts.” By implication and in dicta, the Court acknowledged that inmates enjoy free exercise rights. Thereafter, lower federal courts extended the boundaries of prisoners’ free exercise rights to embrace religious dress, diets, assembly, and correspondence and visitation with spiritual advisors.

To secure protection under the free exercise cause, the claimants’ beliefs must be religious in nature and sincerely held. In distinguishing religious beliefs from other discourses, federal courts typically use one of two tests. The “definition-by-analogy” test looks for attributes resembling those of mainstream religions, such as the equivalent of the Bible, clergy, and holidays. This approach employs a content based methodology that disfavors unorthodox beliefs. By contrast, the “state-of-mind” test inquires whether the beliefs in question occupy a place in the claimants’ world view comparable to that of adherents of mainstream religions. Claimants’ characterization of their beliefs as “ultimate concerns” or “divine commands,” however unconventional their content, often satisfy this test.

Courts also determine whether a claimant is sincere. Other motivations include gaining special privileges or concealing illicit activities. Courts have yet to find agreement on a governing test. Case law does suggest two key attributes of sincerity: claimants’ familiarity with their religion’s principal tenets and adherence to the principal tenets.

Securing the protection of the free exercise clause by no means frees inmates from a host of prison rules that directly or incidentally limit the practice of religion. The Supreme Court addressed the scope of prisoners’ free exercise rights in O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987). At issue were prison rules that had the incidental effect of excluding inmates assigned to working offsite from a Muslim congregational celebration, Jumu’ah, held inside the prison on Fridays. Prison officials countered that overcrowding and staff shortages dictated offsite work crews and that gate congestion as well as other concerns dictated that the work crews not return until the close of the day. The Shabazz Court employed the four-part reasonableness standard first used in Turner v. Safely, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), in which the Court resolved challenges to prison rules forbidding the marriage of inmates and most inmate-to-inmate correspondence. The Turner and Shabazz Courts spoke of the reasonableness standard as a means of ensuring judicial deference to the judgments of prison officials.

The Shabazz Court determined that the plaintiffs’ exclusion from Jumu’ah found support in each of four factors comprising the reasonableness test.

The threshold inquiry addressed whether the challenged rule or policy bears a “rational connection” to a government interest that is legitimate and neutral regarding religion. Finding no infirmity in this respect, the Court balanced the three remaining inquires—that is, the availability of alternative means of practicing the asserted right, the impact of accommodating the asserted right of prisoners and prison staff, and whether a ready alternative to the challenged rules can be instituted with little expense and inconvenience.

Complaints that the Supreme Court had under-protected religious freedom in the civilian community led the Congress to enact the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA) in 1997. In relevant part, it barred the states as well as the federal government from imposing a substantial burden on religious exercises unless doing so advanced a compelling state interest through the least restrictive means. In City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997), the Supreme Court held RFRA unconstitutional in its application to the states. The Court found that the act exceeded Congress’s authority to remedy state-sanctioned discrimination under Article V of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In 2000, Congress drew upon its broad authority under the spending and commerce clauses of the Constitution to pass the Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA). In relevant part, it reimposed the compelling state interest/least restrictive means standard on the states when they place a “substantial burden” on the exercise of religion by institutionalized persons. The statute is silent on what constitutes such impairment and the case law is divided over whether the affected religious practice must be a central tenet of faith. Case law regards prison security concerns as a compelling government interest under RLUIPA; other penal objectives that would be acceptable under Shabazz, such as administrative and financial considerations, are unlikely to meet this high standard. Similarly, overinclusive restrictions on inmates’ free exercise rights that would be permitted under Shabazz’s reasonableness standard run afoul of RLUIPA’s least restrictive means test.

RLUIPA has survived constitutional challenges. Lower federal courts have held that Congress did not exceed its powers under the spending and commerce clauses in enacting RLUIPA. In Cutter v. Wilkinson, 125 S. Ct. 2113 (2005), a unanimous Supreme Court overturned a circuit court ruling that RLUIPA advanced religion in violation of the establishment clause. The Cutter Court held that RLUIPA permissibly accommodates institutionalized persons, who must look to government for fulfillment of their religious needs.

Enactment of RFRA and RLUIPA coincided with the growth of privately sponsored religious programming in prisons. Typically grounded in Christian evangelism, faith-based programs such as Prison Justice Ministries' InnerChange Freedom Initiative provide religious instruction, counseling, job training, and postrelease counseling. Critics have argued that such programs provide services and amenities otherwise unavailable to the prison population and thereby favor religion in violation of the First Amendment's establishment clause.

As Justice Brennan observed in his dissenting opinion in Shabazz, prisoners' "membership in a spiritual community" may well be their "last source of hope for dignity and redemption." Acquiring that membership through faith-based programs or other religious practices does not necessarily comport with the rule-based, bureaucratic prison where efficiency takes precedence over free exercise rights. Consequently, prisoners' free exercise rights will continue to require protection, be it statutory or judicial.

JAMES E. ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Blischak, Mathew P., O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz: The State of Prisoners' Religious Free Exercise Rights, American University Law Review 37 (Winter 1988): 353–386.
- Branham, Lynn S., Go Sin No More: The Constitutionality of Governmentally Funded Faith-Based Prison Units, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 37 (Winter 2004): 291–352.
- Buss, William G., An Essay on Federalism, Separation of Powers, and the Demise of the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Iowa Law Review 83 (January 1998): 391–434.
- Chiu, Anne Y., When Prisoners Are Weary and Their Religious Exercise Burdened, RLUIPA Provides Some Rest for Their Souls, Washington Law Review 79 (August 2004): 999–1027.
- Clear, Todd R., Patricia L. Hardyman, Bruce Stout, Karol Lucken, and Harry R. Dammer. The Value of Religion in Prison, Journal of Contemporary Criminal Justice 16 (2000): 53–75.
- Developments in the Law—In the Belly of the Whale: Religious Practice in Prison*, Harvard Law Review 115 (May 2002): 1891–1913.
- Giles, Cheryl Dunn, Turner v. Safley and its Progeny: A Gradual Retreat to the "Hands-Off" Doctrine? Arizona Law Review 35 (Spring 1993): 219–236.
- Laycock, Douglas, and Oliver S. Thomas, Interpreting the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Texas Law Review 73 (December 1994): 209–245.
- McConnell, Michael W., The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (May 1990): 1409–1517.
- McKelvey, Blake. American Prisons. Montclair, NJ: Patterson Smith, 1977.
- McNeil, Matthew, The First Amendment Out on Highway 61: Bob Dylan, RLUIPA, and the Problem With Emerging Postmodern Religion Clauses Jurisprudence, Ohio State Law Journal 65 (2004): 1021–1056.
- Meranze, Michael. Laboratories of Virtue. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Mushlin, Michael B. Rights of Prisoners, 3rd ed., vol. 1, St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002, 673–777.
- Pepper, Stephen, Taking the Free Exercise Clause Seriously, Brigham Young University Law Review 1986 (1986): 299–336.
- Rothman, David J. The Discovery of the Asylum: Social Order and Disorder in the New Republic. Boston: Little, Brown, 1971.
- Solove, Daniel J., Faith Profaned: The Religious Freedom Restoration Act and Religion in the Prisons, Yale Law Journal 106 (November 1996): 459–470.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Cruz v. Beto*, 405 U.S. 319 (1972)
- Cutter v. Wilkinson*, 125 S. Ct. 2113 (2005)
- O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz*, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
- Pierce v. LaValle*, 293 F.2d 233 (2d Cir. 1961), on remand, 212 F. Supp. 865 (N.D.N.Y. M 1962), aff'd per curiam, 319 F.2d 844 (2d Cir. 1963)
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993, 42 U.S.C. §§ 2000bb-2000bb-4 (2000)
- Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, 42 U.S.C.A. ss2000cc et seq

See also Accommodation of Religion; City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997); Equal Protection Clause and Religious Freedom; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clause; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987); Religious Freedom Restoration Act; Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000; Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

PRISONERS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Imprisonment has historically imposed severe restrictions on freedom of speech. Nineteenth-century doctrine regarded inmates as "slaves of the state" and thus lacking freedom of speech. Well into the twentieth century, courts refused to adjudicate prisoners' suits under a self-imposed "hands-off" doctrine. Federal courts have since granted prisoners limited freedom of speech under the First Amendment.

Three rulings by the Supreme Court define the constitutionally protected boundaries of prisoners' freedom of speech. In Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 3976 (1974), the Court prohibited censorship of non-legal correspondence sent from prisoners to civilians unless the censorship is “no greater than necessary” and reasonably advances an “important or substantial government interest.” The Martinez Court thus applied a level of judicial review one step below the “compelling interest” test usually used in free speech cases. Moreover, the Court held that censorship triggers the following procedural safeguards: notice to the affected inmates that their correspondence has been censored; an opportunity to object to the censorship; and, finally, third-party review of the protested censorship.

In limiting the reach of the Martinez ruling to nonlegal correspondence sent by prisoners to civilians, Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), permitted severe restrictions on all other First Amendment communication involving prisoners. The Turner Court upheld a nearly total ban on inmate-to-inmate correspondence. Turner employed the lowest level of scrutiny—that is, whether the restraint in question “is reasonably related to legitimate penological interests.” The majority opinion mandated a four-step inquiry into the reasonableness of the challenged censorship: (1) whether the regulation limiting free speech rationally advances the governmental interest in rehabilitating offenders or safeguarding the public, staff, and inmates; (2) the availability of an alternative means of exercising freedom of speech; (3) the impact of accommodating the asserted right; and (4) the absence of a ready alternative to the challenged regulation.

Later, in Thornburgh v. Abbot, 490 U.S. 401 (1989), the Supreme Court applied Turner’s reasonableness test to prison rules barring certain publications sent to prisoners from civilians. Once again, the Court found the challenged government censorship constitutionally acceptable.

In applying the Procunier, Turner, and Thornburgh rulings to subsequent litigation, U.S. district and circuit courts have permitted censorship of prisoner speech having sexual, criminal, or disruptive content. On the other hand, lower federal courts have struck down vague criteria for censoring inmate speech and categorical exclusion of newspapers and magazines. Critics argue that judicial scrutiny has nonetheless failed to prevent excessive regulation of prisoners’ speech.

In conclusion, federal courts have given prison staff extensive but not unlimited authority to engage in prior restraint of speech. Prisoners therefore experience a degree of censorship unanticipated by the Framers of the First Amendment.

JAMES E. ROBERTSON

References and Further Reading

- Branham, Lynn S. Cases and Materials on the Law of Sentencing, Corrections, and Prisoners’ Rights, 6th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.
- Feeley, Malcolm M., and Edward L. Rubin. Judicial Policy Making and the Modern State. New York: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- Jacobs, James B. New Perspectives of Prisons and Imprisonment. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1983.
- McKelvey, Blake. American Prisons. Montclair, NJ: Patterson Smith, 1977.
- Mushlin, Michael B. Rights of Prisoners, 3rd ed., vol. 1. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002, 587–672.
- Robertson, James E., Catchall Prison Rules and the Courts: A Study of Judicial Review of Prison Justice, St. Louis University Public Law Review 14 (1994): 153–173.
- , The Majority Opinion as the Social Construction of Reality: The Supreme Court and Prison Rules, Oklahoma Law Review 53 (Summer 2000): 162–196.
- Smith, Christopher E. Law and Contemporary Corrections. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2000.
- Welch, Michael. Corrections: A Critical Approach. New York: McGraw-Hill, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Procunier v. Martinez*, 416 U.S. 3976 (1974)
- Thornburgh v. Abbot*, 490 U.S. 401 (1989)
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Judicial Review; Prior Restraints; Thornburgh v. Abbot, 490 U.S. 401 (1989); Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

PRIVACY

Essentially, the right of privacy involves the right of individuals to be let alone, at least when governments or others fail to demonstrate some compelling reason for intruding. The right of privacy places a high value on individual autonomy and holds that autonomy ought to prevail across a range of decisions—for example, those involving intellectual pursuits, religious and moral choices, family matters, and sexual conduct of adults. Privacy usually is seen as highly individualist in nature and thus is consistent with the traditionally individualistic U.S. social and political culture; however, privacy interests usually cannot be protected except by balancing interests of individuals, groups, and governments. These days, privacy has come to be seen as a potentially important obstacle against technological intrusions; for example, the protection of personal data potentially retrievable through various electronic means is regarded as a pressing contemporary problem.

In private lawsuits, the right of privacy has sustained recovery for (1) intrusion into a person’s private affairs, (2) public disclosure of private facts about a person's life, (3) publishing materials that place a person in a false light in the eyes of the public, and (4) exploiting, especially for commercial purposes, a person's name or likeness. These four instances have been enshrined in the Restatement of the Law of Torts (1981).

As a right protected by the U.S. Constitution, the privacy issue has focused most prominently on reproductive freedom, although the right is also important in protecting against other unwarranted intrusions by government officials, especially in instances of eavesdropping or searches.

The Seminal Warren/Brandeis Article

Most scholars cite the key contribution of Samuel Warren and Louis Brandeis in their 1890 article in Harvard Law Review, "The Right to Privacy," to the conceptualization of a right of privacy in American jurisprudence, but there were a few other important antecedents. For example, an advocacy group currently working for privacy rights suggests that the English Justices of the Peace Act (1361) was founded on privacy when it provided for the arrest of "peeping toms and eavesdroppers." One recent text suggests that Thomas Cooley's idea of the "right to be let alone," written in 1888, was a foundation stone, but one which was inferred from English common-law decisions. For example, in his 1765 opinion in Entick v. Carrington, 19 Howard State Records 1029 (K.B. 1765), voiding a warrant issued by a minister of the government of the day (rather than a magistrate) to enter a home and search for personal papers thought to contain a libel, Chief Justice Camden wrote, "We can safely say there is no law in this country to justify the defendants in what they have done; if there was, it would destroy all the comforts of society, for papers are often the dearest property any man can have."

Warren and Brandeis also cited English precedents, but their article was chiefly concerned with intrusions on privacy through unauthorized publication of private materials, especially photographs. For example, they cited the case of Prince Albert v. Strange (1849) for the common-law rule that prohibited not only reproductions of etchings that Prince Albert and Queen Victoria had made for their private use and enjoyment, but also even publication of a description of them. The justices did concede that the right to privacy ought not to prohibit publication of any matter that is truly of public or general interest. However, in their view, if the publication is of purely private information, neither the truth of the matter published nor the absence of malice of the publisher should be a defense. For this view they cited the common-law view that a man "is entitled to be protected in the exclusive use and enjoyment of that which is exclusively his." Their conclusion was that "the principle which protects personal writings and all other personal productions, not against theft and physical appropriation, but against publication in any form, is in reality not the principle of private property, but that of an inviolate personality."

The remedies Warren and Brandeis proposed were damages, tangible actual damages as well as compensation for "injury to feelings." They also called for the use of injunctions in certain cases.

Interpretations by the Supreme Court of the United States

In Boyd v. U.S., 116 U.S. 616 (1886), Justice Bradley liberally construed the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches to raise a privacy interest in the protection of a businessman's private papers and invoices. This privacy interest was viewed as one aspect of common-law property rights, citing Entick v. Carrington (discussed earlier in the context of Thomas Cooley's "right to be let alone"). In 1891, only a year after the Warren and Brandeis article, Justice Gray, writing for a majority of the U.S. Supreme Court, confirmed "the right to be let alone" in the case of Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford, 141 U.S. 250 (1891). The railroad had sought a court order for a surgical examination to determine the extent of injuries to a plaintiff who had claimed head injuries from falling from an upper berth in a sleeping car. Gray found this to be "an indignity, and assault and a trespass" upon the plaintiff. This decision was, of course, prior to modern pretrial discovery procedures.

Yet, more than thirty years later in Olmstead v. U.S., 277 U.S. 438 (1928), a majority of the U.S. Supreme Court failed to recognize wiretapping of private telephone conversations as a breach of the Fourth Amendment's protection against unreasonable searches and seizures because there had been no physical trespass in the electronic intrusion. But change was coming, for Justice Brandeis had joined the Supreme Court in 1916, and his dissenting opinion in Olmstead viewed the invasion of privacy as the critical aspect of the case and the requirement of a physical trespass and seizure to be outmoded. He wrote that "every unjustifiable intrusion by the Government on the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed" must be seen as a violation of the Fourth Amendment. He noted, presciently, that “discovery and invention have made it possible for the government, by means far more effective than stretching upon the rack, to obtain disclosure in court of what is whispered in the closet.” Eventually, Congress passed the Federal Communications Act of 1934, which made the interception and divulgence of telephone or telegraphic messages a federal crime. However, the FBI took the position that it could continue with wiretaps so long as the messages were not divulged in criminal prosecutions.

Critics nonetheless have long argued that the U.S. Constitution is silent as to a right of privacy, although the Ninth Amendment says that the “enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” These “retained rights,” which presumably existed prior to constitutional government, have been held to include the right of privacy. Moreover, in addition to the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures, privacy interests have been found to be protected by the First Amendment (freedom of speech, religion, assembly, and association), the Fifth Amendment (protection against self-incrimination), and—as to state governments—by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In his dissent in Poe v. Ullman, 367 U.S. 497 (1961), in which a majority of the U.S. Supreme Court refused on narrow procedural grounds to take a case challenging the 1879 Connecticut statute prohibiting the use of birth control measures, Justice Harlan wrote that the law violated “what by common understanding throughout the English-speaking world, must be granted to be the fundamental aspect of ‘liberty,’ the privacy of the home in its most basic sense.”

Sexuality and the Right of Privacy

The key case in which a majority of the Court supported a broadly conceived constitutional right of privacy was Griswold v. Connecticut, 391 U.S. 145 (1965). Justice Douglas wrote in Griswold that the right of privacy could be found in the “penumbras” (shadows) cast by the First, Fourth, Fifth, Ninth, and Fourteenth Amendments. Douglas’s vivid, emphatic rhetoric is worth repeating:

We deal with a right of privacy older than the Bill of Rights—older than our political parties, older than our school system. Marriage is a coming together for better or worse, hopefully enduring, and intimate to the degree of being sacred.

Other members of the majority in Griswold relied chiefly on privacy as a “retained right” under the Ninth Amendment, but, whatever their differences as to the reasons, the majority agreed that decisions of a married couple concerning birth control were none of the business of the government. Harlan repeated his view from Poe v. Ullman that the statute violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment by violating “basic values ‘implicit in the concept of ordered liberty.’” But Chief Justice Warren and Justice Brennan joined with Justice Goldberg’s opinion that the “language and history of the Ninth Amendment reveal that the framers of the Constitution believed that there are additional fundamental rights, protected from governmental infringement, which exist alongside those fundamental rights specifically mentioned in the [Bill of Rights].” Thus, the right of privacy “in the marital relation is fundamental and basic—a personal right ‘retained by the people’ within the meaning of the Ninth Amendment.” Justice Douglas relied on a broader view of the Ninth Amendment, a position that by itself create federally enforceable rights, but that may be part of the foundation for the rights that may be encompassed within the liberty guaranteed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

It should be noted that Justice Stewart joined Justice Black’s dissent in Griswold, which protested that the use of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and of the Ninth Amendment simply provided the opportunity for the Supreme Court to strike down “all state laws that it considers to be arbitrary, capricious, unreasonable or oppressive.” Judgments made on the basis of natural justice, rather than on specific provisions of the Constitution, might be appropriate for legislators, Justice Black argued, but not for judges. It was in this sense that the justice was a strict constructionist. He was not sympathetic with the possibility that our constitutional founders believed in natural, though sometimes unspecified, rights.

Following Griswold in the 1971 case of Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional a state law that prohibited the sale of contraceptive devices to unmarried persons. This was found to be discriminatory against single persons, but Justice Brennan went further in writing that “if the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child.”

Before Griswold there were several important decisions that, in retrospect, appear to implicate privacy, though each was decided on other grounds. These included the right of parents to decide where and how their children should be educated (Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510, 1925) as well as the right of private associations to refuse to disclose their membership lists to authorities, absent some compelling justification (NAACP v. Alabama, 357 U.S. 449, 1958).

Reasonable Expectations of Privacy

In the 1967 decision in Katz v. U.S., 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the U.S. Supreme Court relied on the “reasonable expectation of privacy” as the basis for protecting against police interception of telephone calls when no probable-cause warrant had been issued. This decision concluded that eavesdropping through a microphone attached to the wall of an enclosed public telephone booth, while technically not a trespass as customarily required by the Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures since the 1928 Olmstead decision, clearly violated an objectively justifiable expectation for the privacy of the conversation in the booth. Thus, whatever a person “seeks to preserve as private, even in an area accessible to the public, may be constitutionally protected.”

The reasonable expectation of privacy has since been a core determinant of whether a governmental intrusion constitutes a violation of the Fourth Amendment, but it should be noted that the rule has sometimes had unpredictable outcomes. In the 1979 case of Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979), the Supreme Court held that the use of a “pen register,” which, when connected to a telephone line, records phone numbers called (but not the content of the calls), was not an unlawful search because the phone subscriber, in the Court’s view, does not have a reasonable objective expectation of privacy in the numbers called. This certainly was not a strong affirmation of the right of privacy.

The Supreme Court also has held that there may be no reasonable expectation of privacy even when law enforcement officers have committed a technical trespass. Thus, in 1984 in Oliver v. U.S., 466 U.S. 170 (1984), the “open fields” doctrine sustained a search and seizure without warrant of a field in which marijuana was growing on the grounds that there can be no objectively justifiable expectation of privacy for such an open field (even though the field was behind a locked gate posted with a “No Trespassing” sign). Furthermore, in 1986 in California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986), the Supreme Court held that there was no reasonable expectation of privacy against police surveillance from a helicopter. However, Kyllo v. U.S., 121 U.S. (1986), held that the use of thermal imaging (from outside a house) by federal agents to detect heat lamps in a house that were being used to grow marijuana was an unreasonable search in the absence of a probable-cause warrant. Altogether, the outcomes relying on a reasonable expectation of privacy are mixed and seem inconsistent.

Another application of the expectation of privacy, though in this instance under the First Amendment, came in a 1969 decision in Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 561 (1969), that held that, while holding that the public sale, display, or distribution of obscenity was not protected by freedom of expression, the possession of pornographic materials in the privacy of one’s home could not be the subject of a search, seizure, or consequent arrest (with the notable exception of child pornography). Thus, Justice Marshall wrote for a unanimous Supreme Court, “If the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his house, what books he may read or films he may watch.” This ruling did not apply to pornographic films that were shown in a public “adults only” movie theatre.

Roe v. Wade and Its Consequences

By far the most controversial application of the right of privacy has been in the extension of reproductive freedom to include the termination of pregnancy. The 1973 decision of the U.S. Supreme Court in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), has been the subject of continuing controversy for more than forty years. Unlike the decision in Griswold, the court’s majority recognized that the respect for the prospect of life and societal concerns about terminating a pregnancy had to be taken into account in determining limits on a woman’s autonomy in making decisions concerning her body. Justice Blackmun’s opinion balanced these by adopting a trimester rule. A woman’s autonomy was respected and protecting during the first trimester of pregnancy. During the second trimester, government could intrude, but only for the purpose of protecting the life and health of the woman; during the third trimester, government could intervene to protect the interest of the unborn child and to prohibit abortions not required for protecting the life or health of the woman.

Justice Blackmun thus concluded that the right of personal privacy includes the decision whether to terminate a pregnancy, but that the right was not unqualified. While the state of Texas claimed in Roe that life “begins at conception and is present throughout pregnancy” and therefore the state had the right to protect life “from and after conception,” the justice concluded that the Court “need not resolve the difficult questions of when life begins.” During the first trimester, before the viability of the fetus, the woman’s right to choose prevailed.

It probably was the extratextual and innovative character of the trimester rule that chiefly outraged legal commentators who purport to be textual purists. During the hearings on his nomination to the Supreme Court, Robert Bork testified against a creative interpretation of the Ninth Amendment:

I do not think you can use the Ninth Amendment unless you know something of what it means. For example, if you had an amendment that says “Congress shall make no” and then there is a ink blot and you cannot read the rest of it and that is the only copy you have, I do not think the Court can make up what might be under the ink blot if you cannot read it.

In commenting on this quote, law professor Randy Barnett has argued that our constitutional framers had an understanding of the rights retained by the people that rested on natural law—natural rights that are boundless—that is, they are beyond complete specification. Barnett proposed that such an understanding can readily be translated into a simple presumption in favor of liberty. Such a presumption would require that governments demonstrate a compelling justification for interfering with individual liberty. It is interesting that Barnett’s conclusion is quite consistent with the right to be left alone, absent compelling justification, that was the original basis of the right of privacy. His conclusion was:

Adopting the presumption of liberty would enable us finally to acknowledge the Ninth Amendment’s unique constitutional function by resisting legislative or executive usurpation of the unenumerated rights “retained by the people” while, at the same time, avoiding unfettered judicial discretion.

Many opponents of Roe v. Wade, however, are moralists who believe that the effort to protect potential life is indeed sufficiently compelling to overcome any presumption of liberty. Their firm conviction that life begins at conception precludes all abortions (except for those who reluctantly concede that abortions might be appropriate in the instance of forcible rape or incest). Efforts to put justices on the Supreme Court who might vote to repeal Roe v. Wade have been a continuing feature of the conservative social agenda in American politics. On the other side, the “right to choose” has been a litmus test of liberal political views.

The core of the Roe decision has often rested on the views of one or two justices, most notably on the view of Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, the first woman to serve on the U.S. Supreme Court. In a dissenting opinion in 1983, Justice O’Connor wrote that the “trimester approach is a completely unworkable method of accommodating the conflicting personal rights and compelling state interests that are involved in the abortion context.” The decisive votes on the Supreme Court have moved toward an “undue burden” rule proposed by Justice O’Connor in Maher v. Roe (432 U.S. 464) in 1977: “Roe did not declare an unqualified ‘constitutional right to an abortion.’ ... Rather, the right protects the woman from unduly burdensome interference with her freedom to decide whether to terminate a pregnancy.”

Thus the question that must be decided is whether a state regulation or limitation on abortion represents an undue burden on a woman’s autonomy. One example that has been held an undue burden was a state requirement of spousal notification as a condition to a woman’s choice to terminate a pregnancy (Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); in the same case the Supreme Court upheld a state requirement of informed consent by one parent when the pregnant woman was a minor, although it required a judicial bypass when a minor could show sufficient maturity to make a decision on her own or that parent notification and consent was not in her best interest.

The Supreme Court also has ruled that neither the federal nor state governments have any obligation to provide public funds for nontherapeutic abortions (Maher v. Roe, 1977 [state], and Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297, 1980 [federal—the Hyde Amendment]).

Sexual Orientation

Individual autonomy concerning sexual conduct has also proven controversial with respect to homosexuals. The U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), upheld a Georgia sodomy statute that criminalized sodomy even for adults in the privacy of a home. The majority refused to recognize a fundamental right for adults to engage in private sexual conduct.

Writing for the Court Justice White failed to find any fundamental rights for homosexuals to engage in sodomy. He noted that sodomy was a criminal offense in the common law of England and was against the laws of the thirteen states that ratified the original U.S. Bill of Rights. Justice White was unwilling to consider the possible voiding of all sexual crimes committed in private, such as adultery or incest. In his view traditional morality provided an adequate rational for such laws. Above all, he was quite unwilling to extend the right of privacy to protect private homosexual conduct of consenting adults. Chief Justice Burger went even further in finding the criminalization of sodomy to be “firmly rooted in Judeo-Christian moral and ethical standards.” He added that homosexual sodomy had been a capital offense under Roman law.

The four dissenters in Bowers said that the case was not about a fundamental right to engage in homosexual conduct, but rather it was simply about the “most comprehensive of rights and the right most valued by civilized men, namely the right to be let alone.” The majority view in Bowers did not last long, for in 2003 the U.S. Supreme Court reconsidered in Lawrence and Garner v. Texas, U.S. 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003).

In this instance a Texas statute criminalized only sodomy by homosexuals. Most provisions respecting regulation of private adult heterosexual conduct had been decriminalized. The court’s majority voided the Texas statute apparently on grounds of equal protection of the law and of privacy. Justice Kennedy noted that despite almost twenty years of controversy, the Court had sustained in Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992) the central holding of Roe v. Wade that “our laws and tradition afford constitutional protection to decisions affecting marriage, procreation, contraception, family relations, child rearing and education.” The justice also noted that the Court’s decision in Romer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996), had struck down legislation directed at homosexuals as a class. The extension of equal protection to cover sexual orientation, particularly in the concurring opinion of Justice O’Connor, was a key development, but the affirmation of the right of privacy in Justice Kennedy’s opinion was a direct repudiation of Bowers v. Hardwick.

Thus, Justice Kennedy wrote that “liberty protects the person from unwarranted government intrusions into a dwelling or other private places.... Liberty presumes an autonomy of self that includes freedom of thought, belief, expression, and certain intimate conduct. He concluded that “Bowers was not correct when it was decided, and it is not correct today”—a conclusion that found Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist and Justice Thomas, in dissent, upholding the correctness of the holding in Bowers. Justice Thomas also wrote separately, saying that while he found the Texas statute to be “uncommonly silly,” he could find no “general right of privacy” within the Constitution with which to strike it down.

Data Privacy

The advent of high-speed information technology in the past few decades also has raised a number of pressing concerns about privacy, especially the capacity of powerful government-owned computer systems to scan huge amounts of information. The first legislation addressing these concerns came in the early 1970s, with the first U.S. law coming in 1974. One advocacy report notes that all such laws require that personal information must be: (1) obtained lawfully, (2) used only for the intended purpose, (3) not excessive for the intended purpose, and (4) destroyed once the purpose is served.

The post 9/11 world has made data privacy concerns even more compelling. For example, the U.S. PATRIOT Act relies significantly on database surveillance, including, for example, the prospect of examining records of public libraries to see what books its patrons are reading. Any transmission that uses Web technology or airwave transmission is open to government surveillance and the ramifications for privacy have not yet been determined. The U.S. government has led efforts to limit privacy and to enhance surveillance by law enforcement. Federal law formerly relaxed probable-cause requirements in the instance of investigation of foreign intelligence and for special courts to hear cases in national security electronic surveillance. The PATRIOT Act and its extensions proposed by the second Bush administration would extend surveillance to nonstate actors who may be engaged in preparing or executing acts of terrorism. However, the surveillance net cast by the administration has potential application to the private records of millions of Americans, an outcome immediately challenged in federal court.

Issues involving personal identity have also come to the fore. Whether the issue is identity theft or national or international identity registration systems, privacy concerns raise important issues. The retrieval of biometric data, including DNA—or facial features identification—is at the cutting edge, with appropriate rules and regulations yet to be determined.

The recitation of developments in the past several paragraphs demonstrates that the privacy concerns raised by Warren and Brandeis in 1890 may still be relevant in abstract principle, but quaint in the details. Technology-driven social changes promise to outstrip the capacity of the law to enforce effective controls. Perhaps most ominous is the reality that individuals today lack the capacity to protect their privacy. Probably the only way to monitor electronic surveillance and intrusion is through countervailing institutions and programs that themselves require sophisticated technology, large resources, and their own technocratic personnel; of course, these might have much the same capacity to intrude on personal privacy as the governmental institutions that they would watch. The old question—Who will watch the watchers?—has taken on new meaning and relevance. This question moves transnational and international protection of privacy rights to first order of importance.

Privacy rights have been recognized in Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) (“No-one should be subjected to arbitrary interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to attacks on his honor or reputation”), in the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, and in regional rights documents such as the European Convention on Human Rights and Freedoms (1950), the American Convention of Human Rights, and the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man (1965). The most extensive application of privacy rights in these documents, so far, has been through Article 8(1) of the European Convention, which provides for protection of private and family life, home and correspondence, while Article 8 (2) provides that any interference with these must be (1) “in accordance with the law”; (2) permitted only “in the interest of national security, public safety or economic well-being of the country”; and (3) “necessary in a democratic society.” Cases interpreting these words have been prominent among decisions of the European Court of Human Rights.

As noted in a recent text, it is interesting that entirely circumscribing the family with the right of privacy may have the consequence of limiting the rights of children; thus, the U.N. Convention of the Rights of the Child has had the purpose, in part, of separating the rights of children from the rights of families and treating children sometimes as independent “rights actors” relative to their parents and governments. Indeed, it is characteristic of privacy claims that they almost always involve the balancing of competing interests, as we have seen in this entry.

DONALD W. JACKSON

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry and Barbara Perry. Freedom and the Court, 8th ed. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2003.
- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. Cambridge, MA: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Cogan, Neil H., ed. The Complete Bill of Rights: The Drafts, Debates, Sources and Origins. New York: Oxford University Press, 1997.
- Feldman, David. Civil Liberties and Human Rights in England and Wales, 2nd ed. Oxford University Press, 2002 (see, especially, Ch. 9, “The Scope of Legal Privacy”).

Prosser, William L., Privacy, California Law Review 48 (1960): 383–423.

Warren, Samuel D., and Louis D. Brandeis, The Right to Privacy, Harvard Law Review IV (1890): 193–220.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Boyd v. U.S.*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
- California v. Ciraolo*, 476 U.S. 207 (1986)
- Cooley v. Board of Wardens, Port of Philadelphia*, 53 U.S. 299 (1852)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Entick v. Carrington*, 19 Howard State Records 1029 (K.B. 1765)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 391 U.S. 145 (1965)
- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Katz v. U.S.*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
- Kyllo v. U.S.*, 121 U.S. (2001)
- Lawrence and Garner v. Texas*, U.S. 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)
- Maher v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- NAACP v. Alabama*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- Oliver v. U.S.*, 466 U.S. 170 (1984)
- Olmstead v. U.S.*, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
- Pierce v. Society of Sisters*, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992)
- Poe v. Ullmann*, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Romer v. Evans*, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)
- Smith v. Maryland*, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 561 (1969)
- Union Pacific Railway Co. v. Botsford*, 141 U.S. 250 (1891)

PRIVACY PROTECTION ACT, 94 STAT. 1879 (1980)

Although nominally concerned with privacy, in reality the Privacy Protection Act of 1980 (PPA) is intended to protect the First Amendment rights of journalists. In short, the act ensures that journalists are free from search warrants seeking to discover notes, drafts, tapes, photographs, or other work products that may provide evidence of criminal activity. Although the act was passed in direct response to the Supreme Court’s decision in Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978), its origins can be traced to a decision rendered a decade earlier.

For most of the twentieth century, search warrants could only be obtained to discover contraband, instrumentalities, or fruits of criminal activity (Boyd v. U.S., 116 U.S. 616, 1886). In 1967, the Supreme Court ruled that search warrants could also extend to searches for “mere evidence” of crime (Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294, 1967). This expansion placed journalists directly in the path of future search warrants. Journalists are often in possession of evidence of crimes, such as tapes of informants, photographs, notes, and recordings. The ability of law enforcement agencies to obtain search warrants to seek mere evidence of crime meant it was only a matter of time before journalists would be targeted.

In 1971, the district attorney's office in Santa Clara, California, obtained a search warrant for the offices of Stanford University's student-run paper, The Stanford Daily. The warrant was related to a recent clash between police and students on the Stanford campus. The paper had run a series of stories about the clash and included a number of photographs depicting police and student violence. During the protest, some officers were injured by students and the police were eager to uncover the identity of some of the perpetrators. The Stanford Daily's office was searched in the hope of finding more photographs, that had not been published, which might aid in the identification of students that had attacked the police. Although no photographs were found, the Stanford Daily filed suit claiming First and Fourth Amendment violations in connection with the search. The Supreme Court in Stanford Daily ruled the search warrants valid but noted that nothing prevented Congress from establishing "nonconstitutional protections" for journalists.

In 1980, Congress took the Supreme Court's invitation and passed the PPA. According to the act, no government officer may search or seize material in the private possession of any individual that intends to use that material for "public dissemination." The act, however, contains numerous exceptions. Searches and seizures will not violate the PPA when: (1) The only materials searched or seized are contraband, instrumentalities, or fruits of crime; (2) the seizure is necessary to prevent serious injury; (3) there is probable cause to believe that the person in possession of the protected materials has committed or is committing the crime under investigation; or (4) a subpoena proves or will prove unable to produce the materials in question. When a search is done in violation of the PPA, the aggrieved party may bring a civil suit but there is no exclusionary rule for the evidence.

Since its enactment in 1980, few lawsuits have been brought under the PPA and, among those that have been brought, few have been successful. In most of these cases, the individual in question is also a "suspect" in the criminal investigation and, as a result, falls under the "suspect exception" outlined here. Modern technology has given rise to some new questions: (1) whether a private citizen's intent to publicly disseminate information via a Web page falls under the PPA's protections; and (2) whether seizures of PPA-protected materials commingled with nonprotected materials—for example, on a computer hard-drive—gives rise to liability. In the few cases that have raised these questions, courts have generally found that the PPA's protections do encompass the Internet-related activities of nonjournalists but that seizures of PPA-protected materials commingled with nonprotected materials on a hard-drive do not give rise to liability, although law enforcement is forbidden from searching the protected materials (Mink v. Salazar, 344 F. Supp. 2d 1231, D. Colo. 2004; Guest v. Leis, 255 F.3d 325, 6th Cir., 2001).

DOUGLAS J. SYLVESTER

References and Further Reading

- Emerson, Thomas I., The Right of Privacy and Freedom of the Press, Harvard Civil Rights—Civil Liberties Law Review 14 (1979): 329–353.
U.S. Department of Justice, "Searching and Seizing Computers and Obtaining Electronic Evidence in Criminal Investigations" <http://www.cybercrime.gov/s&smanual2002.htm> (2005).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boyd v. U.S.*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
Guest v. Leis, 255 F.3d 325 (6th Cir. 2001)
Mink v. Salazar, 344 F. Supp. 2d 1231 (D. Colo. 2004)
Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967)
Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)
Privacy Protection Act of Oct. 13, 1980, c. 21A, 94 Stat. 1879

See also Anonymity and Free Speech; Anonymity in Online Communications; Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886); Congressional Protection of Privacy; Exclusionary Rule; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Journalism and Sources; Newsroom Searches; Obscenity; Privacy; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures; Zurcher v. Stanford Daily, 436 U.S. 547 (1978)

PRIVACY, THEORIES OF

The right of privacy is identified as the underpinning for a number of rights recognized under the Constitution in Supreme Court decisions. Grounded at least in part on a right to privacy, various cases have recognized the rights of a person

- to be free from unjustified governmental intrusions into house, papers, and effects, and
- unreasonable searches and seizures
- not to be a witness against oneself
- not to be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law
- not to be deprived of the privileges and immunities of the citizens of the states or the United States not to be required to quarter troops without consent to associate freely to speak one's views to have access to contraceptives to decide whether to have an abortion to choose intimate partners and to raise one's children to control the use of one's name or likeness to decline life-sustaining medical treatment when one is terminally ill to pursue seclusion free from intrusion

Because the panoply of privacy rights derives from or affirms different interests, commentators debate whether privacy describes a disparate and unrelated collection of individual rights or whether the concept is amenable to a coherent, unifying rationale.

Rights recognized under the privacy rubric have their roots in ancient principles, natural law, the common law, modern popular expectations, evolving international social norms, historical understandings of the Constitution, and principles derived from practical human experience. Some of the privacy rights reflect interests in physical or spatial privacy—for example, the right to be free from governmental intrusions into one's home. Others reflect an interest in informational privacy—in being able to keep private information that a person does not want the government or others to know. A corollary to this notion is the interest in being able to project only the information one wishes others to know—to control what image others might form. Control over information also denotes a proprietary interest in the material.

Still other privacy rights reflect an interest in deci-sional autonomy—the right of access to contraceptives, to decide whether to have an abortion, to decline life-sustaining medical treatment, and to choose intimate partners. The rights to choose one's associates, to use contraceptives, and to speak also affirm personal autonomy and personhood. Some of these privacy rights derive from more than one of the sets of interests. For example, physical privacy is essential to having a meaningful right to exercise the decisional autonomy to choose intimate partners.

Some interests protected under the privacy rubric flow from the notion that the person or individual has the right to be protected from actions or requirements imposed by external sources such as government or social norms. This aspect of privacy can be viewed as “inward looking” and examples include the interests in physical privacy and decisional autonomy. This notion stands in contrast to the other aspect of privacy, which seeks to protect the individual's right to control his or her interaction or projection on the public from an “outward-looking” perspective. Freedom in choosing one's associates and controlling the dissemination of information about oneself reflects this outward-looking perspective. The right to bear and raise one's children reflects the outward and inward dimensions of the right to privacy.

All of these theories assume that it is possible or desirable to distinguish those aspects or activities of human existence that are inherently “private” from the pursuits that take place in the “public” or social sphere. As noted, some activities or aspects of “privacy” operate in the public and the private spheres.
 Historically, privacy has been the rationale for the law's failure to protect the rights of women and others viewed as acting entirely within the “private” sphere.

The seminal attempt to establish a theoretical basis for recognizing privacy right in U.S. law is the Warren and Brandeis article published in 1890 in the Harvard Law Review. The authors described the interests to be protected by recognizing a right of privacy as the “right to be let alone” and suggested that privacy protected an individual's “inviolable personality.”
 These rationales derive from notions of conventional morality and natural law philosophy and seek to employ the law in affirming the human dignity of the individual.

Recognition of tort protection for violations of various interests in privacy was one explicit goal of the Warren and Brandeis article. The availability of statutory or common law tort claims for certain invasions of privacy does not resolve the question of whether certain inalienable, fundamental rights of privacy that merit constitutional protection exist.

The Supreme Court has employed a number of theories and interpretive tools to justify the privacy rights it has identified in various contexts. To some extent the persuasiveness of the theories has depended upon the nature of direct textual support in the Constitution for the interest in question. While it is possible to debate whether Fourth Amendment protection exists from government physical searches of a person's home in a particular factual circumstance, no one doubts that there is clear textual support for such a right in the Constitution. When there is such specific textual support for the privacy right in question, then the theoretical rationale for protecting the interest, while not irrelevant, becomes less important.

Interpretive questions become more difficult and the theoretical justifications become more salient when the Court seeks to apply less specific rights, such as the liberty interests protected in the due process clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. Finding the reach of the associational interests protected in the First Amendment poses similar analytical challenges. In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479

(1965), Justice Goldberg's opinion sought justification for such extrapolations in the Ninth Amendment's recognition that the Constitution protects other fundamental rights even though not specifically enumerated in the Bill of Rights. At the very least, the Ninth Amendment provides a useful rule of construction even if it does not operate independently as a source of specific rights.

RENÉE M. LANDERS

References and Further Reading

Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies, 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002, 534–535, 808–810, 946–950.

Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988, 774–780, 1302–1435.

Turkington, Richard C., and Allen, Anita L. Privacy Law: Cases and Materials, 2nd ed., St. Paul, MN: West, 2002, 1–76, 722–959.

See also Abortion; Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983); Birth Control; Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Chemerinsky, Erwin; Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990); Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Moore v. East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977); Ninth Amendment; Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Privacy; Right of Privacy; Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); Sodomy Laws; Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000); Substantive Due Process; Thornburgh v. American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists, 476 U.S. 747 (1986); Washington v. Glucksberg, 521 U.S. 702 (1997); Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490, (1989)

PRIVATE DISCRIMINATORY ASSOCIATION

Should private groups be able to exclude members they do not want on the basis of criteria deemed invidiously discriminatory by the government? The conflict between the freedom of association and antidiscrimination laws has its roots in the 1950s and 1960s. The Court's protection of the freedom of association began in earnest in NAACP v. Alabama, 357

U.S. 449 (1959), in which the Court held that the First Amendment protected the NAACP from having to disclose its membership list to hostile Alabama authorities. At the same time, antidiscrimination laws at the state and federal levels gradually expanded in two important ways. First, they began to cover not only employment and traditional public accommodations (like inns and common carriers), but also large private clubs where business networking occurs. Second, antidiscrimination laws also expanded to prohibit more types of discrimination.

These two legal developments—the rise of the freedom of association and the expansion of antidiscrimination law—crossed paths in a series of cases starting in the 1980s. In Roberts v. United States Jaycees (468 U.S. 609, 1984), the Court held that the all-male Jaycees could be forced under state antidiscrimination law to admit female members. The Court held that infringement of a group's associational rights could be justified by “compelling state interests” (like eliminating bias against women) unrelated to the suppression of ideas that cannot be served through means less restrictive of the private group's freedom. Similarly, in Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club (481 U.S. 537, 1987) and New York State Club Ass'n v. City of New York (487 U.S. 1, 1988), the Court held that large private clubs organized largely to promote commercial endeavors could be forced to comply with antidiscrimination laws applied to their membership.

However, in two more recent cases the Court upheld the right of a private group to exclude gays. In Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston (515 U.S. 557, 1995), the Court upheld the right of private organizers of a St. Patrick's Day Parade to exclude a contingent marching behind a banner identifying themselves as an Irish gay group. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (530 U.S. 640, 2000), the Court upheld the right of the Boy Scouts to exclude an openly gay scoutmaster. In both of these cases, the Court stressed the freedom of the group to send its own messages and the impairment that inclusion of gays would have on the communication of that message (even if the group simply wanted to say nothing about homosexuality).

The Court appears to be adopting a bifurcated approach toward private discriminatory association. When the private association is organized essentially for commercial purposes (for example, as a forum for business networking), the Court has held that the group's expressive interests are weak and that the state's interest in eradicating discrimination is strong. When the private association is organized essentially for expressive purposes (for example, transmitting moral values to young boys), the Court has held that the group's expressive interests are strong and that the state's antidiscrimination interest is weak.

DALE CARPENTER

References and Further Reading

- Bernstein, David E., Defending the First Amendment From Antidiscrimination Laws, N. C. L. Review 82 (2003): 223.
- Brody, Evelyn, Entrance, Voice, and Exit: The Constitutional Bounds of the Right of Association, University of California Davis Law Review 35 (2002): 821.
- Carpenter, Dale, Expressive Association and Anti-Discrimination Law After Dale: A Tripartite Approach, Minnesota Law Review 85 (2001) 1515.
- Hunter, Nan D., Accommodating the Public Sphere: Beyond the Market Model, Minnesota Law Review 85 (2001): 1591.
- Koppelman, Andrew, Signs of the Times: Dale v. Boy Scouts of America and the Changing Meaning of Nondiscrimination, Cardozo Law Review 23 (2002): 1819.
- Vischer, Robert K., The Good, the Bad and the Ugly: Rethinking the Value of Expressive Associations, Notre Dame Law Review 79 (2004): 949.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club*, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)
- Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)
- Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston*, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)
- NAACP v. Alabama*, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)
- New York State Club Ass'n v. City of New York*, 487 U.S. 1 (1988)
- Roberts v. United States Jaycees*, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)
- See also Boy Scouts of America v. Dale*, 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group of Boston, 515 U.S. 557 (1995); NAACP v. Alabama Ex. Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958); Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984); Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)

PRIVATE POLICE

While the public police provide us with familiar symbols of government authority, they were not always the primary guarantors of security and order. Before public police departments became firmly established in American cities during the nineteenth century, individuals relied on the loosely organized constable-watch system, and also turned to the services of private guards and detectives. Yet even after the public police became widespread, the private assumption of policing tasks did not disappear. Indeed, in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, private police achieved great notoriety because of their employment by coal, steel, and other industrial interests in quelling labor disputes. Their often violent tactics prompted congressional investigations, first in 1892, and then once again in 1936. While these inquiries resulted in public rebuke, the private police did not disappear so much as they reduced or altered their involvement in labor unrest.

Despite this early infamy, private police today are employed in large numbers and play an important role in crime control. There are approximately three times the number of private security guards as there are public police, and reliable estimates suggest that the money spent on private policing is at least twice that spent on public police budgets. While some of the empirical uncertainty can be attributed to the absence of reliable data, another source of ambiguity can be traced to disagreement about the term's definition. While some use the term "private police" to refer to for-profit companies offering crime prevention and order-maintenance services, others also include volunteer neighborhood patrols and even private military companies.

Even if the focus remains on for-profit services, many legal, social, and political questions remain unresolved. While the Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments of the federal Constitution provide individuals with certain protections in their encounters with the public police, these protections generally do not apply to the private police. The state action doctrine of constitutional law limits the application of constitutional rights to actions of government and not to those of private actors. The main legal constraints on private police, then, arise from contract, property, and tort law, as well as the criminal laws that apply to all persons. State regulations of private police vary widely, and most focus on licensing requirements of prospective employees.

At the same time, private police are increasingly relied upon to perform tasks often identical to those of public police. Private police guard private property, and many investigate crimes and, in the aftermath of the September 11, 2001, terrorist attacks, engage in counterterrorist policing at the behest of their employers. Yet the appropriate role of private police in a democratic society remains controversial. Some defend their use as a private supplement to perceived inadequacies in the public provision of crime control or simply as a cheaper alternative. Others, however, see the use of force in private hands, without the direct oversight of public accountability, as a fundamental challenge to the traditional monopoly over the legitimate use of force in the modern nation-state.

ELIZABETH E. JOH

References and Further Reading

- Cunningham, William C. et al. Private Security Trends, 1970 to 2000: The Hallcrest Report, 1990.
- Joh, Elizabeth E., The Paradox of Private Policing, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 95 (2004): 49.
- Shearing, Clifford D. "The Relation Between Public and Private Policing." In Modern Policing 51, Michael Tonry and Norval Morris, eds., 1992.
- Shearing, Clifford D., and Phillip C. Stenning. Private Security and Private Justice: The Challenge of the 80s: A Review of the Policing Issues. 1982.
- Skllansky, David, The Private Police, UCLA Law Review 46 (1999): 1165.

PRIVATE POSSESSION OF OBSCENITY IN THE HOME

In Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a Georgia statute that made it a crime "knowingly" to possess obscene material. The decision had its roots in common law, as well as in earlier Supreme Court decisions.

A decade earlier, in Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957), the Court had held that while all "ideas having even the slightest redeeming social importance" are protected by the First Amendment, those protections do not extend to obscenity. The Roth Court explained that "implicit in the history of the First Amendment is the rejection of obscenity as utterly without redeeming social importance." This statement reflects the history of obscenity at common law: In the seventeenth century, British law created four new crimes that were designed to control the content of speech: obscenity, blasphemy, seditious libel, and criminal libel. The American colonists brought these crime labels with them to the new world; in the decades after the Revolution, which brought a new system of government and the adoption of the Bill of Rights, most of them fell into disrepute and disuse. Obscenity, though, survived and became the focus of a number of state and federal statutes adopted in the nineteenth century. Surprisingly, it was not until the middle of the twentieth century, in Roth, that the Court was required to decide whether the First Amendment barred prosecutions under these statutes; the Court held that it did not because the content of obscenity does not warrant such protection.

In 1968, Robert Stanley was convicted of possessing obscene material in violation of Georgia law and appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming his conviction violated the First Amendment. The Court noted that while obscenity is not protected by the First Amendment, none of its prior decisions addressed

"private" conduct; they all involved the propriety of regulating public actions such as distributing obscenity. Roth was not controlling because it dealt with regulating the commercial distribution of obscenity, not private possession. After noting that the Constitution protects the right to receive information and ideas, the Court explained that "in the context of this case—a prosecution for mere possession of printed or filmed matter in the privacy of a person's own home—that right takes on an added dimension. For also fundamental is the right to be free ... from unwanted governmental intrusions into one's privacy." It also explained that if "the First Amendment means anything, it means that a State has no business telling a man, sitting alone in his own house, what books he may read or what films he may watch. Our whole constitutional heritage rebels at the thought of giving government the power to control men's minds."

The Supreme Court rejected Georgia's argument that it should be able to protect individual minds from obscenity and held that the First Amendment prohibits "making mere private possession of obscene material a crime." The Court has applied this holding in subsequent cases, including Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002).

SUSAN W. BRENNER

References and Further Reading

- Easton, Susan M. The Problem of Pornography: Regulation and the Right to Free Speech. New York: Routledge, 1994.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Roth v. United States*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
- Stanley v. Georgia*, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

See also Ashcroft v. Free Speech Coalition, 535 U.S. 234 (2002); Bill of Rights: Structure; Child Pornography; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Defamation and Free Speech; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Obscenity; Obscenity in History; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957); Seditious Libel; Self-Fulfillment Theory of Free Speech; State Courts

PRIVATE RELIGIOUS SPEECH ON PUBLIC PROPERTY

Religious speech by private citizens or groups on public property is protected by the free speech and free exercise clauses of the First Amendment. While the free exercise clause may provide somewhat different or greater protection for worship services and other ritual speech on private property, cases involving private religious speech on public property generally have been decided under the free speech clause. They most often address whether religious speakers have the same access to public property as nonreligious speakers.

Government may not exclude private religious speech from public places or programs solely because that speech is religious or contains a religious perspective. Content based restrictions on religious speech in traditional or designated public forums are subject to strict judicial scrutiny. Such restrictions are constitutional only if they are justified by a compelling governmental interest and if they are the least speech-restrictive means available to achieve that interest.

Traditional public forums are public places traditionally open for private expressive activities, such as streets, sidewalks, and parks. Designated public forums include government property or programs that the government has opened for use by the public for expressive activities. The First Amendment generally requires that private religious speakers be treated no differently in traditional or designated public forums than private nonreligious speakers. The Supreme Court held in Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), that a state university that makes its facilities generally available to student groups may not deny equal access to student groups desiring to use the facilities for religious worship and discussion.

Granting religious speakers access to traditional and designated public forums on terms equal to those of nonreligious speakers does not constitute an unconstitutional establishment of religion. The Court in Widmar rejected the university's argument that it had a compelling interest in excluding such groups to avoid violating the establishment clause. By opening a forum to a broad class of religious and nonreligious student groups, the university would remain neutral, not placing its imprimatur on any particular group or ideology. The Supreme Court followed the same reasoning in Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens, 496 U.S. 226 (1990), which upheld the federal Equal Access Act. The act prevents any public school that receives federal funding and opens its facilities to noncurricular student groups from denying equal access to student religious groups.

The Court reasoned that the act did not advance or endorse religion in violation of the establishment clause because secondary school students can understand that a school does not endorse or support student speech that it merely permits on a nondiscriminatory basis. Courts have taken a similar approach in cases involving the private placement of religious symbols on public property. In Capitol Square Review Board v. Pinette, 515 U.S. 753 (1995), the Supreme Court held that a state could not deny the Ku Klux Klan permission to erect a cross in a state-owned plaza surrounding the state capitol that was used for other secular and religious public speeches and displays. The plurality and concurring justices agreed that the display did not create the perception that the state was endorsing religion, despite its close proximity to state capitol.

Even if the government property or program is not a traditional or designated public forum, excluding religious speakers may amount to impermissible viewpoint discrimination. Government may limit speakers or subjects in a nonpublic forum (or limited public forum) to preserve the purpose for which the property or program was created only if the restrictions are reasonable and viewpoint neutral. The Supreme Court in Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District (508 U.S. 384, 1993) held that a school district could not deny a private religious group permission to use its facilities after hours to show a film series teaching Christian family values when other social and civil organizations were permitted to use the facilities for their expressive activities. The Court assumed that even if the after-hours program was not a public forum, the ban on religious speech was unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination because it barred religious perspectives on family and child-rearing issues but allowed secular perspectives. As in Widmar, the Court rejected the school's establishment clause defense because no endorsement or support could be inferred from the state's neutral treatment of religious and secular viewpoints.

Religious speech also was considered a viewpoint in Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia (515 U.S. 819, 1995). The university used student activity fees to pay the costs of printing extracurricular student-edited publications, but refused to fund a student Christian magazine. The Supreme Court held that the funding restriction constituted impermissible viewpoint discrimination because it disfavored student publications with religious perspectives, while encouraging a diversity of views from secular student publications. The university would not violate the establishment clause if it paid the printing costs of the student religious publication because religious and nonreligious speakers would be treated evenhandedly, the students' religious speech could not reasonably be attributed to the school, and no state funds would go directly to the magazine.

Government may not avoid viewpoint discrimination by adopting facility-use programs that permit private religious speakers to hold meetings for discussion of secular matters from a religious perspective, but deny use for religious worship or instruction. The Supreme Court in Good News Club v. Milford Central School (533 U.S. 98, 2001) rejected such a distinction as constitutionally insignificant. The school offered a limited public forum for the use of its facilities after hours, but denied the use of such facilities to a private Christian children's club on the ground that their meetings involved religious worship, instruction, and prayer. Following Lamb's Chapel and Rosenberger, the Court held that the school discriminated against the religious group because of its religious viewpoint.

Private religious speech on public property generally enjoys the same constitutional protection as private nonreligious speech. To exclude such speech simply because of its religious nature or content constitutes impermissible subject or viewpoint discrimination under the free speech clause. While giving private religious speech preferential access to a public forum may violate the establishment clause, the Supreme Court repeatedly has rejected the claim that granting religious speakers equal or neutral access to a public forum constitutes an establishment of religion.

E. GREGORY WALLACE

References and Further Reading

- Brownstein, Alan, Protecting Religious Liberty: The False Messiahs of Free Speech Doctrine and Formal Neutrality, Journal of Law & Politics 18 (2002): 119.
- Gey, Steven G., When Is Religious Speech Not "Free Speech?" University of Illinois Law Review (2000): 379.
- Laycock, Douglas, Equal Access and Moments of Silence: The Equal Status of Religious Speech by Private Speakers, Northwestern University Law Review 81 (1986): 1.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education of Westside Community Schools v. Mergens*, 496 U.S. 226 (1990)
- Capitol Square Review Board v. Pinette*, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
- Good News Club v. Milford Central School*, 533 U.S. 98 (2001)
- Lamb's Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District*, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
- Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia*, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
- Equal Access Act, 28 U.S.C. § 4071

See also Public Forum Doctrines; Religion in Public Universities; Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995); Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES (XIV)

The privileges and immunities of citizenship are mentioned twice in the Constitution. Article IV, Section 2, states that "[t]he citizens of each state shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several states." Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution also refers to the privileges and immunities of citizens when it declares that "[n]o state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States ..." While these provisions reflect similar principles, they have their own peculiar histories and roles in protecting, or failing to protect, the civil rights and liberties of American citizens.

Article IV was part of the original constitution. That article, which also contained the full-faith and credit and fugitive slave clauses, was designed to protect citizens of one state when they journeyed to sister states. It reflected the founding period's state-based ideas of citizenship and federalism that protected state sovereignty and racial slavery. The Fourteenth Amendment, on the other hand, represented the rejection of slavery—the slavery-protecting version of federalism. The amendment was worded to protect U.S. citizens, including African Americans, from violations of their basic privileges even by their state of residence. Yet, despite these differences in origin, the two clauses have had a parallel history of confusion in constitutional law, a history rich in potential but impoverished in real legal effect. This entry will first consider the history of the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV. It will then review the history of the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Finally, it will conclude with a short discussion of the current role of both clauses in the protection of civil rights and liberties under modern constitutional law.

Privileges and Immunities under Article IV

The privileges and immunities clause of Article IV of the constitution received little comment during the Constitutional Convention and was modeled after a similar clause in the Articles of Confederation. The phrase "privileges and immunities" had long been used in Anglo-American law, including in colonial charters and documents, to reflect the basic rights, privileges, and immunities held by a British subject or a colonial denizen. It did not, however, have a precise meaning even then and seems to have gained longevity in large part because of its generality.

The central question raised by the vagueness of the clause is whether it requires only that states grant equality of privileges to persons from other states or whether it establishes a basis for securing fundamental privileges of American citizenship. Although scholars have found support for the idea that the drafters of the Constitution presumed that some unspecified level of fundamental rights, privileges, and immunities was inherent in free citizenship within each state, those drafters probably meant for the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV to focus on the nondiscrimination of outsiders with respect to rights and privileges that a state granted its citizens. This is, after all, one reason for the clause appearing in Article IV alongside other provisions involving state comity.

This point is also supported by Alexander Hamilton's comments in Federalist Paper Number 80, where, in justifying federal judicial power over disputes between citizens of different states, he declared that the privileges and immunities clause formed "the basis of the union" because it established "equality of privileges and immunities to which the citizens of the Union [were] entitled" in cases where citizens from one state needed to secure rights in their nonresident state.

The courts during the first part of the nineteenth century largely supported this nondiscrimination view of the Article IV clause, and in 1833 Justice Joseph Story wrote in his highly regarded Commentaries on the Constitution that the clause gave outsiders "all the privileges and immunities, which the citizens of the same state would be entitled to under the same circumstances." An alternative understanding of the clause occasionally appeared, however. For example, in Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546 (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823) (No. 3230), a lower court opinion written by Supreme Court Justice Bushrod Washington (the first president's nephew), the court described the clause as protecting rights that were "fundamental ... [and] belong, of right, to the citizens of all free governments; and which have, at all times, been enjoyed by the citizens of the several states which compose the Union." Justice Washington then enumerated several of these fundamental rights, including rights to life, liberty, property, the pursuit of happiness, commerce, and even suffrage, although he also granted that the states could place restrictions on these for the general good.

Justice Washington's language eventually became a touchstone for the authors of the Fourteenth Amendment. But the case did not represent a shift in judicial understandings of the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV. In the rather limited number of cases in which the clause has arisen, before and after the Civil War, it has mainly been in the context of persons asserting a right to conduct business or engage in leisure activities as out of state residents, with the Court focusing on whether a state has a substantial reason for discriminating against them in the way it allocates those privileges it chooses to grant to its citizens. As the Supreme Court said in Toomer v. Witsell (334 U.S. 385, 395) in 1948, the clause "was designed to insure to a citizen of State A who ventures into State B the same privileges which the citizens of State B enjoy." Thus, the modern Supreme Court has relied on the privileges and immunities clause to bar states from placing heavier tax burdens on in-state income earned by out of state residents or from granting employment preferences to in-state residents.

The Court has, however, found substantial reasons for discrimination against out of state residents in upholding state residence restrictions on voting, obtaining a divorce, and holding elective office. Most notably for the area of civil liberties, in Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973), a case decided on the same day as Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), the Court employed an Article IV analysis to reject a state restriction barring nonresidents from obtaining medical services of an abortion because the state permitted state residents to obtain that same medical service. Doe, however, remains a rare case of protection of civil liberties under Article IV's privileges and immunities clause outside the areas of business and employment areas that the Court has at times hinted are fundamental privileges, at least under Article IV.

Privileges and Immunities under the Fourteenth Amendment

If the fundamental rights interpretation of the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV has never really blossomed in the courts, it did have its day in the sun in the Civil War and Reconstruction congresses. For the Republican abolitionists who became the moving force during Reconstruction and spearheaded the Thirteenth, Fourteenth, and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution, the privileges and immunities of citizenship were seen as the legal language best designed to establish full citizenship for former slaves. The drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment's Section 1 cited Justice Washington's fundamental rights exposition in Corfield to illustrate the nature of the rights they were seeking to protect and, in particular, for why they chose language parallel to the Article IV privileges and immunities clause.

Some commentators see this evidence as indicating that the privileges or immunities clause was meant to establish and facilitate national protection of the rights, liberties, and privileges fundamental to American citizenship. This view is bolstered by the fact that the Fourteenth Amendment affirmatively establishes U.S. citizenship by birth in the citizenship clause. Only then does it assert that the privileges or immunities of that national citizenship cannot be abridged by the states, suggesting that the most important citizenship privileges were ones attaching to federal citizenship. Moreover, the subsequent congresses assumed that the clause, combined with Section 5 of the amendment, which granted Congress power to enforce the first four sections, enabled Congress to enforce access to a host of fundamental privileges.

Under the Civil Rights Act of 1875, for instance, Congress protected access for all citizens to public accommodations in inns, theaters, and public transportation, and in other statutes of the period Congress protected rights of assembly and rights to protection against violence intended to deny people their federal rights. Indeed, it has been effectively argued by scholars that the authors of the amendment assumed that the liberties and rights protected by the Bill of Rights as against federal action were, under the privileges or immunities clause, henceforth protected against infringement by the states as well. It would, however, take many years for the Supreme Court to rule that the Fourteenth Amendment applied the Bill of Rights to the states; even so, the Court did so piecemeal through the incorporation doctrine under the due process clause rather than through the privileges or immunities clause.

Despite the strong evidence that the drafters employed the privileges or immunities clause to grant affirmative rights to all U.S. citizens, some commentators have argued—not without support—that the clause merely expanded the equality aspects of the Article IV clause to ensure that all the citizens within a state would be guaranteed state-created privileges regardless of race. Certainly the clause was meant to include this right to equal treatment: It very specifically was drawn to combat the so-called black codes, laws written by postwar southern whites that aggressively restricted the freedoms of former slaves. Congress wanted a firm constitutional basis for its first civil rights law, the Civil Rights Act of 1866, which sought to protect the “full and equal enjoyment” of the laws and to give all citizens the rights of contract, property, and court access “as is enjoyed by whites.”

The Supreme Court, however, quickly quashed the fundamental rights and equality approaches. In the first case raising the issue after ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment (the Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36, 1872), the Court asserted that the only federal privileges and immunities under this clause were those that already existed in the Constitution or in other federal laws; the privileges and immunities fundamental to free citizenship were the stuff of state privileges and immunities. Four justices dissented, arguing eloquently, if at times disingenuously, in favor of a broader, fundamental rights view of the clause. Yet, when all was said and done, the Supreme Court in Slaughterhouse had taken the newly minted clause into a form of time travel whereby the state-based federalism central to the antebellum Constitution and interpretation of Article IV again controlled. The Court performed similar work in the Civil Rights Cases (109 U.S. 3) in 1883, in which the Court rejected congressional power to pass the Civil Rights Act of 1875 under the Thirteenth or Fourteenth Amendments, over a strong dissent by Justice John Marshall Harlan.

For a long time the Slaughterhouse Court’s defanging of the privileges or immunities clause seemed complete. The Court did little to revive the clause, choosing instead to promote its shifting versions of fundamental rights jurisprudence with the due process clause through the largely procapitalist jurisprudence of Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45, in 1905 and through the later development in the 1960s and 1970s of the right to privacy and other substantive rights in cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut (381 U.S. 479, 1965) and Roe v. Wade (410 U.S. 113, 1973).

Congress also chose other grounds on which to build legislative protections of rights and liberties, most conspicuously by using the commerce clause power to support civil rights legislation such as the Civil Rights Act of 1964. While the privileges or immunities clause received occasional attention in the Court—it briefly appeared in the probusiness case of Colgate v. Harvey (296 U.S. 404) in 1935, only to return to dormancy when the case was overruled four years later in Madden v. Kentucky (309 U.S. 83, 1940) and it garnered support of a minority of justices in some cases, including Edwards v. California (314 U.S. 160, 1941) and Hague v. C.I.O. (307 U.S. 496, 1939)—at no point prior to 1999 did the Court wholly embrace the clause as having independent value.

Current Status of Privileges and Immunities Clauses

Despite the fact that the drafters of the Fourteenth Amendment probably intended the privileges or immunities clause to be more important and protective of citizens' rights and liberties than the privileges and immunities clause of Article IV, the Supreme Court has treated the former clause as almost meaningless. The Court has in fact issued far more opinions employing Article IV to protect citizens than it has opinions using the Fourteenth Amendment's clause.

This appeared to change when the Court, in the 1999 case of Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489, relied on the privileges or immunities clause for the first time to protect a citizen's rights. In that case the Court upheld the right of citizens who had recently moved to a state to receive the same welfare payments as citizens who had resided in the state for a longer time. In Saenz, the Court attempted to clarify the constitutional basis for a general right to travel that the Court had long found to be essential and fundamental. The Court argued that while Article IV's privileges and immunities clause protected the citizen's right to travel into other states, the privileges or immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, along with the citizenship clause, protected the right to reside in any state of one's choosing and not be treated as anything less than a full citizen.

While Saenz renewed the possibilities of the protection of civil liberties by breathing some life into the privileges or immunities clause, the Court did not deal conclusively with the problem of when a state could justifiably burden the liberties or interests of a new resident. The Court argued that benefits such as education are easily "portable" and so could be restricted by in-state tuition preferences. In the Court's view welfare payments were not so easily portable—they were usually spent within the state—and could not be restricted to long-term residents. Importantly, however, the Court did not rely on a right to welfare or on the basic fundamental nature of subsistence payments to distinguish the benefits in Saenz, despite the fact that the closest precedent, Shapiro v. Thompson (394 U.S. 618) in 1969, had appeared to do just that. The Saenz Court instead focused carefully on the right to travel to a state and make it one's residence. Thus, while the case did reinvigorate the potential of the privileges or immunities clause, it did little to make the clause capable of the heavy lifting needed for a provision of the constitution to protect civil rights and civil liberties reliably.

The future of both clauses protecting the privileges and immunities of citizenship remains uncertain. In as much as the Article IV clause enables courts to police the burdens states place on out-of-state visitors and travelers, there is no reason to think the Supreme Court will change its approach by limiting or by expanding civil liberties protections. The clause will likely remain a means of enforcing equal treatment for nonresidents, but the substance of that treatment will be left to individual states.

The Fourteenth Amendment's clause is situated somewhat differently in terms of potential development. First, Congress could still try, under its powers from Section 5 of the amendment, to define and protect more specifically the privileges of citizenship—for instance, by specifically grounding privacy-protecting legislation in the clause. As seen in City of Boerne v. Flores (521 U.S. 507, 1997), however, the modern Court has not been very supportive of this type of congressional power under Section 5, and it is unclear how willing Congress would be to assert such power. Alternatively, the Court could push development of the law under the clause beyond what it did in Saenz. For example, it could use the language in some of its modern opinions under Article IV, in which the Court has hinted at a fundamental right to seek employment, to find such a right generally under the Fourteenth Amendment. Alternatively, the Court could, as Justice Thomas hinted in his dissent to Saenz, increase protections of property rights through this clause.

Finally, a Court more supportive of civil liberties generally could employ the clause to expand upon the liberties already recognized. None of these avenues seems likely, however. No matter how well one could articulate a broader meaning for the underutilized concept of constitutional privileges and immunities, it is most likely that the concept will remain one largely of historical study and unrealized potential.

JAMES W. FOX, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed. The Bill of Rights. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Curtis, Michael Kent. No State Shall Abridge. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 1986.
- Finkelman, Paul. An Imperfect Union: Slavery, Federalism, and Comity. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1981.
- Kettner, James H. The Development of American Citizenship, 1608–1870. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1978.
- Maltz, Earl M. Civil Rights, The Constitution, and Congress, 1863–1866. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1990.
- Ross, Michael A. Justice of Shattered Dreams: Samuel Freeman Miller and the Supreme Court During the Civil War Era. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 2003.

 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Colgate v. Harvey, 296 U.S. 404 (1935)
Corfield v. Coryell, 6 F. Cas. 546 (C.C.E.D. Pa. 1823) (No. 3230)
Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Madden v. Kentucky, 309 U.S. 83 (1940)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)
Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
Slaughterhouse Cases, 83 U.S. 36 (1872)
Toomer v. Witsell, 334 U.S. 385, 395 (1948)
 Civil Rights Act of 1866, Act of April 9, 1866, c. 31, 14 Stat. 27
 Civil Rights Act of 1875, Act of Mar. 1, 1875, c. 114, 18 Stat. 335
 Civil Rights Act of 1964, Pub. L. 88-352, Act of July 2, 1964, 78 Stat. 241

PROBABLE CAUSE

Probable cause is the standard of proof required, in most instances, for a valid search, seizure, or arrest. The text of the Fourth Amendment of the Constitution prohibits the issuance of warrants except upon probable cause. The Supreme Court has extended the requirement of probable cause to warrantless searches, seizures, and arrests. There are some exceptions to the probable cause requirement. In some instances, a reduced level of proof will justify a brief detention of a person or property. Some searches and seizures require no suspicion at all, although the Supreme Court has limited such suspicionless searches to situations involving special need.

In Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160 (1949), the Supreme Court explained the competing policy considerations involved with the probable cause requirement. Like the warrant requirement, it serves as a check on the power of the government to intrude on the privacy of the people. The American colonial experience with general warrants and writs of assistance—which could be issued without a showing of cause and without naming the thing or person to be searched or seized—in effect allowed the British government to search and seize any person or piece of property. The Fourth Amendment codified the intention of the Framers to end these practices and to permit intrusions into people's lives and liberties only upon a showing of more than mere suspicion. However, probable cause has emerged as a flexible standard that gives police the ability to investigate crime, arrest criminals, and seize evidence without being required to meet an overly burdensome standard. Probable cause is therefore a compromise. A stricter standard of proof would leave police powerless to investigate crime and arrest criminals. A lesser standard would give police nearly limitless authority to intrude on the private affairs of law-abiding citizens.

The Supreme Court has tried to avoid defining probable cause in a technical or legalistic fashion. An assessment of probable cause must sometimes be made in a split second. Accordingly, probable cause requires the officer or court to look at probabilities, not conclusive proof. Its substance is reasonableness, judged on the basis of the facts of each individual encounter and case. While probable cause requires more than mere suspicion, it does not require the same amount or quality of evidence as would be needed at trial. In hindsight, an officer or magistrate may have been incorrect in his or her belief as to the existence of an offense. However, probable cause is a standard that permits mistakes to be made, provided they are reasonable. It is a practical and common-sense standard that is flexible and does not require formal modes of proof.

To arrest a person, a police officer must have probable cause that a crime has been committed and that the arrestee is the person who committed it. An officer's subjective belief, hunch, or suspicion of wrongdoing is not sufficient. Rather, there must be objective evidence that would lead a reasonably prudent person to believe that the arrestee has committed a crime. If the officer does not have a warrant at the time of the arrest, Gerstein v. Pugh (420 U.S. 103, 1975) requires a judicial determination of probable cause if the arrestee will continue to be detained pretrial or if he or she is released with burdensome conditions.

A search or seizure of property likewise requires probable cause in most instances. The proof relates to the property, its connection to an alleged crime, and its present location. There must be evidence that would lead a reasonable person to believe that a crime has been committed and that the property sought is evidence of that crime. The police cannot violate a person's privacy in order to engage in a suspicionless "fishing expedition." Nor can they use an after-the-fact discovery of incriminating evidence or contraband to justify their initial, suspicionless intrusion. Furthermore, there must be proof that would lead a reasonable person to conclude that the property is where the officer believes it to be. The timeliness of the information used to support probable cause is therefore critical.

The fruits of an arrest or search made without probable cause will, in most instances, be subject to suppression under the exclusionary rule. A defendant challenging the probable cause for an arrest, search, or seizure will ordinarily file a motion to suppress. The court's duty in hearing the motion is to assess the quality and quantity of evidence known to the officer at the time of the search or arrest or presented to the magistrate at the time of the issuance of the warrant.

One of the Supreme Court's most recent pronouncements about probable cause occurred in 1983 when it decided Illinois v. Gates (462 U.S. 213, 1983). In Gates, a magistrate issued a warrant for the search of the defendants' home and car based on an anonymous letter alleging that the defendants were engaged in drug trafficking. The police corroborated major portions of the letter, including predictions the writer had made about the defendants' upcoming activities. The Court held that sufficient probable cause existed based on the "totality of the circumstances." It noted that probable cause is a "fluid concept," depends on the facts of a particular case, does not readily lend itself to rigid rules, and requires nontechnical, factual, and practical considerations. The Court rejected the so-called Aguilar-Spinelli test, which had required an issuing magistrate to assess the informant's veracity or reliability, as well as his or her basis of knowledge. Instead, the Court stated that these considerations are mere factors that should be considered in an analysis of the totality of the circumstances. The Court thus reaffirmed the principle that probable cause is a flexible standard.

The value of probable cause as a check on governmental oppression necessarily depends on the definition courts ascribe to it. Courts' adherence to a flexible standard based on probabilities—in deference to the societal value of enabling police to fight crime—means that there is a risk that innocent people and their property may be searched and detained.

LARRY CUNNINGHAM

References and Further Reading

Black's Law Dictionary, 8th ed., s.v. "probable cause."
LaFare, Wayne R. "Probable Cause." In Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment, 4th ed., vol. 2, St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004, Ch. 3.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964)
Brinegar v. United States, 338 U.S. 160 (1949)
Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975)
Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)
Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Airport Searches; Arrest; Arrest Warrants; Automobile Searches; Exclusionary Rule; General Warrants; Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975); Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Search (General Definition); Search Warrants; Seizures; Warrant Clause (IV); Warrantless Searches; Writs of Assistance Act

PROFESSIONAL ADVERTISING

Advertising by "professionals"—a term used here to denote occupations licensed by the state such as attorneys and physicians—was virtually prohibited by state laws from the early twentieth century until the U.S. Supreme Court recognized a limited First Amendment right in such activity. Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977), first explicitly applied free speech rights to the advertisements of professionals—lawyers in that instance.

The Court in Bates ruled that a total prohibition on price advertising of routine services by lawyers, enforced by the Arizona Supreme Court, violated the First Amendment. The Court rejected the argument that advertising by professionals was sufficiently different from other kinds that the decision in Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 748 (1976), did not apply to such advertising. In the Virginia case, the Court overturned its earlier rulings that "purely commercial" speech—that is, speech that simply proposes a commercial transaction—was not covered by the First Amendment. Although false and misleading statements in advertising are unprotected, regulations that "prohibited the free flow of truthful information" via advertising are subject to First Amendment scrutiny. The application of this standard to lawyers in Bates covers advertisements by other members of the licensed occupations, but the vast majority of cases involving professional advertising concern lawyers. In Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass'n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978), the Court held that in-person solicitation by lawyers was not given the First Amendment protection of lawyer ads because of the intrusive nature of such contacts. However, targeted solicitation of clients by mail was protected in Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Ass'n, 486 U.S. 466 (1988).

Lawyer advertising has always been subject to a standard not applied to other advertisements; statements of comparative quality of legal services are not allowed in lawyer advertisements (and presumably not in advertising by other professionals). The concern is that there is no meaningful measure of quality. In recent years, lawyer advertising has been subject to more intense review by the Court than other forms of advertising. In Florida Bar v. Went-For-It, 516 U.S. 619 (1995), the Court, upheld, by a five-to-four vote, a Florida rule that prohibited personal injury lawyers from sending targeted direct mail solicitations to victims or their relatives for thirty days following an accident or disaster.

There are strong ideological differences among those who advocate greater freedom for lawyer advertising and those who urge strong curbs on its use. The latter see advertising by attorneys as basically not “professional” and believe it is a factor in the low regard for lawyers that many people have. The counterargument is that the advertisements that are most frequently the subject of litigation are those of personal injury lawyers who generally represent lower income clients with less information and access to lawyers than more affluent people, who have access to more information about lawyers. Thus, limiting lawyer advertising will limit information about access to justice to those probably most in need of it.

GERALD THAIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bates v. State Bar of Arizona, 433 U.S. 350 (1977)
Florida Bar v. Went-For-It, 516 U.S. 619 (1995)
Ohralik v. Ohio State Bar Ass’n, 436 U.S. 447 (1978)
Shapero v. Kentucky Bar Ass’n, 486 U.S. 466 (1988)
Virginia State Board of Pharmacy v. Virginia Citizens Consumer Council, 425 U.S. 478 (1976)

PROFILING (INCLUDING DWB)

“Profiling,” as we will see, has evolved from an anticipated and lauded method of criminal investigation to a practice many equate with racism. Tracing the course of this development, it is important to stress three phenomena: the transition from reactive to proactive profiling; the shift away from profiling as the exclusive province of trained experts; and the widening array of criminal activities for which “profiles” have come to be constructed. Let us now consider the original conception of criminal profiling and then the emergence of racial profiling.

Criminal Profiling

Detective novels from the early 1800s (for example, the Sherlock Holmes novels) are appreciated for their detailing of the manner by which inspectors drew inferences from data and demonstrated intuition, insight, and perspicacity as they solved the riddles presented by criminal cases. This was “profiling” in its earliest form—that is, the technique of relying on clues, signals, and a sophisticated understanding of human behavior and tendencies to develop a frame for understanding the features and characteristics of the likely offender.

Criminal profiling as a law enforcement tool in the early part of the twentieth century was predicated on the same skills and abilities. The famous case of the “Mad Bomber” in New York City in the 1940s and 1950s was solved, for example, because Dr. James A. Brussel, a Connecticut psychiatrist, was able to look at the evidence and environment of previous attacks and thus construct a profile that (correctly) predicted the appearance, inclinations, and motivations of the attacker, leading police to narrow their search and eventually arrest the offender. Profiling of this sort was the province of experts, especially members of the Behavioral Sciences Unit (B.S.U.) of the F.B.I.—a group of individuals trained in psychology, criminology, and forensics who focused their attention on only specific types of crimes (for example, murders, rapes, and arson, usually by serial offenders) and responded to criminal activities in a reactive manner—that is, solving crimes that had already taken place.

But a different form of criminal profiling is carried out by police officers, a form that is more experiential (based on their time spent walking the “beat”) than scientific (based on academic studies and analysis) and one that is more proactive in nature—positioned to ward off threats and perceive potential dangers before they occur. (See Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 1968, for the Warren Court’s discussion on such police tactics and the constitutional nature of “stop and frisk” practices so long as the officer is able to articulate facts sufficient to demonstrate a “reasonable suspicion” that a crime has occurred or may soon occur.) In this regard, one of the central issues that makes profiling so complicated is that officers of the law are supposed to be observant, insightful, and wary; they are trained to notice things out of place, to rely on their intuition, and to have a heightened sense of suspicion due to their familiarity with the environment and its inhabitants.

One of the ways that such skills can discourage crimes from even occurring is that officers recognize individuals deemed “symbolic assailants” by the criminologist Jerome Skolnick in the classic study, Justice Without Trial. Describing such assailants, Skolnick explains that policemen develop “perceptual shorthand to identify certain kinds of people as symbolic assailants,” or people who “use gesture, language, and attire that the policeman has come to recognize as a prelude to violence.” Thus, criminal profiling in various forms is infused in the history and role expectations of elite forensic experts and ordinary “cops on the street.” But profiling, in practice, was transformed in its extension to new arenas and in response to different criminal endeavors.

Specifically, the “skyjacker” profile was instituted in the early 1970s to prevent airplane hijackings, which had increased significantly. Characteristics drawn from a study of all hijackings allowed a special task force to devise a profile of likely offenders and thereby reduce the number of hijackings by 50 percent the next year. The success of the skyjacker model inspired its application to the “War on Drugs.” In an effort to stem the flow of illegal drugs into the United States through the nation’s airports, the “drug courier profile,” devised by Detroit Drug Enforcement Agency (D.E.A.) Special Agent Paul Markonni, was instituted. This profile, culling together the “primary” (for example, traveling from or to “source cities,” use of an alias) and “secondary” (for example, use of public transportation, immediate phone call upon arrival) characteristics of likely offenders.

But the drug courier profile in particular differed in important ways from earlier forms. Most importantly, it was not created by experts trained in the social and behavioral sciences, but rather was assembled based on the perspectives of enforcement agents. It also took on a more amorphous form, marked by “characteristics” so open ended and at times internally contradictory that they allowed agents vast discretion in finding a “fit” or pegging individuals to one or more of the features of the profile.

Racial Profiling

What we know as racial profiling was born out of this increase in individual-level discretion as well as the extension of the “drug courier profile” to the nation’s highways and interstates, where it was interpreted and applied by an even broader array of individual agents. It is in this context that the term “driving while black” (DWB) emerged in the mid-1990s, as the highway patrol in several states (especially New Jersey, Maryland, and Florida) were criticized for pulling over disproportionate numbers of minority—primarily black—motorists and subjecting them to pretextual stops, or stops ostensibly related to violations in the motor vehicle code, but actually motivated by racial bias.

Of course, such intentions are difficult to prove, especially given the murkiness of U.S. Supreme Court opinions during the 1970s and 1980s with respect to the drug courier profile (for example, U.S. v. Sokolow, Reid v. Georgia), but more recently the decision in Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996), wherein the Court unanimously accepted the “could have” over the “would have” standard with respect to pretextual stops. This means that as long as an officer is able to articulate a particular violation of the motor vehicle code for which a driver could have been pulled over (regardless of whether or not the driver regularly would have been stopped), then the officer, in effect, has sufficient justification to detain the driver and investigate the situation.

The practical effect of Whren was to afford law enforcement agents greater discretion with respect to those who, within the larger domain of motorists who theoretically could be stopped, actually are stopped, thus simultaneously making allegations of racial bias more common and more difficult to prove. (It is worth noting here that one study of highway stops in Maryland found that of the 93 percent of motorists who “could have” been stopped [a group that was 17 percent African American and 74.7 percent Caucasian], 73 percent of those who were stopped were black, while only 20 percent of the stops involved whites.

As we conclude, then, let us consider the complicated question lurking in the background of this discussion: Is profiling “legal”? The short, but probably unsatisfactory, answer to that query is that it is hard to say. The Supreme Court has consistently declined to address this practice head on and rulings have seemed to run in different directions. What we do know is that for suspicion to be considered “reasonable” enough to constitute probable cause, an officer must still be able to articulate the particular features of the situation (see Terry v. Ohio)—as opposed to merely having an “inchoate hunch”—to a court that will contemplate the officer’s basis in light of the unique facts and the “totality of the circumstances” of the case. A “profile” predicated on the driving of a Toyota, membership in a certain ethnic group, or simply looking “funny” would thus be insufficient. But traveling with expired tags, dressing in a way inconsistent with the weather (for example, wearing a heavy coat during the summer), having out-of-state plates, acting erratically at the sight of an officer, etc. might be enough—in light of other specific facts of the situation—to generate reasonable suspicion and thereby pass constitutional muster.

Therein lies the rub: Profiles represent the composite of an officer’s experience in law enforcement. But one would also expect any experienced, seasoned, and savvy officer to be able to articulate the “particular” reasons for stopping a motorist, whether genuine or not—especially if (following Whren) nearly every vehicle on the road or every driver during the course of travel is guilty of some violation of the motor vehicle code and is thus within the class of offenders who could have been pulled over in the first place.

PROFILING (INCLUDING DWB)

BRIAN K. PINAIRE

References and Further Reading

- Harris, David, “Driving While Black” and All Other Traffic Offenses: The Supreme Court and Pretextual Traffic Stops, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 87 (1997): 544.
- Heumann, Milton, and Lance Cassak. Good Cop, Bad Cop. New York: Peter Lang Publishing, 2003.
- Skolnick, Jerome. Justice Without Trial. New York: Macmillan, 1967.
- Turvey, Brent. Criminal Profiling. San Diego: Academic Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Terry v. Ohio*, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
- Whren v. United States*, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)
- See also Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); Warren Court

PROFITT v. FLORIDA, 428 U.S. 242 (1976)

The death penalty does not violate the Eighth Amendment as long as certain minimal procedural requirements are met.

Charles William Proffitt was sentenced to death for committing a murder during the course of a burglary. He argued that his death sentence was unconstitutional because of the arbitrary manner in which the death penalty is imposed. The Supreme Court rejected his argument. Crucial to the Court’s holding was the fact that Florida had procedures in place to ensure that the death penalty was not imposed in an arbitrary and capricious manner. First, a separate evidentiary hearing was held after a defendant was found guilty, during which aggravating and mitigating evidence was presented. According to the Court, this ensured that the defendant received individualized consideration. Second, the trial judge was required to find that the aggravating circumstances outweighed mitigating circumstances in order to impose a death sentence. Finally, after death was imposed, the sentence was subject to appellate review by the state’s highest court.

The Court concluded that, as a result of these procedures, “it is no longer true that there is ‘no meaningful basis for distinguishing the few cases in which [the death penalty] is imposed from the many cases in which it is not.” This conclusion, however, has not been proven to be true and it remains just as difficult to distinguish the few cases in which it is imposed from the many in which it is not.

KENNETH A. WILLIAMS

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment: Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

PROHIBITION (1920–1933)

Proponents of Prohibition expected to end misery and boost the economic well-being of the nation by banning the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating beverages through the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution. The ban took effect on January 16, 1920, with the Volstead Act defining the legal features of Prohibition. Offensive enforcement practices subsequently created strong public opposition to the alcohol ban. Prohibition was repealed by the Twenty-First Amendment on December 5, 1933.

Prohibition had deep roots in American society. The temperance movement was one of the major reform efforts of the nineteenth century, with opponents of alcohol generally preferring persuasion over coercion. In 1851, Maine became the first state to ban the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages. Twelve states followed Maine’s lead as a desire for government interference in private life replaced an emphasis on individual will. By the time of the Civil War, these laws had disappeared because of public opposition or court rulings. In the 1880s, the prohibition movement revived.

The drive for a prohibition amendment to the Constitution began in 1913 following a string of state prohibition laws. State prohibition could not be effectively enforced with “wet” states next to “dry” strongholds. National prohibition was designed to outflank the wet states by imposing national authority.

Proponents of the law promised an end to the problems historically associated with alcohol: family abuse, poverty, crime, illness, and low worker productivity. On December 18, 1917, Congress passed the prohibition amendment and sent it to the states for ratification. The Eighteenth Amendment was formally ratified on January 16, 1919, and scheduled to go into effect one year later. Congress refused to wait for ratification. It enacted the Wartime Prohibition Act on November 21, 1918 (after the war had ended on November 11), which barred the sale of intoxicants beginning in July 1919. Congress passed the Volstead Act, officially known as the National Prohibition Act, to define alcoholic beverages. The definition of an alcohol content of 5 percent eliminated virtually all alcoholic drinks, including beer and wine, from production and sale as beverages.

Resistance to the law began almost immediately, in many forms. By allowing the home production of nonintoxicating cider and fruit juices, Prohibition created an extremely strong demand for grapes suitable for shipping to urban, ethnic neighborhoods. People accustomed to drinking wine with meals, such as immigrants from Mediterranean countries, were forced to produce their own wine to ensure an adequate supply of what they viewed as a necessary commodity. Additionally, local police were sporadic in their efforts to crack down on illegal traffic in alcohol and juries were reluctant to convict fellow citizens for behavior that did not seem especially criminal.

Enforcement of Prohibition was assigned to the Treasury Department. Field agents were empowered to declare as public nuisances buildings, vehicles, and other property used to manufacture, move, sell, or store illegal alcohol and to seize, sell, or close them for up to one year. To catch violators, the agents wiretapped telephones, conducted warrantless searches of automobiles, employed informers, and placed poisons in industrial alcohol. In one notorious case, Prohibition agents operated the Bridge Whist Club in New York City for several months and sold liquor to anyone who asked for it. The agents later made arrests with information gathered at the club. Not all violators were arrested, however. The Prohibition agents, exempted from civil service laws, were infamous for taking bribes. By 1931, over 8 percent of the agents had been dismissed for bribery or drunkenness.

Prohibition failed to eliminate drinking and create a more orderly society. Consumption of alcohol virtually stopped in rural states, but the refusal of many people in cities to alter their drinking habits created a ready black market for illegal liquor and contributed to the rise of crime syndicates. People had to pay more for alcohol and many chose to purchase products that offered more potency, including dangerous homemade moonshine. Black market distillers made liquor from potatoes, corn, and squash as well as industrial liquor, antifreeze, and paint. Many consumers went blind or died as a result of drinking such beverages. Crime patterns also shifted. Less serious crime, such as vagrancy and malicious mischief, did diminish by half, but crimes involving violence or theft of property increased by 13.2 percent during the Prohibition years, while homicides increased 16.1 percent and robbery rose 83.3 percent. The number of prisoners housed in federal prisons, reformatories, and camps grew from 3,889 in 1920 to 13,698 in 1932. Most federal criminal cases in the 1920s involved Volstead Act violations. Lastly, despite the arrests, it remained fairly easy to locate alcohol in cities. In the 1920s, it was rumored that the best way to locate the local bootlegger was to ask the cop on the street corner.

Opposition to Prohibition rose throughout the 1920s. The Association Against the Prohibition Amendment argued that giving federal and state authorities the power to control an individual's choice of drink put too much power in governmental hands. The Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform objected to government intrusion into private life. Worried about the effect of the breakdown of law and order upon children, they challenged the idea that all women backed Prohibition.

Upon taking office in 1929, President Herbert Hoover appointed the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement (Wickersham Committee) to study Prohibition. When the committee issued its report in 1931, it expressed support for the law but the individual statements of members revealed skepticism as to whether the law was enforceable at an acceptable cost.

By 1931, the U.S. was trapped in the Great Depression. In the midst of the economic crisis, many hoped that the return of alcohol industry jobs would assist recovery. The liquor trade had been the nation's seventh largest industry before law-abiding liquor-related jobs were eliminated. In 1933, Congress adopted an amendment repealing Prohibition. Most states offered voters slates of candidates in favor of and opposed to ratification of the repeal. Seventy-three percent of voters approved repeal and the Twenty-First Amendment became law.

CARYN E. NEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Kyvig, David E. Repealing National Prohibition. Kent, OH: Kent State University Press, 2000.
- Neumann, Caryn E. "The End of Gender Solidarity: The History of the Women's Organization for National Prohibition Reform in the United States, 1929–1933." Journal of Women's History 9(2) (Summer 1997): 31–51.
- Pegram, Thomas R. Battling Demon Rum: The Struggle for a Dry America, 1800–1933. Chicago: Ivan R. Dee, 1998.
- Sinclair, Andrew. Prohibition: The Era of Excess. New York: Harper and Row, 1962.

See also Search (General Definition); Search Warrants

PROOF BEYOND A REASONABLE DOUBT

Under the due process clause of the Fifth Amendment, no individual may be convicted of a crime unless the prosecution can prove his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. That standard is designed to reduce the possibility of false conviction by requiring jurors to acquit whenever there is reasonable doubt of the defendant's guilt, no matter how strong the prosecution's proof might otherwise be. The standard thus represents, as Justice Harlan wrote in the seminal case, In re Winship (397 U.S. 358, 1970), the "fundamental value determination of our society that it is far worse to convict an innocent man than to let a guilty man go free."

Although the Supreme Court has held that courts are constitutionally required to instruct jurors to apply the standard of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, it has never mandated a particular formulation of the standard. As a result, courts differ substantially in how they explain the prosecution's burden of proof to jurors. Most attempt to differentiate between reasonable and unreasonable doubts, instructing jurors that a reasonable doubt is "something more than a guess or a surmise" or "a kind of doubt that would cause a reasonable and sensible person to hesitate before acting upon a matter of importance in his or her own affairs." A minority of courts focus on how strong the prosecution's case must be for the reasonable-doubt standard to be satisfied, instructing jurors that they need to be "firmly convinced" of the defendant's guilt in order to convict. Finally, a few courts make no attempt to explain the standard at all, leaving it to jurors to apply the standard as they see fit.

Despite the Supreme Court's reluctance to micro-manage the reasonable-doubt standard, empirical research indicates that jurors interpret the government's burden of proof very differently depending on the kind of instruction they receive. One study, for example, found that mock jurors presented with a weak murder case never convicted when given a "firmly convinced" instruction, but convicted nearly half the time when given an instruction that focused on the definition of reasonable doubt. Another study found that nearly one third of actual jurors who were given an instruction that did not explain the reasonable-doubt standard believed that the burden of proof was on the defendant to prove his innocence.

These studies are indicative of the fact that jurors generally underestimate how strong the prosecution's case must be in order to satisfy the reasonable-doubt standard. The standard is the most restrictive in American law; judges generally agree that jurors should not convict unless they are at least 90 percent certain that the defendant is guilty. Nevertheless, jurors often set the threshold for proof beyond a reasonable doubt far lower, sometimes as low as 50 to 55 percent and rarely higher than 80 percent. Indeed, jurors often believe that the reasonable-doubt standard is no more demanding than the clear-and-convincing standard used in civil cases—the standard that the Supreme Court found inconsistent with the presumption of innocence in Winship.

KEVIN JON HELLER

References and Further Reading

- Shapiro, Barbara J. Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Probable Cause: Historical Perspectives on the Anglo-American Law of Evidence. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.
- Solum, Lawrence M., Refocusing the Burden of Proof in Criminal Cases: Some Doubt About Reasonable Doubt, Texas Law Review 78 (1999): 105–147.

Cases and Statutes Cited

In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)

See also Due Process

PROPORTIONAL PUNISHMENT

Western culture at its core embraces proportionality. The ancient Greeks, especially Pythagoras, saw the universe as a kosmos: well ordered, measurable, proportional. Good order could only be maintained by imposing limits on the chaotic and unlimited. It is this way, too, with punishment. Proportionality operates as an aspiration and limitation. Although, like-for-like, "an eye for an eye," exact 1:1 reciprocity was simplest, some crimes required less symmetric measures: "If the guilty man deserves to be beaten," Deuteronomy declares, "the judge shall cause him to lie down and be beaten with a number of stripes in proportion to his offense" or, in another translation, "according to the measure of his wickedness." The Magna Carta (1215) continued this commitment to proportionality in punishment: "A free man shall be amerced for a small fault only according to the measure thereof, and for a great crime according to its magnitude." But how does one compare the fault to the severity of the sanction?

The European Enlightenment embraced liberty and rationality. Instead of beating a person in proportion to the offense, the new punitive proportionality consisted of depriving the criminal of units of freedom. Thus, as Foucault described it, "The pain of the body itself is no longer the constituent element of the penalty. From being an art of unbearable sensations punishment has become an economy of suspended rights." The infant American Republic embraced this rational proportionality by building penitentiaries and substituting prison time for bodily punishment.

Although several early state constitutions specifically included proportionality principles—"All penalties ought to be proportioned to the nature of the offence," declared New Hampshire's in 1784—the U.S. Constitution nowhere explicitly commands proportional punishment. The Eighth Amendment, however, does prohibit "excessive bail," "excessive fines," and "cruel and unusual punishment."

In 1892, declaring the Eighth Amendment "directed" not only at torture, but "against all punishments that by their excessive length or severity are greatly disproportioned to the offenses charged," Justice Field, dissenting, would have prohibited Vermont from sentencing a seller of unlicensed liquor to 54 years at hard labor (O'Neil). Such a harsh punishment, "six times as great as any court in Vermont could have imposed for manslaughter" and "appropriate only for felonies of an atrocious nature," was "greatly disproportioned to the offense" and therefore "cruel and unusual." How can judges know disproportionality? The thought of imposing this punishment for that crime would cause "any man of right feeling and heart" to "shudder."

These last hundred years, the U.S. Supreme Court has divided sharply over whether the judiciary can determine that a popular, legislatively enacted punishment is or is not truly proportional to the particular crime to which it responds. Controversy still swirls about the constitutional status of "proportionality" for punishment generally and capital punishment particularly. In the leading case (Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957, 1991), the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed Michigan's right to mandate life without parole for simple possession of a little more than a pound of cocaine. "The Eighth Amendment contains no proportionality guarantee," insisted Justice Scalia, joined by Chief Justice Rehnquist. "There is no objective standard of gravity." So-called "proportionality" was a nonconstitutional means for justices to impose their "subjective values."

"Courts have not baldly substituted their own subjective moral values for those of the legislature," countered Justice White, joined by Justices Blackmun and Stevens, dissenting in Harmelin. Michigan, with no death penalty, could not constitutionally reserve the same punishment for drug possession as it had for first-degree murder. "The Eighth Amendment does not require strict proportionality between crime and sentence," declared Justice Kennedy, joined by Justices O'Connor and Souter, upholding Harmelin's life sentence but occupying middle ground. "Rather, it forbids only extreme sentences that are 'grossly disproportionate' to the crime." In the "rare case" where "a threshold comparison of the crime committed and the sentence imposed leads to an inference of gross disproportionality," a judge should compare "the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction and sentences imposed for the same crime in other jurisdictions." More recently in Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003), the court again split into three factions, a majority (five to four) affirming California's right to its popular "three strikes and you're out" life sentence for a career criminal whose latest crime was shoplifting three golf clubs.

Essentially unrevised for four decades, the Model Penal Code's "new approach" now calls for "punishment within a range of severity proportionate to the gravity of offenses, the harms done to crime victims, and the blameworthiness of offenders." The official commentary attacks "the toothless standard of 'gross disproportionality' that has taken root in federal constitutional law," while reaffirming an essential connection between proportionality and retribution. Just deserts should provide the floor and ceiling to a range of permissible punishments. The commentary continues:

[Although] moral intuitions about doing justice in specific cases are almost always rough and approximate, most people's moral sensibilities, for most crimes, will orient them toward a range of permissible sanctions that are "not undeserved." At the perimeters of the range, some punishments will appear clearly excessive to do justice, and some will appear clearly too lenient—but there will nearly always be a gray area between the two extremes.

Proportionality advocates are left with unsettling and unsettled questions in balancing the seriousness of the crime against the severity of the punishment. What makes a crime more serious—the defendant's intention and motives, his prior criminal record, the harm he caused? What makes a punishment disproportionately harsh? Although courts and commentators typically focus on the length of the prison sentence, Justice Field had located disproportionality in the "excessive length or severity." Severity of prison depends upon the quality of life inside, not only on how long but also on how intense the deprivation of liberty. Three years in a dungeon at hard labor might be more severe than twenty years in an air-conditioned cell with canteen privileges and color TV. Perhaps most intractable, how can a judge substitute an independent objective judgment of proportionality for the legislature's?

Pythagoras could only maintain the kosmos by going beyond the strictly rational to embrace an incommensurably richer real but “irrational” or “non-rational” realm. Centuries later, Plato and Aristotle emphasized equity—a nonrational, richer justice. Although a majority of the Court has adopted Justice Field’s “gross disproportionality” limit while also attempting to ban the emotional and intuitive from that assessment, justices really committed to “objective” Constitutional proportionality may also need to embrace Field’s intuitive, emotive measuring device or something like it: A punishment is grossly disproportionate and unconstitutional when the thought of its imposition for the particular crime would make any person of right feeling and heart shudder.

ROBERT BLECKER

References and Further Reading

- Blecker, R. “Roots.” In America’s Experiment With Capital Punishment, 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2003, Ch. 6.
Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003).
 Foucault, M. Discipline and Punish (A. Sheridan, trans.) New York (1979).
Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
Robinson v. California, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)
Rummel v. Estelle, 445 U.S. 263 (1980)
Solem v. Helm, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)
Trop v. Dulles, 356 U.S. 86 (1958)

See also Capital Punishment: Proportionality; Proportionality Reviews

PROPORTIONALITY REVIEWS

Under the Eighth Amendment, all criminal sentences are subject to a proportionality review—an evaluation of the appropriateness of a sentence for a particular crime. In deciding whether a particular sentence is appropriate, the Supreme Court has looked to the gravity of the offense and the severity of the penalty imposed for other crimes and to sentencing practices in other jurisdictions. The Court has occasionally performed proportionality reviews in order to determine whether a sentence is proportionate when applied to certain classes of offenders.

The Supreme Court has performed proportionality reviews of death sentences in several cases. It has held that a death sentence is not per se disproportionate to the crime of murder. The Court, however, has held that the Eighth Amendment does not require that a particular death sentence be compared to sentences that have been meted out in similar cases. Had it imposed such a requirement, a death sentence could have been reversed on the ground that similarly situated defendants were not sentenced to death. By statute or under their constitution, several states have required their highest court to perform proportionality reviews of death sentences as a means of ensuring that death sentences are not being imposed arbitrarily.

The Court has held that a death sentence is disproportionate to the crimes of rape and robbery. It has also held that the imposition of the death penalty would be disproportionate in the case of a person who participated in the commission of a felony but who had not killed, attempted to kill, intended to kill, or not acted with extreme indifference to human life. The Court has also held that because of their diminished ability to reason and lesser culpability, death is a disproportionate punishment for offenders younger than eighteen years old and for the mentally retarded.

Some jurisdictions have expanded the death penalty to include crimes not involving murder, such as espionage, treason, drug trafficking, and the rape of a child less than twelve years old. The argument will be made in the case of a defendant who commits one of these crimes that death is a disproportionate punishment for these offenders since their crimes do not involve the taking of human life. The Supreme Court will be forced to resolve these issues in the coming years under its proportionality jurisprudence.

KENNETH A. WILLIAMS

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
Gregg v. Georgia, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
Pulley v. Harris, 465 U.S. 37 (1984)
Roper v. Simmons, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)
Sinclair v. State, 657 So.2d 1138 (Fla. 1995)
Tison v. Arizona, 481 U.S. 137 (1987)
 Ala. Code 13A - 5-53(b)(3)
 Del. Code Ann. tit. 11, 4209(g)(2)(a)
 Ga. Code Ann. 17-10-35(c)(3)
 Ky. Rev. Stat. Ann. 532.075(3)(c)
 Wash. Rev. Code. Ann. 10.95.130(2)(b)

PUBLIC FIGURES

In New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964), the Supreme Court required that public officials suing for defamation prove “actual malice.” Subsequent appeals questioning whether the Times-Sullivan rule applied to public figures resulted in plurality opinions that left the law unsettled. In Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), and Associated Press v. Walker, 388 U.S. 130 (1967), the Court required actual malice. Chief Justice Warren’s concurring opinion defined public figures as those intimately involved in the resolution of important public questions or who by reason of their fame shape events in areas of concern to society. Another Supreme Court plurality opinion, Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc., 403 U.S. 29 (1971), appeared to require actual malice even when a private individual was suing, as long as the issue was one of public concern.

The Supreme Court next took up the issue in Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc., 418 U.S. 323 (1974), where it recognized a distinction between public and private figures. As to public figures, it found that individuals can be universal public figures due to general notoriety or limited public figures when they thrust themselves into a matter of public controversy. A public figure, whether universal or limited, must prove actual malice to recover for defamation.

Since Gertz, the Supreme Court has decided that a party to litigation is not necessarily a public figure (Time, Inc. v. Firestone, 424 U.S. 448, 1976) and that an individual who did not voluntarily thrust himself into a public controversy is not a public figure (Hutchinson v. Proxmire, 443 U.S. 111, 1979). Courts continue having difficulty distinguishing between private and public figures, with one lower court commenting it is “much like trying to nail a jellyfish to the wall.”

PHILIP L. MERKEL

References and Further Reading

- Dobbs, Dan D. The Law of Torts, 1174–1178. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2000.
- Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 2. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West, 2005, 23–24–23–82.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Associated Press v. Walker*, 388 U.S. 130 (1967)
- Curtis Publishing Co. v. Butts*, 388 U.S. 130 (1967)
- Gertz v. Robert Welch, Inc.*, 418 U.S. 323 (1974)
- Hutchinson v. Proxmire*, 443 U.S. 111 (1979)
- New York Times v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- Rosenbloom v. Metromedia, Inc.*, 403 U.S. 29 (1971)
- Time, Inc. v. Firestone*, 424 U.S. 448 (1976)
- Rosanova v. Playboy Enterprises*, 411 F. Supp. 440 (S.D. Ga. 1976), aff'd 480 F.2d 859 (5th Cir. 1978)

PUBLIC FORUM DOCTRINES

According to the public forum doctrines, the government may not exclude all expressive activities from property that it owns and manages. The Supreme Court first articulated this principle in Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 U.S. 496 (1939), where it struck down a municipal ordinance that prohibited citizens from assembling in public streets or parks without a permit. Writing for the plurality, Justice Owen J. Roberts noted that although the government holds literal title to streets and parks, citizens traditionally have had a right of access to these locations to gather and express their opinions. “Such use of the streets and public places has, from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights and liberties of citizens,” Justice Roberts explained. The Court voided the permit ordinance as an arbitrary limitation on speech because it gave city officials complete discretion to grant or deny permit requests.

More recently, the Court in Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators’ Association, 460 U.S. 37 (1977), identified three categories of public forums where speech activities may take place, each subject to different First Amendment rules. Traditional public forums include places such as streets and parks that historically have been associated with assembly and debate. Citizen speech within traditional public forums is entitled to the strongest First Amendment protection. The government may not close these quintessential public forums, nor may it impose content based restrictions on speech therein unless those regulations advance a compelling state interest pursuant to the strict scrutiny test. Other places identified by the Court as traditional public forums include open areas near a state capitol (Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229, 1963), public space surrounding a foreign embassy (Boos v. Barry, 485 U.S. 312, 1988), and public sidewalks adjoining the Supreme Court building (U.S. v. Grace, 461 U.S. 171, 1983). On the other hand, the Court ruled in International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee, 505 U.S. 672 (1992), that city airport terminals are not traditional public forums because they have not “historically been available for speech activity.”

The Court’s second forum category, limited public forums (sometimes also referred to as designated public forums), consists of government property that the state has chosen to make available for expressive purposes. Unlike the traditional public forum, the state is free to open and close limited public forums at its discretion. Nonetheless, the state may not impose content based restrictions on speech within a limited public forum unless those regulations are narrowly drawn to achieve a compelling state interest. The Court first recognized the limited public forum concept in Southeastern Promotions v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975), where it overturned Chattanooga city officials’ refusal to allow the musical Hair to be performed in a municipal auditorium. The Court held that the auditorium, which the city previously had rented for diverse activities, was a designated public forum and that the city’s decision constituted an unjustified prior restraint on speech.

Although traditional public forums must be open to all speakers, the government may impose reasonable access restrictions in limited public forums. In Widmar v. Vincent, 454 U.S. 263 (1981), the Court noted that although a state university had created a limited public forum by allowing student groups to conduct meetings on its premises, the university was free to deny nonstudent groups similar use of those facilities. The Court, however, invalidated as an unconstitutional content restriction the university's policy of allowing all student organizations except religious groups to use its meeting rooms. That limited public forums need not have a physical location was established in Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995). In that case, the Court held that by using mandatory student activity fees to pay printing costs for various student publications, the university established a "metaphysical" limited public forum for student expression. The university had committed unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination, the Court concluded, by authorizing the use of student activity fees to finance secular, but not religious, student publications.

Whereas content and viewpoint discrimination are forbidden in traditional or limited public forums, content neutral regulation of the time, place, and manner of speech will be allowed if the limitations serve a significant government interest, are narrowly tailored to achieve that interest, and leave open ample alternative channels for similar communication. For example, the Court in Ward v. Rock Against Racism, 491 U.S. 781 (1989), upheld content neutral city regulations that limited the volume of amplified music emanating from a limited public forum, in this case a city park bandshell.

The final forum category, the nonpublic forum, consists of publicly owned property that has not traditionally been used or set aside by the state for public expression. Speech in the nonpublic forum receives a significantly lower level of First Amendment protection. According to the Court in Perry, the state may restrict speech in a nonpublic forum if the restriction is "reasonable" and viewpoint neutral. Content based regulations on speech are therefore permissible in the nonpublic forum context. Places identified by the Court as nonpublic forums include army bases (Greer v. Spock, 424 U.S. 828, 1976), private homeowners' mailboxes (U.S. Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Association, 453 U.S. 114, 1981), and a public school's internal mail system (Perry).

The crucial question, then, under the public forum doctrine becomes how to distinguish a limited public forum, where speech receives a high level of First Amendment protection, from a nonpublic forum, where speech can be restricted for any viewpoint-neutral purpose deemed reasonable by the state. In answering this question, the Court has given great deference to the government's purported intent. In Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Education Fund, 473 U.S. 788 (1985), for example, a plurality of the Court upheld an executive order that excluded legal defense and political advocacy groups from participating in a federal charity drive. The Court accepted the government's argument that although it allowed certain "appropriate" agencies to participate in the drive, it never meant to create a limited public forum for charitable solicitation. As a result, although the government would not normally be allowed to exclude offensive speakers from a limited public forum, a danger exists that the government may be able to accomplish this result by simply denying any intention to establish a limited public forum in the first place.

NICOLE B. CÁSAREZ

References and Further Reading

- Cásarez, Nicole B., Public Forums, Selective Subsidies, and Shifting Standards of Viewpoint Discrimination, Albany Law Review 64 (2000): 501-581.
- Farber, Daniel A., and John E. Novak, The Misleading Nature of Public Forum Analysis: Content and Context in First Amendment Adjudication, Virginia Law Review 70 (1984): 1219-1266.
- Tedford, Thomas L., and Dale A. Herbeck. Freedom of Speech in the United States, 4th ed. State College, PA: Strata Publishing Inc, 2001.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boos v. Barry*, 485 U.S. 312 (1988)
- Cornelius v. NAACP Legal Defense & Education Fund*, 473 U.S. 788 (1985)
- Edwards v. South Carolina*, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
- Greer v. Spock*, 424 U.S. 828 (1976)
- Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization*, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
- International Society for Krishna Consciousness v. Lee*, 505 U.S. 672 (1992)
- Perry Education Association v. Perry Local Educators' Association*, 460 U.S. 37 (1983)
- Rosenberger v. Rector & Visitors of University of Virginia*, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
- Southeastern Promotions v. Conrad*, 420 U.S. 546 (1975)
- U.S. Postal Service v. Greenburgh Civic Association*, 453 U.S. 114 (1981)
- U.S. v. Grace*, 461 U.S. 171 (1983)
- Ward v. Rock Against Racism*, 491 U.S. 781 (1989)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)

See also Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction; Universities and Public Forums

PUBLIC/NONPUBLIC FORUMS DISTINCTION

The distinction between a “public forum” and a “nonpublic forum” is at the heart of “public forum doctrine”—the set of rules used by courts to determine when government may regulate speech on public property. If public property is deemed to be a “public forum,” courts are quite protective of speech and give heightened scrutiny to the government’s reasons for and means of restricting speech in the forum. (A public forum can be a “traditional” public forum like streets, sidewalks and parks or a “designated”/“limited” public forum like public-university meeting rooms and municipal theaters.) In contrast, if public property is deemed instead to be a “nonpublic forum,” then courts apply only a low level of scrutiny to the government’s speech restrictions on that property, requiring merely that the government regulation be reasonable in light of the purpose of the forum and not discriminate against a particular viewpoint.

Since speech in a “nonpublic forum” receives relatively little protection by the courts, freedom of speech depends very much on how a court initially categorizes the public property on which the government would restrict speech. “Nonpublic forum” serves as the default category for all public property that is neither a traditional public forum nor a designated/limited public forum. Thus, if the property has not been used historically for purposes of assembly, communication, and discussion (as a traditional public forum) or intentionally opened by the state for use by the public for expressive activity (as a designated or limited public forum), the property is classed as a “nonpublic forum.” Examples of nonpublic forums include airport terminals, polling places, prisons, military bases, lampposts, Internet access on computers in public libraries, political debates on public television, and the sidewalks leading up to a post office. The public/nonpublic forums distinction has long been criticized by judges, lawyers, and academics for being inconsistently applied and easily manipulated and thus for failing to safeguard speech, particularly from covert government viewpoint discrimination.

IRENE SEGAL AYERS

References and Further Reading

- Ayers, Irene Segal, What Rudy Hasn’t Taken Credit for: First Amendment Limits on Regulation of Advertising on Government Property, Arizona Law Review 42 (2000): 607.
- Gey, Steven G., Reopening the Public Forum—From Sidewalks to Cyberspace, Ohio State Law Journal 58 (1998): 1535.
- Montgomery, Suzanne Stone, Note, When the Klan Adopts a Highway: The Weaknesses of the Public Forum

Doctrine Exposed, Washington University Quarterly 77 (1999): 557.

Post, Robert, Between Governance and Management: The History and Theory of the Public Forum, UCLA Law Review 34 (1987): 1713.

Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech, vol. 1. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2003, 8:1–52.

Stoll, David A., Public Forum Doctrine Crashes at Kennedy Airport, Injuring Nine: International Society for Krishna Consciousness, Inc. v. Lee, Brook. Law Review 59 (1993): 1271.

Tribe, Lawrence H. American Constitutional Law, 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation Press, 1988, 986–997.

See also Categorical Approach to Free Speech; Designated Public Forums; Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496, (1939); Limited Public Forums; Public Forum Doctrines; Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819, 1995); Traditional Public Forums

PUBLIC OFFICIALS

In New York Times v. Sullivan (1964), the Supreme Court held that public officials suing for defamation must prove by clear and convincing evidence that the defendant acted with “actual malice.” Actual malice means the defendant knew the statement was false or acted with reckless disregard for its truth or falsity. It required this high degree of defendant culpability to protect the First Amendment rights of persons who criticize public officials and to encourage a robust debate on matters of public concern. Otherwise, citizens might be inhibited from criticizing the government. The Court was concerned that state defamation law would have a chilling effect on the exercise of freedom of speech and press.

Subsequent decisions have identified categories of individuals who fall within the definition of public official. They include elected officials on state and federal levels, candidates for public office, and government employees who appear to have substantial responsibility for control of public affairs. What is not so clear is which lower level government employees are public officials. In cases involving police officers, public school teachers, and principals, for example, lower courts have reached inconsistent conclusions.

PHILIP L. MERKEL

References and Further Reading

- Dobbs, Dan B. The Law of Torts, 1173–1174. St. Paul, MN: Thomson West 2000.

Veilleux, Danny R., Annotation, Who Is "Public Official" for Purposes of Defamation Action? American Law Reports (Fifth Series) 44 (1996): 193.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Monitor Patriot Co. v. Roy, 401 U.S. 265 (1971)
New York Times v. Sullivan, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
Rosenblatt v. Baer, 383 U.S. 75 (1966)

PUBLIC SCHOOL CURRICULA AND FREE EXERCISE CLAIMS

Public school curricular decisions have frequently been challenged by parents and students alleging violations of the free exercise clause of the First Amendment. The standard courts use to assess free exercise claims changed substantially with the Supreme Court's decision in Employment Division v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990). As a general matter, Smith made it more difficult to prove free exercise violation. However, plaintiffs have faced significant difficulties trying to win curriculum cases before and after Smith.

The Supreme Court has interpreted the First Amendment's religion clauses to mean that government must be neutral towards religion. (See Sch. Dist. of Abington Twp. v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203, 216, 1963; Comm. for Public Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756, 792-93, 1973 ["proper respect for both the free exercise and the establishment clauses compels the State to pursue a course of 'neutrality' toward religion"]; Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38, 60, 1985 ["government must pursue a course of complete neutrality toward religion"].) When it comes to the operation of public schools, the Court has recognized that judicial intervention requires "care and restraint" (Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97, 104, 1968), but it has also stated that "the vigilant protection of constitutional freedoms is nowhere more vital" than in public schools (Shelton v. Tucker, 364 U.S. 479, 487, 1960).

Until 1990, courts analyzing challenges to curricula under the free exercise clause used the test articulated in Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963). Under Sherbert, courts first examined the burden on the religious practices or beliefs of the party challenging the government action. If the burden was substantial, then the government needed to satisfy the strict scrutiny test: it had to have a compelling interest, and its practice had to be narrowly tailored to further that interest. (See, for example, Mozert v. Hawkins County Bd. of Educ., 827 F.2d 1058, 1063, 6th Cir., 1987 [citing Sherbert].) In cases involving public school curricula, courts measured the burden on religion by asking whether the curricula had a coercive effect on the student, forcing the student to declare his belief or nonbelief in religion or to compel the student to take action inconsistent with his beliefs (Mozert, 827 F.2d at 1063-64; Grove v. Mead School Dist. No. 354, 753 F.2d 1528, 1533, 9th Cir., 1985, cert. denied, 474 U.S. 826, 1986). When students were not forced to declare their belief or nonbelief or perform acts inconsistent with their beliefs, the government's compelling interest in providing quality public education was found to outweigh the alleged burden (Mozert, 827 F.2d at 1065; Grove, 753 F.2d at 1533).

In 1990, the Supreme Court decided Employment Div. v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872, 878-82 (1990), holding that a law neutral on its face and applied generally did not violate the free exercise clause, regardless of the law's burden on religion. The Court reiterated this in Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520, 531 (1993), holding that a "law that is neutral and of general applicability need not be justified by a compelling governmental interest even if the law has the incidental effect of burdening a particular religious practice." The Court in Smith distinguished free exercise-only claims from "hybrid claims" that combined a free exercise challenge with another constitutional claim, such as due process. In "hybrid rights" cases, courts could take into account the burden on the plaintiff's religion (Lukumi Babalu Aye at 882. After Smith, laws challenged on free exercise grounds alone must be upheld if they are facially neutral and generally applicable.

Since Smith was decided, most courts faced with free exercise clause challenges involving public school curricula have concluded that the issue is whether the curricular decision is facially neutral and generally applicable, rather than whether it imposes an unacceptable burden on the free exercise of religion. In Brown v. Hot, Sexy and Safer Productions, Inc., 68 F.3d 525, 530 (1st Cir. 1995), the court found that a one-day sex education program was a "neutral requirement that applied generally to all students" (Brown at 539). Because this requirement was neutral and generally applicable (and because it was not a "hybrid claim"—that is, the free exercise claim was not accompanied by another constitutional claim), the plaintiffs' free exercise rights were not violated.

In Axson-Flynn v. Johnson, 356 F.3d 1277, 1280 (10th Cir. 2004), a Mormon student challenged an acting class requirement that she be forced to use offensive words and take God's name in vain. Like the first circuit, the tenth circuit applied the Smith test and asked whether the requirement was neutral and generally applicable. On the facts, the court of appeals held that the plaintiff was entitled to try her claim that the requirement she adhere to the script during an acting class was not truly neutral and generally applicable, but instead disguised religious discrimination (Axson–Flynn, at 1294).

At least one circuit has continued to use the Sherbert balancing test, even after the decision in Smith. The seventh circuit heard a free exercise clause challenge to public school curriculum in Fleischfresser v. Dirs. of Sch. Dist. 200, 15 F.3d 680 (7th Cir. 1994). The court found that the burden on the parents was “at most, minimal,” finding that the reading program at issue did not “compel the parents or children to do or refrain from doing anything of a religious nature” (Fleischfresser, 15 F.3d at 690). Applying the Sherbert test without discussing why Smith did not apply, the seventh circuit held that a reading program that did not compel or coerce students did not violate the free exercise clause.

Regardless of whether the Sherbert or the Smith test is applied, it is apparent that the Court’s more fundamental principle of neutrality towards religion has been the key issue in free exercise clause cases involving public school curricula. Such challenges have tended to fail under either test, unless the plaintiff can show (as was claimed in Axson–Flynn) that school officials have departed from the neutrality demanded by the First Amendment.

SAMUEL A. MARCOSSON

References and Further Reading

- Blumhofer, Edith L., ed. Religion, Education, and the American Experience: Reflections on Religion and American Public Life. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2002.
- Lechlitter, Michael E., Note: The Free Exercise of Religion and Public Schools: The Implications of Hybrid Rights on the Religious Upbringing of Children, Michigan Law Review 103 (2005): 2209–2241.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Axson–Flynn v. Johnson*, 356 F.3d 1277 (10th Cir. 2004)
- Brown v. Hot, Sexy and Safer Productions, Inc.*, 68 F.3d 525 (1st Cir. 1995)
- Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. City of Hialeah*, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
- Comm. for Public Educ. & Religious Liberty v. Nyquist*, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)
- Employment Division v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Epperson v. Arkansas*, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
- Fleischfresser v. Dirs. of Sch. Dist. 200*, 15 F.3d 680 (7th Cir. 1994)
- Grove v. Mead School Dist. No. 354*, 753 F.2d 1528 (9th Cir. 1985), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 826 (1986)
- Mozert v. Hawkins County Bd. of Educ.*, 827 F.2d 1058 (6th Cir. 1987)
- Sch. Dist. Of Abington Twp. v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)

- Shelton v. Tucker*, 364 U.S. 479 (1960)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
- Wallace v. Jaffree*, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

PUBLIC TRIAL

The right of a criminal defendant to a public trial is found in the Sixth Amendment to the Constitution, which states that “in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a public and speedy trial.” This right has been made applicable to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The right to a public trial is derived from English common law, where the practice of holding open trials predated even the rights now guaranteed to criminal defendants by the Constitution.

Several purposes underlie the utility of a public trial in American society. Opening trials to the public protects the rights of the defendant, in that public scrutiny will encourage judges and prosecutors to ensure that trials are fundamentally fair. In addition, public trials reinforce the public’s faith in the fairness of the judicial system. Knowledge of the ability to attend criminal trials allows for public confidence that the judicial process deals with crime in a manner that takes into account the interests of the accused and the public. Furthermore, full knowledge of trial procedures and outcome allows the community to react to and process the resolution of criminal acts that disrupt the fabric of lawful society.

Courts have dealt with the right to a public trial in the contexts of when a defendant can request a closed trial and when the government can close a trial over the objection of the defendant. The Supreme Court has held that the right to a public trial is a personal right of the defendant that he can waive in conjunction with the prosecution and the court. Several reasons exist to encourage a criminal defendant to request a closed trial, chief among these the desire to avoid negative publicity that may affect the impartiality of the proceedings. Nevertheless, members of the press argue that the First Amendment grants a right of access to judicial proceedings. In response to these arguments, the Supreme Court has held that a defendant can request a closed trial only after specific findings of a substantial probability that the defendant’s case will be prejudiced by negative publicity and that no reasonable alternatives exist to protect his or her rights.

Conversely, criminal defendants have challenged the propriety of the government’s ability to close judicial proceedings to the public. The government’s reasons for wanting a closed trial may include the need to protect sensitive government information, the desire to protect the identity of witnesses, and the desire to protect juveniles within the justice system (especially as victims and witnesses). Because the right to a public trial is a clearly delineated constitutional right, courts have held that the government can close a trial only when a compelling government interest exists. Furthermore, the means and methods of closing the trial must be narrowly tailored to accomplish that interest. Finally, the government must consider alternative methods, short of closing a trial to the public, to achieve the compelling interest.

ANN B. CHING

References and Further Reading

- Gannett Co. v. DePasquale*, 443 U.S. 368 (1979).
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 464 U.S. 501 (1984) (Press Enterprise I).
Press-Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986) (Press-Enterprise II).
Waller v. Georgia, 467 U.S. 39 (1984).

Statutes and Cases Cited

- U.S. Constitution, Amendment VI
 U.S. Constitution, Amendment XIV

See also Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Bill of Rights; Structure; Cameras in the Courtroom; Classified Information; English Tradition of Civil Liberties; Free Press/Fair Trial; Gag Orders in Judicial Proceedings; Grand Jury; Jury Trial; Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Right of Access to Criminal Trials

PUBLIC VULGARITY AND FREE SPEECH

Although speech that meets the legal definition of obscenity can be proscribed by the state, the public utterance of words that are merely profane or vulgar is generally protected by the First Amendment. This was established in the landmark case of Cohen v. California (1971), in which the Supreme Court overturned the breach-of-the-peace conviction of a man arrested in a Los Angeles courthouse for wearing a jacket emblazoned with the words "Fuck the Draft." While acknowledging that the jacket displayed an "unseemly expletive," the Court held that the First Amendment strictly limits the government's ability to remove "unseemly" words from public discourse. This is so, Justice John Marshall Harlan II reasoned in his opinion for the Court, because the First Amendment requires that questions of taste be left in the hands of individuals and not dictated by the state. It would be impossible for the government to distinguish objectively between offensive and nonoffensive speech because, in Justice Harlan's words, "one man's vulgarity is another man's lyric."

Additionally, the Court recognized that the First Amendment protects the emotional as well as the rational content of public communication, noting that "words are often chosen as much for their emotive as their cognitive force." Audience members who object to vulgar language in public places must learn to avert their eyes, the Court concluded.

Similarly, the Court held in Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988), that the publication of an insulting parody of a public figure was protected by the First Amendment. The Court stated in its unanimous decision that the "fact that society may find speech offensive is not a sufficient reason for suppressing it."

Crude remarks meant to provoke a violent response from the listener are theoretically regulable if they rise to the level of "fighting words," which the Supreme Court held are unprotected by the First Amendment in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942). Since Chaplinsky was decided, however, the Court has taken an extremely narrow approach to the fighting words doctrine, holding in later cases that it applies only to words likely to cause an immediate breach of the peace uttered in face-to-face encounters. Merely vulgar or distasteful language would rarely, if ever, qualify under this definition of fighting words.

In certain situations involving captive audiences, the Court has allowed the government to protect unwilling listeners from public vulgarity. For example, in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978), the Court upheld an FCC order requiring broadcasters to limit nonobscene, "indecent" programming to late-night hours. The Court based its decision on what it termed the "pervasive" nature of the broadcast media, which intrudes into private homes, as well as on broadcasting's accessibility to children. Members of a captive audience cannot simply close their eyes or ears when confronted with vulgar speech, according to the Court. Rather, Justice John Paul Stevens wrote that "[t]o say that one may avoid further offense by turning off the radio when he hears indecent language is like saying that the remedy for an assault is to run away after the first blow."

NICOLE B. CÁSAZ

References and Further Reading

- Bezanson, Randall P. Speech Stories: How Free Can Speech Be? New York: New York University Press, 1998.
 Hentoff, Nat. Free Speech for Me—But Not for Thee: How the American Left and Right Relentlessly Censor Each Other. New York: Harper Collins Publishers Inc., 1992.

Kalven, Harry Jr. A Worthy Tradition: Freedom of Speech in America. New York: Harper & Row, Publishers, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)

Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)

FCC v. Pacifica Foundation, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)

Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)

See also Campus Hate Speech Codes; Hate Speech; Threats and Free Speech

PULLEY v. HARRIS, 465 U.S. 37 (1984)

In this case the Supreme Court refused to mandate a comparative proportionality review by an appellate court before a death sentence is carried out. The defendant was convicted of capital murder as a result of the killing of two teenage boys in order to use their car in a bank robbery. The defendant argued that the Eighth Amendment required that a particular death sentence had to be compared to sentences imposed in similar cases whenever so requested by the defendant in order to ensure that the death penalty was not being imposed discriminatorily or arbitrarily.

Although several states required their highest court to perform such a review, the Supreme Court refused to hold that a proportionality review was constitutionally required whenever the defendant requested it because there were other procedures in place that minimized the risk of arbitrary, capricious, or freakish sentences. For instance, a defendant could not be sentenced to death unless the jury found at least one special circumstance—for instance, that the murder was committed for profit or that the victim was a police officer—beyond a reasonable doubt. Thus, the death penalty was limited to a small subclass of cases. Furthermore, each death sentence had to be reviewed by the trial judge and the state supreme court in order to ensure that the evidence supported the finding of special circumstances before it could be carried out.

As a result of this and other holdings of the Supreme Court, a state's death penalty scheme will pass constitutional muster as long as the state limits death sentences to a small class of cases, provides a bifurcated proceeding to consider the issues of guilt-innocence and sentencing separately, and provides for trial court and appellate review of the sentence.

KENNETH A. WILLIAMS

See also Capital Punishment; Capital Punishment and Equal Protection Clause Cases; Capital Punishment:

Due Process Limits; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Capital Punishment: History and Politics

PURITANS

The Puritans were a group of religious reformers that arose in England during the late sixteenth century. They wanted to reform the Church of England and bring it closer to the views of John Calvin. Amid persecution for their religious views, the Puritans emigrated to British North America. The church leaders believed that they carried the true message of God and that the Lord would bless them as they established the “true” church, away from the bishops of the Church of England. The Puritans have often been subjected to fierce criticism for being intolerant of others and enforcing their views on the population.

The leader of the Puritan mission to the New World was John Winthrop, who shrewdly managed to bring with him the royal charter of the colony. By having possession of the royal charter, the Puritans were able to establish their society with little interference from the Crown. As the Puritans sailed towards Massachusetts Bay in 1630, Winthrop preached a sermon entitled, “A Model of Christian Charity,” in which he outlined the purpose of the Puritan mission. This mission had the goal of founding the “city on a hill” where the world could view a place where God blessed those living under the covenant of grace.

Puritan family life developed around the ideas of a close-knit community revolving around family life and the church. Families in New England were extremely patriarchal, and often the father closely monitored the fates of his children. One way that fathers used their control was to refuse to give land grants to their sons until their deaths, therefore forcing adult sons to live with them or take on risky ventures of their own.

As the Puritan church evolved, the most important point became the idea of conversion. The idea was that if a person did not have a life-changing moment, then his or her salvation was not real. After listening to captivating sermons describing fantastic conversion experiences, the Puritans began to judge their worthiness by the conversion experience. Churches began to test members for the validity of their conversions and soon developed a standard within the church. Puritans used their experiences to try to establish themselves as a “saint,” or person who had achieved salvation by church guidelines. People who fell outside church guidelines were often pushed to the margins of Puritan society.

PURITANS

Every important decision made in the Puritan community was made at the meeting house, which was used as a place of worship and business. Usually on Mondays, citizens met to make decisions that affected the town. They decided on such things as which roads needed repairing and which new lands needed surveying. During these meetings the leaders decided who got land, and how much. Most of these decisions were made by the leadership of the community: a group of men known as “selectmen.” The meeting house belonged to all the people and, whether a person belonged to the church or not, everyone paid for its upkeep.

The Puritans of New England developed a society that kept religion at its core. The founders of the Puritan church succeeded, at least initially, in founding a society where religion was at the center of people’s lives. However, the strict rules of the Puritan church led to a great deal of discontent, seen in the persons of Roger Williams and Anne Hutchinson. The case of Hutchinson especially demonstrates the patriarchal dominance of Puritan society. She claimed that Puritan leaders were teaching a false gospel and leading people to hell. Hutchinson was put on trial and, because she claimed to have spoken to God directly, was banished.

Perhaps the leading tragedy of the Puritan era was the various witch trials culminating with the Salem witch trials. The idea of putting men and women on trial for their ideas is seen as very incongruous to the notion of civil liberties in the United States. Often women aroused suspicion as being witches by “flamboyant dress” or being outspoken in the community. The case of Bridget Bishop exemplifies how the civil liberties of many were violated in Puritan society. Bishop violated many of the “norms” of Puritan women. She wore colorful clothing, was married three times, and owned a tavern. She was accused of being a witch, and many male witnesses testified to seeing visions of her at night. Bishop was convicted and the town of Salem witnessed her hanging in 1692.

The Puritan communities in North America played an important part in the development of American society. However, many of their views, such as the strict enforcement of church law and patriarchal ideals, took away the rights of many people.

CHRISTOPHER R. TINGLE

References and Further Reading

- Greven, Philip. Four Generations: Population, Land, and Family in Colonial Andover, Massachusetts: Population, Land, and Family Colonial Andover, Massachusetts. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1972.
- Lockridge, Kenneth. A New England Town: The First Hundred Years, Dedham, Massachusetts, 1636–1736. New York: Norton Press, 1985.
- Morgan, Edmund. Visible Saints: The History of a Puritan Idea. Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1965.

QUAKERS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Quaker struggle for religious liberty gave rise to the twin constitutional pillars of religious liberty in American jurisprudence and freedom of individual conscience and separation of church and state.

Adherents of the Quaker faith in England were persecuted due to their open refusal to subscribe to the tenets of the state-sponsored Anglican Church. Friends were imprisoned for violating laws prohibiting attendance at Quaker meetings and for refusing to take oaths; they were fined for declining to pay tithes to the Church of England. One of the most outspoken Quakers, William Penn, was expelled from Christ Church College at Oxford University for publicly criticizing the religious ceremonies of the Anglican Church and imprisoned six times for advocating religious liberty. Penn was internationally recognized for his views on religious toleration and his many writings revolved around two themes that later would be codified as bedrock American constitutional principles. The first was that religious obligations are beyond the control of the state because sovereignty over conscience rests in God, not in any human or governmental authority. Second, the stability of the body politic is enhanced, rather than threatened, by religious toleration and the resultant diversity of faith traditions.

The persecution of Quakers was not uniformly remedied by their journey to the American colonies. In 1656, the General Court of the Massachusetts Bay colony passed the first anti-Quaker legislation, which authorized the jailing, whipping, and deportation of Quakers who found their way into the colony, as well as the imprisonment of persons who assisted the infiltration of the Quakers. Legislation in the succeeding two years provided for increasing punishment of banished Quakers who returned, ranging from lopping off an ear and boring a hole in the tongue with a hot iron to death by hanging. Quakers were expelled as nonbelievers in Puritan Connecticut and suffered persecution in the Virginia colony as well.

Safe haven for Quakers in colonial America was afforded when William Penn received the charter to Pennsylvania from King Charles II in 1681 as repayment of a debt of sixteen thousand pounds the King owed to Penn's father. Pennsylvania colonial laws protected the right to pursue Quaker religion and exempted the Quakers from general secular obligations that conflicted with their religious tenets, such as administering or taking legal oaths. Quaker fidelity to pacifism was shielded initially by the absence of any militia and later by laws providing for a voluntary armed force.

While sheltering Quakers from religious persecution, Penn did not aspire simply to create a Quaker analog to the established Anglican Church. Instead, he actively recruited worshipers outside the Quaker faith from all parts of Europe. As a consequence, the colony was a bastion of religious pluralism.

Pennsylvania became home to Penn's "holy experiment," a moral yet tolerant society granting freedom of individual conscience to its colonists with no state-sponsored or government-financed religion.

Pennsylvania colonial charters generously protected individual religious liberty against governmental interference and repudiated governmental levies to subsidize sectarian institutions. In 1701, Penn promulgated the Charter of Liberties, which remained in effect until 1776, when the first Pennsylvania constitution was written. The very first provision of the charter enshrined individual religious liberty, providing that “[N]oe person ... who shall Confesse and acknowledge one Almighty God the Creator upholder and Ruler of the world and professe him or themselves Obligated to live quietly under the Civill Government, shall be in any case molested or prejudiced in his ... person or Estate because of his ... Conscientious perswasion or practice.” The charter likewise ensured separation between church and state, guaranteeing that no citizen “be compelled to frequent or maintaine any Religious place or Ministry contrary to his ... mind or doe or suffer any other act or thing, contrary to theire Religious perswasion.” Pennsylvania became one of only four colonies without an established state church and afforded greater asylum to religious liberty than the laws of any other colony.

Even though the Quakers ceased to control the state government following the Revolutionary War, the Pennsylvania constitution perpetuated the twin prongs of Penn’s vision. Section 2 of the Pennsylvania Declaration of Rights of the 1776 Constitution codified the broad ambit of religious liberty for minority and majority faiths alike, protecting the “natural and inalienable right to worship Almighty God to the dictates of their own consciences” free of governmental interference or control of that right. At the same time, those who believed in God were protected from compulsion to “attend any religious worship, or erect or support any place of worship, or maintain any ministry.” The 1776 Constitution continued to respect the Quaker religious objection to military service, exempting “any man who is conscientiously scrupulous of bearing arms from being compelled to do so.”

Dual protections of religious liberty similar to those embodied in the Pennsylvania colonial charters and the state’s 1776 constitution were added to the United States Constitution through the Bill of Rights. The First Amendment provides generally that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” Notwithstanding the ratification of the federal Bill of Rights in 1791 and twentieth-century United States Supreme Court decisions finding these rights to guard against state as well as federal incursion, the more explicit provisions for freedom of individual conscience and separation of church and state in the Pennsylvania constitution continue to provide independent and more overarching protection of religious liberty to the citizens of Pennsylvania. Thus, even today, residents of the commonwealth remain beneficiaries of the Quaker legacy of religious liberty.

GARY S. GILDIN

References and Further Reading

- Brinton, Howard. Friends for 300 Years. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1952.
- Dunn, Richard S., and Mary Maples Dunn, eds. The World of William Penn. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1986.
- Gormley, Ken, Jeffrey Bauman, Joel Fishman, and Leslie Kozler, eds. The Pennsylvania Constitution: A Treatise on Rights and Liberties. Philadelphia: George T. Bisel Company, 2004.
- Noonan, John T., Jr. The Lustre of our Country: The American Experience of Religious Freedom. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Sharpless, Isaac. A History of Quaker Government in Pennsylvania. Philadelphia: T. S. Leach & Co., 1900.

QUARTERING OF TROOPS (III)

The Third Amendment to the Constitution bans the quartering of troops in the homes of American citizens without the owner’s consent during times of peace, but it allows the legislature to prescribe quartering by law in times of war. At the time of independence, Americans complained that the British had imposed the presence of troops into colonial homes and had kept a standing army in the colonies without the consent of the legislatures of the colonies. This grievance was listed in the Declaration of Independence, decrying the practice as “rendering the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power” by quartering large numbers of troops in the American colonies, with the only check on their military power “mock Trial.” British troops in colonial homes were effectively above the law. The effect of the quartering of troops in the colonies ranged from mere inconvenience to murders that went unpunished. Because the quartering of troops was one of the principal objections to British rule that led to the revolution, it is not surprising that it was contained in the Bill of Rights.

The troop quartering amendment can be viewed as a compromise between competing values. On one hand, the framers had come to value privacy in the home, the often quoted notion that “a man’s home is his castle.” The excesses of the British made it clear that this right had to be protected within the Constitution. On the other hand, there was a realistic notion prevalent that marching troops, in times of peace or war, had to have a place to stay, a position advocated by pragmatic founding father Roger Sherman of Connecticut. The Framers recognized that the demands of war would raise the need for army presence in the country among the citizenry.

Therefore, the Third Amendment balances between the goal of privacy and military exigencies of the future by banning the quartering of troops during peace outright, while leaving wartime quartering to legislators, who could weigh the need for quartering and provide safeguards where necessary. This reflects the fact that, when individual rights are balanced against a wartime need to station troops, the governmental interest in the military trumps. Such balancing goes on often in constitutional law, where the nature of the constitutional right is weighed against the seriousness of the governmental interest. The Third Amendment effectively means that American citizens will not have to provide for troops, unless war-based demands outweigh that fundamental right of privacy.

As for the contemporary legacy of the Third Amendment, it is notable that the Third Amendment was one of the constitutional clauses cited by Justice William O. Douglas in the landmark privacy case Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), which held that there was a fundamental right to privacy that banned governmental regulation of the use of contraceptives in the bedroom. The Griswold case later was the precedent upon which was built Roe v. Wade, which found that a woman's right to choose whether to have an abortion was within the fundamental right to privacy. Under Roe and its progeny, the Court has struggled to weigh the interest in privacy against the government's interest in protecting life. Although the privacy right has expanded to encompass things never imagined by the founders, legislatures and courts continue to weigh the fundamental right against governmental interest in protection of society. The history of the Third Amendment suggests that such balancing has always been necessary when it comes to privacy.

JAMES F. Van ORDEN

QUICK BEAR v. LEUPP, 210 U.S. 50 (1908)

Quick Bear v. Leupp illustrated the complexity of protecting First Amendment religious rights for American Indians by tacitly supporting the establishment of Catholic education on the Rosebud Reservation.

By 1908, the U.S. government had for more than a century pursued assimilation policies for Native Americans. Such policies included establishing schools and other educational programs and encouraging Christian missionary activity among tribes. By the late 1800s, the government provided funding for a number of sectarian schools on reservations using a combination of public money, money from treaty payments to tribes, and, at least in the case at hand, money from a trust fund generated by the sale of Sioux land. During the 1890s, opposition to spending public funds on sectarian Indian education led Congress to begin phasing out the practice in 1895. In 1899, Congress made its final appropriation of public funds for Native American sectarian education.

On the Rosebud Sioux Indian Reservation in South Dakota, this left tribal funds as the only support for the St. Francis Mission Boarding School. The Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions applied to the Bureau of Indian Affairs for a contract to provide education at Rosebud, which it supported with a petition signed by 212 tribal members. Meanwhile, non-Catholic clergy and Rosebud residents affiliated with the Indian Rights Association opposed continued funding of sectarian schools and fought the contract. Reuben Quick Bear, a Protestant, and two other Lakotas filed suit against Francis E. Leupp, commissioner of Indian Affairs, and others requesting a permanent injunction to prevent using treaty and trust fund monies to support sectarian schools.

They believed such funding violated the aforementioned policy, specifically the Indian Appropriations Act (1897), which said, "[I]t is hereby declared to be the settled policy of the government to hereafter make no appropriation whatever for education in any sectarian school." The plaintiffs argued that the Rosebud Sioux tribe had not requested the expenditure. Rather, the Department of Interior approved the payments from tribal treaty and trust funds. Because treaty obligations required the U.S. government to provide educational services, the plaintiffs argued that the government's action converted tribal funds into public funds used to establish a religion.

The defendants argued that treaty and trust fund monies were not public funds and could be used to fulfill governmental treaty obligations. Furthermore, they pointed to the petition and argued that the 212 signatories held claims to tribal funds exceeding the value of the St. Francis Mission School contract. The supreme court of the District of Columbia approved using trust money, but not treaty funds. On appeal, the district court approved use of treaty and tribal funds.

In affirming the lower court's ruling, Chief Justice Melville W. Fuller, writing for the U.S. Supreme Court, found that treaty and trust fund monies belonged to the Sioux and were not public funds. Native Americans, Fuller ruled, should be able to spend their money as they chose in educating their children. Furthermore, Fuller found that preventing use of tribal funds for sectarian education would amount to prohibiting free exercise of religion. Critics have argued, though, that the decision supported the establishment of Christianity at Rosebud. Although Fuller did not try to overrule emerging case law holding the Bill of Rights did not apply to Native Americans, he came closer to that point than any of his Supreme Court brethren had to date.

TODD KERSTETTER

References and Further Reading

- Deloria, Vine, Jr., and Clifford M. Lytle. American Indians, American Justice. Austin: University of Texas Press, 1983.
- Hagan, William T. Theodore Roosevelt and Six Friends of the Indian. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1997.
- Wilkinson, Charles F. American Indians, Time, and the Law: Native Societies in a Modern Constitutional Democracy. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1987.
- Wunder, John R. "Retained by The People": A History of American Indians and the Bill of Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994.

QUINLAN, KAREN ANN (1954–1985)

On April 15, 1975, twenty-one-year-old Karen Ann Quinlan of Landing, New Jersey, went out with friends. During the course of the evening, Quinlan consumed a mix of alcohol and prescription and over-the-counter drugs. Later that night, Quinlan lost consciousness and slipped into a coma. After doctors established that Quinlan would remain in a persistent vegetative state, her parents asked her doctors to remove her respirator, arguing that Quinlan's life was being artificially sustained by extraordinary means. The doctors refused.

Quinlan's parents, Joseph and Julia, then petitioned the New Jersey Superior Court to appoint Joseph as his daughter's legal guardian. On November 10, 1975, Judge Robert Muir, Jr. refused, ruling that the court could not authorize the withdrawal of life-sustaining techniques under its equity jurisdiction or the constitutional rights of free exercise of religion, right to privacy, or privilege against cruel and unusual punishment.

The Quinlans appealed the decision to the New Jersey Supreme Court. On March 31, 1976, the supreme court held that under the Constitution's right to privacy, Quinlan's legal guardian and family could exercise Quinlan's right to privacy on her behalf. The Quinlans removed the respirator on May 22, 1976. Quinlan lived for nine more years; on June 11, 1985, she succumbed to pneumonia. She was thirty-one years old.

Although not binding in other states, the decision in In The Matter of Karen Quinlan was a landmark case for the rights of patients to control their medical decisions and treatment. Following the decision, many states passed patients' rights statutes that included provisions for living wills, thus allowing individuals the right to decide in advance what medical procedures would be permitted if they became incompetent.

MARY K. MANKUS

References and Further Reading

- Battelle, Phyllis Harry. "Karen Ann Quinlan Ten Years Later." Ladies Home Journal April (1985): 118–119.
- In the Matter of Karen Quinlan: The Complete Legal Briefs, Court Proceedings, and Decision in the Superior Court of New Jersey*. Arlington: University Publications of America, 1975.
- In the Matter of Karen Quinlan*, 70 N.J. 10; 355 A.2d 647 (1976).
- Quinlan, Joseph, and Julia Quinlan, with Phyllis Battelle. Karen Ann: The Quinlans Tell Their Story. New York: Doubleday, 1977.

See also Cruzan v. Missouri, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)

R

RABE v. WASHINGTON, 405 U.S. 313 (1972)

Rabe was convicted under Washington's antiobscenity law for showing Carmen Baby, a motion picture and adaptation of the opera, Carmen, which included sexually frank scenes, at his outdoor drive-in theatre where the film could be seen by passing motorists and by teenagers watching from outside the fence surrounding the theatre. The state's Supreme Court affirmed Rabe's conviction. The U.S. Supreme Court in a per curiam opinion authored by Justice Douglas reversed the lower court; Chief Justice Burger wrote a concurring opinion.

The Court's per curiam noted that the Washington Supreme Court did not hold the movie to be obscene under either the Roth (Roth v. United States [1957]) or Memoirs (A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts [1966]) standards. The state court, "uncertain" as to whether the movie was offensive according to these standards and unsure of its artistic or literary value, concluded that if Roth were applied the movie would pass the definitional standard of obscenity "if the viewing audience consisted only of consenting adults." Still, despite this conclusion, the Washington court upheld Rabe's conviction because of the "context of its exhibition" rendered the movie obscene (italics in original).

The flaw in the court's finding lay in the absence of any mention of "context" in the state's antiobscenity law. Thus, if the constitutional "vice" of vagueness were to be avoided, the statute had to give "fair notice" that certain conduct was proscribed. "The statute, so construed," Douglas wrote, "is impermissibly vague ... because of its failure give [Rabe] fair notice that criminal liability is dependent upon the place where the film is shown." The Supreme Court, for this reason, felt no need to address the constitutional questions put to the Court by the parties.

Burger takes the opportunity in his concurrence, after agreeing with the majority's ruling, to highlight his view that Carmen Baby and other public displays of sexually explicit material "are not significantly different from any noxious public nuisance." Narrowly drawn statutes aimed at protecting the public, especially adults unwilling to view the material and juveniles, "involve no significant countervailing First Amendment considerations."

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

A Book Named "John Cleland's Memoirs of a Woman of Pleasure" v. Attorney General of Massachusetts, 383 U.S. 413 (1966)

Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

RACE AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Issues of race and ethnicity in the criminal justice system raise a number of important civil liberties issues. Allegations of discrimination in the administration of justice regarding African Americans, Latinos, and Native Americans involve all components of the criminal justice system: the police, prosecution and sentencing in the courts, corrections agencies, the death penalty, and the juvenile justice system. There are also issues related to the denial of due process that disproportionately affect minorities. People of color are also underrepresented among employees in virtually all criminal justice agencies. Social science research has confirmed the existence of patterns of discrimination in all of these areas, although there is debate among scholars over the exact nature and seriousness of such discrimination.

While there is much research on African Americans and the criminal justice system, the data on Latino Americans is very limited. Until recently, most criminal justice agencies did not collect data on Latinos as a distinct group. Following the standards set by the federal government, agencies classified Latinos as "white," combining them with non-Hispanic whites. Most research on criminal justice followed this pattern, collecting data on "white" and "black" or "African Americans" and the criminal justice system. There has been relatively little research on Native Americans and Asian Americans and the criminal justice system.

The Police

Racial and ethnic controversies over the police include allegations of discrimination in arrests, stops and frisks of citizens, traffic enforcement, and the use of both deadly and nonlethal force, along with discrimination in employment.

Racial and ethnic minorities are disproportionately arrested in terms of their presence in the U.S. population. Research has found that these disparities are partly explained by the higher involvement in crime on the part of minority peoples and partly explained by bias on the part of the police. Racial and ethnic disparities in arrest are strongest with regard to drug-related offenses, and the so-called "war on drugs" has had a particularly strong impact on young African-American males.

In the 1990s national attention focused on race discrimination in traffic enforcement. Civil rights activists accused the police of engaging in "racial profiling," meaning that police officers stopped vehicles because of the race of the driver and not because of any violation of the law. A number of states passed laws requiring police departments to collect and report data on traffic stops. The controversy stimulated academic research on police traffic enforcement practices. Most studies found racial disparities in the percentage of drivers stopped by the police relative to the resident population. Even greater racial disparities have been found in the subsequent searches of drivers and vehicles.

There are also racial disparities with respect to police use of nonlethal force. Civil rights activists often refer to the use of excessive force as "police brutality." Research has consistently shown that the police are more likely to use nonlethal force against young African-American males, compared with other demographic groups.

The strongest patterns of racial disparities in police practices exist with respect to the use of deadly force. In the 1960s, African Americans were six times more likely to be shot and killed by police than were white Americans. As a result of new policies restricting the use of deadly force that began to be implemented in the 1970s, the racial disparity among persons shot and killed by the police has narrowed to about three to one.

A major grievance among African Americans is their perception that police departments do not thoroughly or fairly investigate citizen complaints about police conduct. As a result, civil rights leaders have demanded the creation of independent citizen oversight agencies to handle citizen complaints. By 2005 the police departments in virtually all of the major cities in the United States were subject to some form of independent citizen oversight.

Prosecution and Courts

Civil rights leaders have alleged discrimination against racial and ethnic minorities in all phases of the court proceedings in the criminal justice system. This includes bail practices, plea bargaining, the dismissal of criminal cases, and sentencing. Research has found evidence of racial and ethnic disparities in the handling of cases, but these disparities are confounded with other legally relevant factors. African Americans, for example, are generally treated more harshly than whites in all phases of court proceedings, but this is often due to the fact that they are involved in more serious crimes and have more serious prior criminal records.

With respect to bail, researchers have found that males and African Americans and Latinos are more likely to face higher bail requirements than are females and whites. A similar pattern exists with respect to plea bargaining and the dismissal of cases. Females and whites are often given more lenient consideration than males and African Americans.

With respect to sentencing, racial and ethnic disparities are found with respect to persons sentenced to prison. As is the case with bail and plea bargaining, these disparities are confounded with legally relevant variables such as the seriousness of the offense and offenders' prior criminal histories. The most serious racial and ethnic disparities in non-capital crime cases involve drug offenses. The so-called war on drugs has affected sentencing as well as policing, and there is evidence of harsher treatment of African Americans in particular. The impact of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines on drug offenses has been the subject of considerable controversy. The Guidelines provide for much longer sentences for persons convicted of possession or sale of "crack" cocaine compared with powdered cocaine. Since African Americans are involved with crack cocaine at a much higher rate than white Americans, the result is a serious racial disparity with regard to the length of prison terms.

Corrections

As a result of racial disparities in arrest, prosecution, and sentencing, African Americans are overrepresented in American corrections agencies. Although African Americans are only 14 percent of the U.S. population, they represent about half of all persons in prison. Similar disparities are found among persons on probation and on parole. Many prisons are characterized by the existence of gangs organized along racial and ethnic lines. Prison gangs are responsible for some violence among inmates.

Some criminologists argue that the overrepresentation of racial and ethnic minorities in prisons is a result of cumulative disadvantage. This concept holds that small disparities at each stage of the criminal process are amplified by similarly small disparities at each succeeding stage. The end results are large racial and ethnic disparities in persons in prison, on probation, and on parole.

The effectiveness of probation and parole is affected by the larger patterns of discrimination in American society. Both programs are designed to reintegrate offenders into society. African American and Latino probationers and parolees, however, are placed in their home communities that are affected by lack of employment opportunities and discrimination in employment, housing, and other services.

African Americans have been severely affected by state laws denying the right to vote to persons with felony convictions. Although most states have procedures allowing felons to regain the right to vote, they are often cumbersome and difficult to use. It is estimated that as many 1.4 million African-American males, or 14 percent of all African-American men, are denied the right to vote. Many experts argue that the practice of denying felons the right to vote denies them the most fundamental right of a democratic society. Additionally, denying an ex-felon the right to vote presents a major obstacle to reintegrating that person into a law-abiding life, thereby thwarting the basic goals of probation and parole.

The Death Penalty

The death penalty has been an area of great controversy over racial discrimination. In the 1960s, the NAACP launched a legal attack on the constitutionality of the death penalty. It sponsored research by criminologist Marvin Wolfgang that documented significant racial disparities in persons executed in the United States since 1930. The majority of executions occurred in the southeastern states where institutionalized segregation prevailed until the 1960s. The most serious disparities involved African-American men convicted of the crime of rape.

The Supreme Court decisions in Furman v. Georgia (1972) and Gregg v. Georgia (1976) declared existing state capital punishment laws unconstitutional as they were administered. The Furman decision compelled states to enact new laws with provisions guiding the exercise of discretion in capital cases. In Gregg, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the new death penalty laws. Research on post-Furman cases, however, found that racial disparities continued to exist. Specifically, studies found that the likelihood of a death sentence was greatest in cases where an African American was convicted of murdering a white person. Conversely, a sentence of death was least likely when a white person was convicted of murdering an African American. In a landmark decision (McCleskey v. Kemp [1987]), the Supreme Court refused to accept statistical data on general patterns of racial disparities as sufficient evidence to overturn the conviction of one particular defendant.

Juvenile Justice

With respect to the juvenile justice system, there has been considerable concern over what has been labeled disproportionate minority confinement. This refers to the fact that African-American and Latino juveniles are more likely to be confined to juvenile institutions rather than being diverted into less restrictive alternatives. As is the case with adult imprisonment, disproportionate minority confinement is the end result of disparities in arrest, prosecution, conviction, and sentencing.

Latino Americans

Latino or Hispanic Americans have experienced violations of civil liberties within the American criminal justice system. The exact nature and extent of discrimination is not known. Until very recently, criminal justice agencies did not collect data on Latinos or Hispanics. They were classified as “white” and as a result data on arrests, convictions, and imprisonment do not distinguish between non-Hispanic whites and Latino or Hispanic whites.

Native Americans

The question of Native Americans and criminal justice is extremely complex. Native American tribes hold the legal status of semisovereign nations within the boundaries of the United States. On many legal issues they are subject to tribal law rather than state or federal law. Many tribes operate separate tribal police and tribal court systems. As a result, the application of the federal Bill of Rights to individual Native Americans is ambiguous. It is not always clear whether an individual Native American is protected by the federal Bill of Rights, which emphasizes individual rights, or tribal law, which is more communal in orientation. In 1968 Congress enacted the Indian Civil Rights Act, but the law has not succeeded in clarifying all of the issues.

Employment in Criminal Justice Agencies

Racial and ethnic minorities are underrepresented in employment in virtually all criminal justice agencies. As a result of federal laws outlawing discrimination in employment, together with court-ordered affirmative action plans, progress has been made in the employment of African-American and Latino police officers. In some police departments, non-Hispanic whites are a minority among officers. Tribal police departments on Native American reservations are not subject to federal equal employment opportunity laws. Native Americans represent a majority of tribal police officers. African Americans and Latinos are underrepresented in the legal profession, and as a consequence are underrepresented among prosecutors, defense attorneys, and judges. Racial and ethnic minorities are better represented in corrections agencies, that is, prison guards, and probation and parole officers.

SAMUEL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Cole, David. No Equal Justice: Race and Class in the American Criminal Justice System. New York: New Press, 1999.
- Gross, Samuel R., and Robert Mauro. Death and Discrimination: Racial Disparities in Capital Sentencing. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1989.
- Harris, David. Profiles in Injustice: Why Racial Profiling Won't Work. New York: New Press, 2001.
- Kennedy, Randall. Race, Crime, and the Law. New York: Vintage Books, 1998.
- Russell, Kathryn. The Color of Crime. New York: New York University Press, 1998.
- Tonry, Michael. Malign Neglect: Race, Crime, and Punishment in America. New York: Oxford University Press, 1995.
- Walker, Samuel, Cassia Spohn, and Miriam DeLone. The Color of Justice: Race, Ethnicity, and Crime in America. 3rd ed. Belmont, CA: Wadsworth, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Furman v. Georgia*, 408 U.S. 238 (1972)
- Gregg v. Georgia*, 428 U.S. 153 (1976)
- McCleskey v. Kemp*, 481 U.S. 279 (1987)

RACE AND IMMIGRATION

Apart from the regulated importation of African slaves that predated the founding, formal restrictions on the immigration of racial minorities in American law began with the Immigration Act of 1875. Since then, race has figured prominently in determining which noncitizens may enter and must exit the country based on the law's perception of a racial group's assimilability into the predominantly white European culture of the United States. Economic downturns also precipitated the strongest backlash against immigration, much of it racial.

The earliest targets of racially restrictive immigration law were the Chinese, whose important work on the railroads and in the laundries of the West were blamed as a significant cause for the country's economic woes during the late 1800s. This economic scapegoating, coupled with the perception that the Chinese were clannish, inscrutable beings who would not and could not assimilate, prompted Congress in the 1875 Act to make contracting to supply Chinese laborers a felony. This criminal provision was followed by the Chinese Exclusion Act of 1882, which banned the importation of Chinese laborers for ten years, provided for the deportation of Chinese who did not possess proper immigration documents, and prohibited Chinese nationals from becoming naturalized U.S. citizens. The Supreme Court upheld these laws in Chae Chan Ping v. United States (1889) and Fong Yue Ting v. United States (1893), ruling that Congress had plenary power over immigration law as an incident of federal sovereignty, thereby allowing the legislature to pass laws restricting the admission, and requiring the deportation, of individuals based on their racial ancestry. The Court has never repudiated the plenary power doctrine, and hence has never struck a federal immigration law for exceeding Congress's mandate.

Supported by the Court, Congress expanded existing law in 1917 to create an "Asiatic barred zone," thereby excluding all Asians from immigrating to the United States. While a similar bill to ban "all members of the African or black race" passed the Senate, extensive lobbying by the NAACP halted progress of the bill. Instead, Southern and Eastern Europeans were effectively excluded by a 1921 law temporarily confining immigration to Northern and Western Europeans, which was later promulgated permanently in the National Origin Act of 1924. Establishing the "national origins quota system," the 1924 Act fixed a nation's immigration quota as a percentage of its population already within the United States; it also allowed for the exclusion of all those not eligible for naturalization, which effectively halted Asian immigration. On the deportation side, lawful Mexican immigrants and U.S. citizens of Mexican descent became a target group during the Depression and then again during the 1950s pursuant to "Operation Wetback." Although no law forbade Mexican immigration, federal officials enacted programs of ostensible "repatriation" of Mexicans and Mexican Americans, leading to the deportation of millions.

Formal racial restrictions on immigration law were lifted in 1965 when Congress repealed the national origins quota system, leading to the modern boom in Asian and Latin American immigration to the United States that continues to the present day. Still, purposeful discrimination based on race is constitutionally permissible because the plenary power doctrine created by the anti-Chinese cases Chae Chan Ping and Fong Yue Ting has never been repudiated. Although post-1965 immigration from Asia and Latin America has substantially changed the complexion of contemporary American society, and while the overt vestiges of racial discrimination have been excised from immigration and nationality law, national origin distinctions still serve to privilege some groups over others, mirroring the traditional racial divide. For example, under the Visa Waiver Program, individuals from several Western European nations are allowed to visit the United States for an extended time without a tourist visa, while most Asian and Latin American nationals are not. Additionally, the Diversity Visa lottery, which purports to diversify the immigrant stream, disproportionately benefits Europeans and Africans.

During the period immediately following the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, race appeared to be a strong proxy for disloyalty and terrorism in the government's deployment of its immigration power. Many Arab and Muslim noncitizens were detained and questioned in connection with the attack, a majority of whom have since been deported for technical immigration violations. With the reassignment of both the service and enforcement functions of the federal government's immigration wing to the Department of Homeland Security, the question will be whether, over time, the government is able to find a comfortable balance between using its immigration power to help secure the nation's borders and ridding itself of American immigration law's racist legacy.

VICTOR C. ROMERO

References and Further Reading

- Chin, Gabriel J., Segregation's Last Stronghold: Race Discrimination and the Constitutional Law of Immigration, UCLA Law Review 46 (1995): 1-74.
- Haney López, Ian F. 1996. White by Law: The Legal Construction of Race. New York: New York University Press.
- Johnson, Kevin R. 2004. The "Huddled Masses" Myth: Immigration and Civil Rights. Philadelphia: Temple University Press.
- Olivas, Michael A., The Chronicles, My Grandfather's Stories, and Immigration Law: The Slave Traders Chronicle as Racial History, St. Louis Law Journal 34 (1990): 425-41.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chae Chang Ping v. United States, 130 U.S. 581 (1889)
Fong Yue Ting v. United States, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

RALEY v. OHIO, 360 U.S. 423 (1959)

In the context of criminal cases, courts strictly adhere to the maxim “ignorance of the law is no excuse.” Under this rule, accused persons cannot claim lack of criminal responsibility because they were not aware that their actions violated the law. However, in Raley v. Ohio, the Supreme Court recognized a narrow exception to this rule, sometimes referred to as “entrapment by estoppel.”

The defendants in Raley v. Ohio were all called as witnesses before the Ohio Un-American Activities Commission to answer questions regarding alleged subversive government activities. Despite the fact that an Ohio statute (Contempt Statute) prohibited witnesses appearing before state legislative committees from refusing to answer questions, the defendants were all informed by the commission that they were entitled to assert their state constitutional privilege against self-incrimination, if necessary. The defendants all refused to answer questions in reliance on this privilege and, although the commission accepted these assertions without question, the defendants were charged with and convicted of violating the Contempt Statute. The Ohio Supreme Court affirmed these convictions, holding that the defendants were presumed to have knowledge of the Contempt Statute and its requirements. The U.S. Supreme Court, however, reversed the convictions, holding that the prosecution of these defendants for engaging in conduct that state officials had advised was legal violated due process.

The Supreme Court’s holding in Raley was significant because it recognized that it is fundamentally unfair for the government to approve certain conduct, and then prosecute an individual for engaging in that conduct.

JUDITH M. BARGER

References and Further Reading

Cohen, Mark S., Entrapment by Estoppel, Colorado Lawyer 31 (2002): 45–48.
Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965).
Miller v. Commonwealth, 492 S.E.2d 482 (Va. 1997).
Parry, John T., Culpability, Mistake, and Official Interpretations of Law, American Journal of Criminal Law 25 (1997): 1–78.

Pasano, Michael S., Walther J. Tache, and Thierry Oliver Desmet, Using the Defense of Entrapment by Estoppel, Champion 26 May (2002): 20–24.

See also Due Process; Entrapment by Estoppel

RANKIN v. MCPHERSON, 483 U.S. 378 (1987)

In Rankin v. McPherson, the U.S. Supreme Court held that public employees have a First Amendment right to express their political views without fear of discharge.

Ardith McPherson was a probationary clerical worker employed in a constable or law enforcement office. In 1981, upon hearing the news that there was an attempted assassination on President Reagan, she commented to a coworker that, “If they go for him again, I hope they get him.” Her comments were reported to the Constable Walter Rankin who fired her. McPherson sued in federal district court for back pay and for reinstatement to her job, contending that she had been dismissed for exercising her free speech rights.

Writing for the Supreme Court in a five-to-four decision, Justice Thurgood Marshall cited Perry v. Sindermann (1972) and stated that the government may not discharge an employee for exercise of her First Amendment rights. This was the case even if she was a probationary employee. According to Pickering v. Board of Education (1968), the Court stated that the test for determining whether a public employee had been correctly dismissed for exercising free speech rights involves a balance between the rights of the former as a citizen in commenting on matters of public concern versus the rights of the government to maintain efficiency and discipline in the workplace. Here, McPherson’s comments were on a matter of public concern, and because there was no evidence that they interfered with the order and efficiency of the workplace, or that they were overheard by the public, the Court ruled that her First Amendment free speech rights had been violated.

DAVID SCHULTZ

References and Further Reading

Hentoff, Nat. Free Speech for Me—But Not for Thee. New York: Harper Perennial, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Perry v. Sindermann, 408 U.S. 593 (1972)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)

See also Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present)

RAP MUSIC

See Hip-Hop and Rap Music

RAPE

See Marital Rape; Rape, Naming Victim; Statutory Rape

RAPE: NAMING VICTIM

When a serious violent crime has been committed and a suspect is taken into police custody, the names of both the accused and the victim are routinely, and often quickly, disclosed. Americans have viewed such disclosure as in the public good. It may help free an innocent person, it may bolster the prosecution's case, and it serves to show the functioning of the criminal justice system. With the crime of rape or sexual assault, different concerns surface.

Most rapes are committed by men against women. This crime of forced intercourse inflicts both physical and mental anguish that continues after a victim reports the crime. Medical exams are followed by police questioning that requires the victim to describe the particulars of the experience. If the accused rapist is well known, there will be a flurry of media activity surrounding the incident, the accused, and the victim. Within days, the victim may be identified, and her picture may be posted on Internet websites. Some people criticize these disclosures saying that rape victims' identities should be protected, at least until trial. Others assert that here, as with other crimes, there are valid reasons for disseminating the information. Most media organizations have policies against revealing the identities of rape victims, but some have argued that this is not enough and that laws are needed to protect the identities of rape victims.

A few states, including South Carolina, Florida, and Georgia, have statutes prohibiting news media from disclosing rape victims' identities prior to trial. These laws have been criticized as restrictions on freedom of the press but also defended vigorously. Despite deciding cases based on a number of earlier laws of this type, the U.S. Supreme Court has not established a broad rule saying that rape victims' identities must always be protected or that the media may always disclose this information. In the most recent decision in this area, Florida Star v. B.J.F. (1989), the Supreme Court ruled that one such statute was unconstitutional. However, the Court recognized that it was important for states to protect victims' identities and suggested that there could be a similar, more narrow law that would be constitutional.

Supporters of laws protecting rape victim identities contend that rape is a unique crime that is so demeaning and traumatic that victims should be spared public humiliation. They also argue that rape victims will be more likely to report their crimes if they believe that their names will be protected. Some of the arguments against these laws are that identifying rape victims will eliminate the stigma of rape, that the victim's name makes a news story more credible, that decisions like these are best left to the media, that it is not fair to the accused rapist, and that it is too large an interference with freedom of the press.

The legislators who have enacted laws protecting a rape victim's identity believe that the emotional and physical pain suffered because of the extreme sexual assault justifies the need for greater privacy. The victim historically has been, sadly often, blamed for the crime, with some people assuming that she was somehow to blame for the violent assault. Rape victims may be shunned by their friends and family or threatened by supporters of the accused rapist. In response, opponents of these laws say that although rape is a terrible crime, there are valid reasons for disclosure that outweigh a victim's concerns. To be sure, some people claim that revealing the names of rape victims will reduce the stigma associated with this crime by making it less shameful and more like other crimes. Rape victim identity law supporters counter that any decision about disclosure should be made by the victim. They think that it is unfair to expect someone who has already suffered so greatly to bear the burden of changing society's views and behavior.

Some are concerned that because victims fear public humiliation they will be less likely to report a rape unless they know that their names will be protected. Still, there is no evidence that preventing disclosure encourages victims to report rapes. Some studies have shown no significant difference between states that punish disclosure and those that do not. However, this view does not consider the fact that even in states that do not forbid disclosures, media organizations generally do not report rape victims' identities anyway. This situation, thus, makes it hard to really see the effects of disclosure laws on the decisions of rape victims. Also, other studies show that victims are more likely to report rapes if their identities are protected, and that most women and men support these limiting laws.

One important question is whether the identity of the victim is an important detail that adds credibility to a news story, thereby promoting the free speech values found in the First Amendment. It is, certainly, the mission of reporters to set out as many facts as they can. Critics of this argument note that it is easy to provide other details that will make a story credible and that with good reporting a victim's identity is not needed.

Another matter of genuine debate is whether limiting disclosure is due to gender bias. Proponents of this argument feel that it is as if the media is patronizing the rape victim. Those who disagree say that the argument might be valid if we lived in a world where rape victims were shameless, but that is not the situation today so that privacy is still necessary.

Criminal defense lawyers often point out that protecting the name of the victim is unfair to the accused rapist. The accused is presumed innocent but is forced to undergo careful scrutiny surrounding the accusations. Hence, when individuals accuse others of serious crimes they should be treated similarly. However, critics of this argument say that revealing the name of the alleged perpetrator does not balance the situation, it just makes it worse for the alleged victim.

Although high-profile sexual assault accusations receive the most attention, any time someone is raped media organizations must make a decision about disclosing the victim's identity. The debate continues over policies and laws that prevent disclosure.

PAUL MARCUS

References and Further Reading

- Denno, Deborah W., Perspectives on Disclosing Rape Victims' Names, Fordham Law Review 61 (1993): 1113.
Marcus, Paul, and Tara L. McMahon, Limiting Disclosure of Rape Victims' Identities, Southern California Law Review 1019 (1991).

RASTAFARIANS AND THE FREE EXERCISE OF RELIGION

Most Americans asked about Rastafarianism think of unbridled marijuana (ganja) consumption, dreadlocks, and the musical idiom of reggae. Not surprisingly, dreadlocks and marijuana have most often brought Rastafarians within the ambit of the U.S. legal system. Therein, their arguments that both practices are protected by the First Amendment's guarantee of the free exercise of religion have not generally fallen on fertile ground.

Leonard P. Howell (1898–1981) is generally credited as the founder of Rastafarianism, and the date of its origin is generally set in 1932, when Howell returned to the then-British colony of Jamaica from New York City proclaiming Haile Selassie, the newly crowned Emperor of Ethiopia, to be the Black Messiah. Without question, the spread of Rastafarianism outside Jamaica, beginning in the 1970s, was spearheaded by the popularity of reggae, particularly as performed by Bob Marley and the Wailers.

Howell's movement was strongly influenced by another Jamaican native, Marcus Garvey, who founded the Universal Negro Improvement Association in 1914 and made it the largest black movement in history. Another influence was Athlyi Rogers, author of The Holy Piby. The influence of Rogers' "Blackman's Bible" was so strong, in fact, that Howell has been often accused of plagiarizing from it in his Promised Key. Both Rogers and Howell attempted to add a religious component to Garvey's social and political vision of social redemption and economic power for Africans.

The tenets of Rastafarianism include the holiness of Haile Selassie (before he was crowned king of Ethiopia in 1930, Selassie's name was Tafari and his rank was ras [chief]; hence, the term Rastafarian); Afrocentrism and repatriation to Ethiopia; black pride; the wearing of dreadlocks and/or similarly matted beards; a special diet that took various forms by various followers but could be vegetarian and if not, at least avoided pork, prohibited alcohol and tobacco, avoided processed foods, and prohibited eating of foods prepared by women who were menstruating; nonviolence; and the smoking of marijuana as a religious sacrament. Rastafarians cite passages in the Christian Bible that support various beliefs, in particular the wearing of dreadlocks and the use of marijuana.

The first hurdle in any free exercise case is establishing that the belief system in question qualifies as a "religion," and Rastafarianism has been considered—or at least assumed to be—a religion since at least the mid-1980s in the lower courts and by the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in United States v. Bauer (1996), which noted that it was included in Gordon Melton's Encyclopedia of American Religions. Nevertheless, Rastafarian litigants are hindered by the fact that the smoking of marijuana and, to a lesser extent, the wearing of dreadlocks, have been adopted by a number of non-Rastafarians.

In a series of prison and school cases, Rastafarians have most often been denied the right to wear dreadlocks. Although Rastafarians enjoyed mixed success in lower courts in New York—in one case they were allowed to tie back their hair for prison photos but were required to shave their beards—more typical was the Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit, which upheld prison safety arguments, including the argument that long hair would incite homosexual attacks, to justify cutting dreadlocks in Wilson v. Schillinger (1985). Free exercise cases involving dreadlocks have also been rejected in a number of federal district courts but have never faced Supreme Court scrutiny.

Similarly, the argument that Rastafarian use of marijuana is protected by the First Amendment has been rejected. Marijuana use falls squarely within the ambit of the “Smith test” of Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (1990), the controversial case in which the U.S. Supreme Court, Justice Scalia writing for the majority, held that sacramental consumption of the hallucinogen peyote by members of the Native American Church was not protected by the free exercise clause because religious beliefs do not exempt one from “compliance with an otherwise valid law prohibiting conduct that the State is free to regulate.” The free exercise justification of marijuana use has been rejected in three federal circuits, and has been distinguished from the use of peyote by members of the Native American Church in a Kansas case (where peyote use is allowed under state law).

KEITH E. SEALING

References and Further Reading

- Lee, Hélène. The First Rasta: Leonard Howell and the Rise of Rastafarianism. Trans. by Lily Davis. Chicago: Lawrence Hill Books, 2003.
- Maragh, G.G. (Leonard Howell). The Promised Key. Brooklyn, NY: A&B Publishers, [1935] 2001.
- Rogers, Robert Alythi. The Holy Piby. Kingston, Jamaica: Research Associates School Times Publication, [1924] 2000.
- O'Brien, Derek, and Vaughan Carter, Chant Down Babylon: Freedom of Religion and the Rastafarian Challenge to Majoritarianism, Journal of Law and Religion 18 (2002): 219.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Employment Division, Department of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Wilson v. Schillinger*, 761 F.2d 921 (3d Cir. 1985)

RATIFICATION DEBATE, CIVIL LIBERTIES IN

The Constitution that the Philadelphia Convention transmitted to the Confederation Congress for consideration on September 28, 1787 contained a number of provisions protective of individual rights and liberties. Article I, Section 9 affirmed that the writ of habeas corpus should not be suspended except in cases of rebellion or invasion “when the public safety may require it.” It also prohibited Congress from passing bills of attainder or ex post facto laws. Article

I, Section 10 placed a similar ban on the states. Article III, Section 2 provided for trial by jury in criminal cases in the newly created federal courts. Section 3 defined treason narrowly, and required the testimony of two witnesses or confession in open court for conviction of the crime. In addition, it said that conviction could not work corruption of blood nor forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted. Article VI declared that no religious test should ever be required as qualification for any federal office. Although the provision applied only to members of Congress, one might also point to Article I, Section 6, which immunized senators and representatives from criminal or civil liability for “any speech or debate in either house.” One might consider this as a freedom of speech provision for members of Congress. Perhaps too the prohibition on titles of nobility may be considered as a freedom for members of Congress. Some at the time, such as Alexander Hamilton for example, saw this as a provision securing liberty.

Proposals for the inclusion of additional civil liberties provisions were brought before the convention for consideration but commanded little support. On August 20, Charles Pinckney of South Carolina introduced resolutions calling, among other things, for a ban on the quartering of soldiers in houses in peacetime and a declaration in favor of freedom of the press. They were referred to committee but never made their way into any proposed constitutional text. Toward the end of deliberations, Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts urged that jury trial be guaranteed in civil as well as criminal cases in the federal courts. George Mason of Virginia thought this impracticable, but said he would support a motion to preface the Constitution with a bill of rights. A declaration of rights “would give quiet to the people,” he stated, and could be quickly prepared since there were many state charters of rights that could be drawn on for suitable language. (Mason was the principal author of Virginia’s own Declaration of Rights.) A motion by Gerry, seconded by Mason, to appoint a committee to prepare a bill of rights failed to win the vote of a single state delegation, however. On the convention’s last day of deliberations, Gerry and Pinckney made a final effort to have a guarantee of jury trial in civil cases added to the Constitution, but their motion also failed unanimously.

The matter of securing additional rights and liberties came up again during Congress’s consideration of the Constitution. Richard Henry Lee of Virginia, making reference to “the various bills or declarations of rights whereon the governments of the various states are founded,” urged the wisdom of grounding the new Constitution on a similar declaration. Specifically, he asked that before its submission to the states, the Constitution be amended to guarantee the right of conscience in matters of religion, freedom of the press, the right of jury trial in civil cases, the right of peaceable assembly, and the freedom from unreasonable searches and seizures. He sought also a prohibition on standing armies in times of peace unless assented to by two-thirds of both houses of Congress. But Lee's proposals were not acted upon, and the Constitution was submitted to the states for consideration in unaltered form.

Among a people as rights conscious as were eighteenth-century Americans (most of the state constitutions that had been adopted in the period after the Revolution included declarations of rights), it is not surprising that one of the chief points of contention during the ensuing debates on ratification was whether the 1787 Constitution adequately protected individual rights and liberties. Some took aim at the very size and structure of the proposed new republic. The creation of a central government with vastly enhanced powers and the radical (as they saw it) subordination of the states to that government in and of itself posed a threat to civil liberties. The states, men like Samuel Adams and Luther Martin thought, were the true protectors of liberty. James Madison argued famously, to the contrary, that the new nation, with its large territory, multiplicity of interests, and divided government, was a place where individual rights and liberties would thrive. The more common complaint, heard repeatedly during the debates, was that the new Constitution lacked a declaration of rights or, a more focused variation on the same theme, had failed to provide explicit protection for specific cherished rights and liberties. Pennsylvania, Massachusetts, Virginia, and New York were the most significant contributors to the discussion of this topic, and this essay will concentrate on the debates in those states. But first a further word about George Mason.

Mason was one of the first to sound the alarm about rights and liberties during the ratification period. Shortly after the convention adjourned, Mason—who had refused to sign the Constitution—penned a paper entitled, "Objections to the Constitution," in which he set forth his reservations about the new document. Lack of civil liberties protection was certainly not his only objection. He was very disturbed by the plenary power over commerce given the national government, for example, arguing that it would lead to the economic ruination of the southern states. Nonetheless, civil rights and liberties were a principal concern as is clear from the paper's opening sentence. "There is no declaration of rights," Mason wrote, "and the laws of the general government being paramount to the laws and constitutions of the several states, the declarations of rights in the separate states are no security." Specifically, there was "no declaration of any kind for preserving the liberty of the press, the trial by jury in civil causes; nor against the danger of standing armies in time of peace." Mason's "Objections" began to circulate widely in manuscript form in early October both in his home state and elsewhere, and became, as the historian Lance Banning has put it, "a starting point for Antifederalists throughout the country."

Pennsylvania

Mason's pamphlet was certainly read in Pennsylvania, the first state to summon a ratification convention, and a state where there was considerable opposition to the Constitution, much of it centering on the lack of a bill of rights. Several members of the Pennsylvania legislature, who had tried to prevent the calling of a convention, published a manifesto on September 29, the day after the call for a convention went out, urging their constituents to look soberly at the proposed constitution, paying particular attention to such questions as jury trial, liberty of the press, and standing armies (the phrasing made clear that they thought the Constitution did not satisfactorily deal with each) and to ask themselves "whether in a plan of government any declaration of rights should be prefixed or inserted." And on October 5, Samuel Bryan, writing under the pen name "Centinel," published a caustic article in a Philadelphia newspaper, drawing an unfavorable comparison between the solicitude for rights found in the Pennsylvania Constitution and the neglect of those rights in the Philadelphia document. The drafters, he complained in particular, had "made no provision for the liberty of the press, that grand palladium of freedom and scourge of tyrants."

Determined to respond to these and other attacks, James Wilson, one of the Constitution's chief drafters, delivered a speech to a public meeting of supporters held in Philadelphia on October 6. It may be considered something of an opening salvo of proponents in the war over ratification.

Wilson addressed first the large issue of whether the Constitution ought to contain a bill of rights. Sounding a theme that would be sounded and expanded on some months later by Alexander Hamilton, Wilson distinguished the proposed new federal government from those set up by the various state constitutions. The latter governments had every right and power that the people of the states had not expressly reserved to themselves. But the proposed new federal government was one of limited, delegated power and here the reverse of that proposition applied. Every power not expressly delegated was retained by the people. A bill of rights would therefore be superfluous. Liberty of the press, he commented, had become “a source of declamation and opposition,” but how, he asked, could such liberty be threatened by the new government? It had been given no authority whatsoever over the press. As to the complaint about the failure to provide for jury trial in civil cases, he dismissed out of hand the accusation that the Constitution prohibited such trials. Given the different ways in which the states dealt with this question, it had simply proved “impracticable to have made a general rule.” As to standing armies, he said he did not know of a nation in the world that did not wish “to maintain the appearance of strength” even in peaceful times. Besides, he noted, the Constitution placed the military under restrictions and controls.

Critics were quick to respond to Wilson’s speech, an account of which appeared the next day in the Philadelphia press, some acerbic in tone. “Centinel” weighed in again, characterizing Wilson’s defense of the omission of a declaration securing liberty of the press and other rights as “an insult on the understanding of the people.” If Wilson was correct that every power not given was reserved, then this proposition should have been expressly affirmed. “I lay it down as a general rule,” he went on, “that whenever the powers of a government extend to the properties of the subject, all their rights ought to be clearly and expressly defined—otherwise they have but a poor security for their liberties.”

The debate continued on the floor of the Pennsylvania Convention, which met from November 20 to December 15. Wilson argued again that a declaration of rights was unnecessary. Indeed, he said it would be imprudent. A bill of rights was a statement of powers reserved by the people. Anything not listed was presumably given away. An incomplete or imperfect enumeration would by implication leave rights unprotected. But then, asked John Smilie, a leading opponent of ratification, why had the convention seen fit to protect the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus and to secure trial by jury in criminal cases? How did this square with Wilson’s precept that it was dangerous to attempt an enumeration? A bill of rights was highly useful, Smilie declared, because it offered “a plain, strong, and accurate criterion by which the people might determine when, and in what instance, their rights were violated.” Smilie’s question as to why the Constitution, which, its defenders insisted, did not need a bill of rights, nonetheless included a partial one would be echoed by other speakers in other states during the ratification contests.

As the convention drew to a close, Robert Whitehill, another opposition leader, presented a petition from the citizens of Cumberland County, urging that the Constitution not be ratified without the inclusion of a bill of rights. He then moved that the convention adjourn pending the consideration of adding certain articles to the Constitution, among them amendments securing freedom of religion, speech, and the press; in criminal cases prohibiting excessive bail and cruel and unusual punishment affirming the right of the accused to a speedy trial by a jury of the vicinage, his right to confront his accusers, to be represented by counsel, and to refuse to give evidence against himself; and finally, an amendment stating that “the people have a right to bear arms for the defense of themselves and their own state.” Whitehill’s motion was rejected and Pennsylvania went on to vote to ratify the Constitution. Whitehill, Smilie, and their confederates, however, had not given up the fight. They and nineteen other delegates who had voted against ratification published a lengthy statement of the reasons for their opposition, including in it the list of their proposed amendments.

The Pennsylvania debates concerning ratification in general, and rights and liberties in particular, take on a special importance. Pennsylvania was the first state in which there was extensive debate about ratification. The arguments for and against received considerable attention outside the state (the “Dissent of the Minority,” for example, was widely circulated around the country). These galvanized proponents and opponents elsewhere. They also played a large role in setting the parameters of debate. They created, in the words of one historian, “the terms of discourse, the grammar, syntax, and vocabulary of ratification.”

Massachusetts

Massachusetts does not particularly stand out for the vigor of its debates on the subject of civil rights and liberties, but is noteworthy because it was the first state to recommend amendments touching on the subject. Civil liberties occasioned little discussion in the state convention, which opened on January 9, 1788. During the debates, Samuel Adams did propose that the Constitution be amended to guarantee freedom of the press, the right to bear arms, freedom from unreasonable search and seizure, and the right to petition the legislature. But he withdrew these proposed amendments when it was clear they could not win support.

There was some discussion out of doors. James Winthrop, who wrote a series of critical articles on the constitution for the Massachusetts Gazette under the pen name "Agrippa" between November 1787 and February 1788, complained in one of them about the lack of requirement that federal criminal trials be tried by a jury of the vicinage in the county where the crime was allegedly committed. The defendant would be put on trial before strangers, who would have no way of knowing "whether he is habitually a good or bad man ... and whether the action was performed maliciously or accidentally." In another he demanded as a condition of ratification the addition of an amendment stating that citizens should carry into the federal courts the rights accorded them by their own state constitutions."

Massachusetts voted to ratify on February 6 in a very close vote. The resolution of ratification, the first to do so, recommended that certain amendments be added to the Constitution. They would, it was said, offer a shield against "an undue administration of the federal government"; these amendments were designed, it was said, "to remove the fears and quiet the apprehensions" of the people. (Note the similarity to Mason's words in the Philadelphia Convention.) Most concerned the structure of government or aimed to better protect the rights of the states vis-à-vis the national government. Two dealt with civil liberties. One declared that no one should be prosecuted for a capital or "infamous" crime except upon grand jury indictment. The other affirmed the right of jury trial in civil cases in the federal courts in all "actions at common law."

A few months later, New Hampshire followed the lead of its New England neighbor, recommending the addition of amendments in its resolution of ratification. These tracked closely those recommended by Massachusetts, but included as well a ban on standing armies, a prohibition against the quartering of troops in private homes, and an affirmation of freedom of conscience. One proposed amendment constituted the most unqualified endorsement of the right to bear arms to emerge from the ratification debates, stating: "Congress shall never disarm any citizen unless such as are or have been in rebellion."

Virginia

The most intense discussion of civil rights and liberties in Virginia occurred on the floor of the state ratifying convention. The chief opponent of ratification was Patrick Henry. Henry, a died-in-the-wool enemy of the whole constitutional project (there seemed hardly a clause of the proposed constitution that he did not consider objectionable), addressed the civil liberties question in several passionate speeches. The Constitution was bringing a revolution, as radical as the war for independence, he thundered in one such speech, threatening to destroy "all pretensions to human rights and privileges." He railed against its tolerance for standing armies and the absence of any limitation on the quartering of troops. The partial bill of rights contained in Article I, Section 9 failed to secure "the great objects of religion, liberty of the press, trial by jury [gone in civil cases, he said, not really secured on the criminal side], interdiction of cruel punishments and every other sacred right." There was no adequate protection against general search warrants, no requirement of trial by a jury of the vicinage, nor other necessary protections for the criminal defendant such as the right to know fully the accusation against him. As to the Federalist argument that a bill of rights was not necessary because everything not given up was retained, Henry pointed to the habeas corpus clause of Section 9, which said the writ could be suspended in certain situations. That implied that absent the exception, the writ could be suspended in all cases. "It reverses the position of the friends of this Constitution," he argued. His mind would not be quieted, he declared, until he saw a substantial bill of rights.

Edmund Randolph, something of a late convert to the cause of ratification, took the lead in addressing Henry's civil liberties objections. The rights of criminal defendants were clearly implied by the constitutional text, he contended. The right to know the accusation against oneself and to confront witnesses followed from the requirement of jury trial in criminal cases. A criminal trial could not proceed without accusation and witnesses. There was no need for express prohibitions of excessive bail or cruel punishments or general search warrants since it was unreasonable to think that members of the legislature or judiciary would ever tolerate such abuses. Randolph's arguments on freedom of the press and of religion and on civil juries paralleled those of Alexander Hamilton in The Federalist, and he may have drawn on them (Hamilton's essays appeared in print in late May; the Virginia Convention convened June 2). Freedom of the press and religion were secure because the national government had been given no power over these domains. Silence on civil juries did not mean they were precluded.

Randolph was one of the few to address the question of why some rights had been specified in the 1787 Constitution but not others. Those specified, he contended, were exceptions from particular powers expressly granted Congress in the Constitution and necessitated by that grant. Thus, the prohibition on suspending habeas corpus and the ban on bills of attainder were exceptions to specific power given Congress to regulate courts or to maintain a system of criminal justice.

The arguments of Henry and others must have had some impact because Virginia's resolution of ratification, passed June 26, 1788, included a recommendation that the first Congress to assemble under the new Constitution consider amending the document to add a "Declaration or Bill of Rights asserting and securing from encroachment the essential and unalienable rights of the people." The list of rights deemed worthy of recognition closely paralleled those recognized in Virginia's own bill of rights. They included, in addition to those referred to in the Henry/Randolph colloquy, freedom of assembly, a requirement of unanimous consent for conviction in criminal trials, the right to refuse to bear arms on grounds of conscience, and something in the nature of a due process clause, providing that no one should be deprived of life, liberty, or property, "but by the law of the land." Virginia thus became the third state to recommend the addition of civil liberties amendments in its ratification resolution.

New York

The public debate on the Constitution in New York, it has been observed, was among the fullest in all the states, and it produced some of the most intelligent and penetrating discussion of the subject both by Anti-Federalist opponents and Federalist supporters. It began in the fall of 1787, months before the legislature had voted to call a convention and consisted of newspaper articles, pamphlets, and public speeches. On the Anti-Federalist side, the most thoughtful commentary came from writers using the pen names, respectively, of "Brutus" and "the Federal Farmer" (the true identity of these two has ever been satisfactorily established).

In a series of essays that appeared in the New York Journal between October 1787 and April 1788, Brutus offered an analysis of the Constitution in all its parts. He took up the lack of a bill of rights in his second essay. He found it astonishing that "this grand security for the rights of the people," as he called it, was not to be found in the proposed constitution. History had shown that it was the natural inclination of those who governed "to enlarge their powers and abridge the public liberty." An express reservation of rights was therefore a necessity, he declared. (If it was not necessary, he asked, echoing Pennsylvania's Robert Whitehill, why had the authors secured certain of these such as the habeas corpus privilege?)

Among the rights that should have been explicitly reserved, Brutus argued, were the privilege against self-incrimination, the right to confront one's accusers, and the right to be tried in the place where the crime one was accused of was allegedly committed (otherwise, one might be "carried from Kentucky to Richmond for trial for an offense," he declared). He also scored the authors for failing to include a ban on excessive bail or cruel punishment or a requirement that search warrants be supported by oaths. He thought that provision for jury trial in civil cases was essential for securing property. A particular concern of his was the Constitution's implicit endorsement of standing armies, and in several articles he warned against the dangers that they posed to liberty.

The Federal Farmer's essays appeared in a small New York newspaper but were reprinted in pamphlet form and widely distributed. This writer was less hostile to the Constitution than Brutus and somewhat more tentative in his recommendations. While he acknowledged there were difficulties in the way of the project, he thought a complete bill of rights both wise and "very practicable." There might be some force in the argument that all powers not delegated were reserved (on this question men would take such sides as suited their purposes, he wrote), but the prudent thing to assume, he averred, was that those who governed would construe their powers most broadly, and it was therefore the better part of wisdom to carefully delineate "the powers parted with and the powers reserved." He favored an enumeration of "the most essential rights" and, to hedge against the possibility that some might be overlooked in the listing, a declaration that all not expressly surrendered were reserved. There was yet another reason for including a bill of rights, the Farmer wrote. Such declarations established, "in the minds of the people truths and principles which they might never otherwise have thought of, or soon forgot." They constituted a kind of declaration of first principles and as such deserved to be prominently proclaimed.

The partial declaration already contained in the 1787 Constitution ought to be extended to secure freedom of religion, some sort of protection of the press against oppressive taxation, freedom from unreasonable searches, the right to confront one's accusers in criminal trials, and the right to trial by jury in civil cases. Juries were important not only because they protected individuals against abuse of their rights but also—and this was a point other defenders of the civil jury made—because they offered ordinary citizens yet another means of participating in public affairs. (It is important to note that at the time, juries had the authority to decide the law as well as the facts.)

The most powerful commentary in support of the Constitution to appear in New York or anywhere else for that matter during the ratification debates was doubtless that contained in The Federalist Papers. The brainchild of Alexander Hamilton and aimed primarily at influencing the debate in his home state, these essays were published in New York City newspapers between October 1787 and May 1788. As is well known, they were a showcase for his and James Madison's dazzling rhetorical talents and produced some of the most brilliant political advocacy ever written. The two that dealt most directly with the subject of rights and liberties were Hamilton's Nos. 83 and 84, both of which first appeared in the second volume of collected Federalist essays, published toward the end of May 1788.

Hamilton devoted all of No. 83 to defending the Constitution against those who criticized it for its lack of provision for jury trial in civil cases, "the objection to the plan of the convention, which has met with most success," as he noted. He dismissed with scorn those who argued that the Constitution if adopted would abolish civil juries, some even going so far as to say that it did away with juries in the state courts. Mere silence did not mean abolition, and the Congress would be totally free to make whatever provisions it wished for the trial of civil cases in the federal courts. Hamilton expressed doubt as to whether the lack of provision for civil juries was a civil liberties issue at all. It was the criminal jury, he declared, that protected individuals against the arbitrary exercise of power by the state, the true domain of personal liberty. Civil juries had little or nothing to do with such matters. Still he acknowledged that civil juries might serve as a kind of additional security against corruption in the trial of civil causes, and so he felt compelled to explain why the drafters of the Constitution had not seen fit to provide for them. The main problem, he said, was a practical one. Because there were such great variations "between the limits of the jury trial" in the different states, "no general rule could have been fixed upon." Nor did he find the Massachusetts proposal that juries be guaranteed in actions at common law very helpful because different states defined actions at common law in different ways. The sorting out of matters like this were best left to the discretion of the legislature, he argued.

Federalist No. 84, which dealt with the more general question of why the Constitution contained no bill of rights, reprised many of the same themes that James Wilson had broached in his State Yard Speech. Bills of rights were "in their origin, stipulations between kings and their subjects," "reservations of rights not surrendered to the prince." They had no application to constitutions such as that proposed, in which the people retained every power they had not given to the sovereign. Indeed, a declaration of rights would be dangerous, he averred. By stating exceptions to powers not granted, it would supply "a colorable pretext" for claiming powers not granted in the first place. A statement that the liberty of the press should not be restrained, for example, might furnish the government with the pretext for claiming a right at least to regulate. The security of the press depended on "public opinion and the general spirit of the people." The same consideration applied to those who feared oppression of the press through taxation. It would be wrong to say that newspapers should pay no taxes and no mere declaration could protect a paper against oppressive taxation.

New York voted to ratify the Constitution on July 26 by a margin of three votes. The act of ratification advocated additional protection for civil rights and liberties but in a fashion so convoluted and with language so opaque that it is impossible to characterize it any less generally than that.

Conclusion

Civil rights and liberties were not the only issue around which debate swirled during the ratification period, but they were a very important one. And by the time the First Congress assembled in March 1789, a powerful momentum in favor of adding amendments securing rights and liberties had built up. Some seven states had recommended such amendments in their ratification acts. (A guarantee of the right to jury trial in civil cases, interestingly, was the one endorsed by more states than any other.) James Madison, once as negative as Wilson and Hamilton on the wisdom of including a declaration of rights, had changed his mind. During his campaign for a seat in the House of Representatives in 1788, he promised that if elected he would make the introduction of a bill of rights one of his highest legislative priorities. He proved true to his word. On June 8, he introduced a set of amendments incorporating most, but not all, of the civil liberties provisions that proponents had been arguing for during the ratification period.

CHARLES MCCLAIN

References and Further Reading

- Albert, Peter J., and Ronald Hoffman, eds. The Bill of Rights: Government Proscribed. Charlottesville: University Press of Virginia, 1997.
- Bailyn, Bernard, ed. The Debate on the Constitution. New York: Library of America, 1993.

- Dumbauld, Edward. The Bill of Rights and What It Means Today. Norman: University of Oklahoma Press, 1957.
- Gillespie, Michael A., and Michael Lienesch, eds. Ratifying the Constitution. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 1989.
- Hunt, Gaillard, and James Brown Scott, eds. Debates in the Federal Convention of 1787. Union, NJ: Law Book Exchange, [1920] 1999.
- Jensen, Merrill, John Kaminski, and Gaspare Saladion, eds. Documentary History of the Ratification of the Constitution. 18 vols. Madison, WI: State Historical Society of Wisconsin, 1976–.
- Ketcham, Ralph. James Madison: A Biography. Charlottesville and London: University Press of Virginia, 1990.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Bill of Rights. New Haven and London: Yale University Press, 1999.
- McDonald, Forrest. E Pluribus Unum: The Formation of the American Republic, 1776–1790. Indianapolis: Liberty Fund, 1979.
- Rakove, Jack N. Original Meanings: Politics and Ideas in the Making of the Constitution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1996.
- Rossiter, Clinton, ed. The Federalist Papers. New York: New American Library, 1961.
- Storing, Herbert J., ed. The Anti-Federalist. Abridgment by Murray Dry. Chicago and London: University of Chicago Press, 1981.

RAUH, JOSEPH L., JR. (1911–1992)

Joseph L. Rauh, Jr. was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, the son of a clothing manufacturer. He graduated from Harvard College (1933) and the Harvard Law School (1935), where he ranked first in his class and came under the influence of Professor Felix Frankfurter. At the latter's urging, he joined the administration of Franklin Roosevelt in 1935 and served briefly in the general counsel's office at the new Securities and Exchange Commission. Soon, however, he was recruited by Benjamin V. Cohen and Thomas G. Corcoran, among the New Deal's keenest legal minds, to help defend the constitutionality of the Public Utilities Holding Company Act, a victory eventually secured in the U.S. Supreme Court.

In 1937, Rauh served as law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Benjamin Cardozo during the turbulent term in which Roosevelt announced his "court-packing" plan, and the justices sustained major state and federal laws directed at the nation's economic problems, including minimum wage legislation, the National Labor Relations Act, and the Social Security Act. He nursed Cardozo through his final, fatal illness a year later, and when his old mentor Frankfurter took Cardozo's seat on the Supreme Court in 1939, Rauh became his first law clerk.

He served in three other government posts before enlisting in the Army following Pearl Harbor. In the general counsel's office of the Wage and Hours Division of the Department of Labor, he drafted and defended broad interpretations of the Fair Labor Standards Act that extended the scope of its coverage over American workers. At the Federal Communications Commission, working closely with chairman Lawrence Fly, he vigorously defended Supreme Court decisions that narrowed the government's authority to engage in wiretapping (see Nardone v. United States [1937]). And in the Lend Lease Administration, where he first met labor leader Walter Reuther, he sided with those New Dealers who sought rapid conversion of domestic industries to war production.

In the Pacific theatre from 1942 to 1945, he served as a civil affairs officer on the staff of General Douglas MacArthur, most notably as the temporary mayor of the city of Manila following the Allied defeat of the Japanese in the Philippines. In that capacity, he negotiated a political truce among contending Filipino groups and saved the city's inhabitants from immediate starvation by distributing excess flour stored in military warehouses.

Returning to Washington, D.C. in 1945, Rauh went into private practice with a former Harvard classmate, Irving Levy, both specializing in labor, civil liberties, and civil rights cases. He raised funds that year for Reuther's United Automobile Workers Union (UAW) in their strike against General Motors, but declined the union's invitation to become its general counsel in Detroit, a position soon filled by Levy. Following the latter's death, Rauh became Reuther's top lawyer at the UAW and acquired a brilliant new partner, John Silard, as well as a talented young associate, Dan Pollitt, a future law professor at the University of North Carolina.

Although labor litigation and the UAW account kept the Rauh firm solvent in the 1950s and 1960s, its senior partner devoted the greater part of his energy to defending clients ensnared in the expanding government machinery of the domestic cold war. Along with Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., Eleanor Roosevelt, James Loeb, and others, he launched Americans for Democratic Action (ADA) in 1948, a staunch anti-communist, liberal organization dedicated to expanding the domestic agenda of the New Deal, defending civil liberties, and defeating Henry Wallace's third-party campaign for the presidency. While attacking Wallace and his communist supporters, Rauh leveled equally harsh criticism against the FBI, its director J. Edgar Hoover, and President Truman's Loyalty and Security Program that permitted the government to fire employees accused of disloyalty on grounds of their "sympathetic association" with persons or organizations listed as subversive by the U.S. attorney general.

Representing clients before assorted federal loyalty boards, Rauh became an outspoken critic of their procedures, which denied to those accused the right to see incriminating FBI files or to confront and cross-examine their accusers. He successfully defended James Kutcher, a disabled, decorated veteran, whose speeches on behalf of the American Trotskyites had led to his dismissal from the Veterans Administration. He won vindication in loyalty hearings as well for William Remington, an economist in the Commerce Department, who had been accused by Elizabeth Bentley of spying for the Soviet Union. Remington, however, was later charged with perjury, convicted, and sent to prison where other inmates murdered him.

Rauh took two major loyalty/security cases to the Supreme Court, where he narrowly missed achieving a constitutional milestone. Representing Dr. John Peters, blacklisted by the U.S. surgeon general, and Charles Allen Taylor, denied security clearance by the Pentagon, he asked the justices to rule that the government's failure to allow both victims access to FBI files denied due process of law, a ruling that would have seriously crippled the entire program. The justices held for Peters, but only on technical grounds (Peters v. Hobby [1955]). The Defense Department, fearing defeat, restored Taylor's clearance before oral argument. The Supreme Court therefore dismissed his suit for mootness (Taylor v. McElroy [1959]), but on the same day endorsed Rauh's due process argument in the companion case of Greene v. McElroy (1959).

Before the red hunters who ran the House Committee on Un-American Activities (HUAC), Rauh defended three notable clients—Lillian Hellman, Arthur Miller, and John Watkins—all of whom faced the unpalatable legal choice of cooperating with their interrogators, risking contempt if they refused, or invoking their privilege under the Fifth Amendment. The third choice would brand them “a Fifth Amendment communist.” He devised Hellman's strategy of offering to speak frankly about herself, but not others, an offer rejected by HUAC, which forced the playwright to take the Fifth. Doing so, she also issued a statement to the press, drafted by Rauh, that cast the Committee in the negative role of witch-hunting tyrants. She escaped further harassment by the Committee or legal consequences.

Miller and Watkins both refused to respond to questions from the Committee, were found in contempt, and convicted. On appeal, Rauh prevailed. The Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia overturned Miller's conviction on grounds that HUAC had failed to inform him of the consequences of his refusal to testify. Watkins became a Supreme Court landmark when the Warren Court reversed his conviction and reprimanded HUAC for employing its powers of investigation solely for the purposes of exposure and humiliation (Watkins v. United States [1957]).

A longtime labor lawyer, with close ties to Reuther and the autoworkers, Rauh incurred the wrath of many union leaders in the 1970s and 1980s, when he skillfully used the Landrum-Griffin Act to promote union democracy and fair elections for insurgent candidates inside the United Mine Workers Union (UMW), the United Steelworkers, and the UAW itself. He won a new election for Jock Yablonski, the reform leader in the UMW, including critical access to union publications, shortly before the union leadership hired gunmen who murdered Yablonski, his wife, and daughter. He represented Ed Sadlowski in his bid to topple the old guard in the steelworkers' union and he nearly prevailed in a major Supreme Court case that would have allowed union reformers to seek financial support outside the existing union membership (United Steelworkers of America v. Sadlowski [1982]). His endorsement of Jerry Tucker's campaign inside the UAW made him an outcast among his old union allies in Detroit.

Although ill health prevented him from carrying his last civil liberties case to its conclusion in the early 1990s, Rauh's tenacity and skill won a significant victory for a group of Canadian citizens for whom he sued the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) for negligence, and forced the agency to a financial settlement rather than a public trial. The Canadians had been subjected to illegal and dangerous drug experiments at McGill University during the 1960s when they sought legitimate medical treatment at a clinic funded by the CIA as part of its experiments in brainwashing. The Canadian government, also implicated in the cover-up of the program, made restitution to its own citizens shortly after Rauh died in 1992.

MICHAEL E. PARRISH

References and Further Reading

Parrish, Michael E., A Lawyer in Crisis Times: Joseph L. Rauh, Jr., the Loyalty-Security Program, and the Defense of Civil Liberties in the Early Cold War, North Carolina Law Review 82 (2004): 1799.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Greene v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474 (1959)
Nardone v. United States, 392 U.S. 379 (1937)
Peters v. Hobby, 349 U.S. 331 (1955)
Taylor v. McElroy, 360 U.S. 474 (1959)

R.A.V. v. CITY OF ST. PAUL,
505 U.S. 377 (1992)

In R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, the Supreme Court struck down a St. Paul, Minnesota ordinance that proscribed cross burning and other actions, “which one knows or has reasonable grounds to know” will cause “anger, alarm or resentment in others on the basis of race, color, creed, religion or gender.” The Court unanimously held that the law was unconstitutional, but the justices agreed about little else. Four members of the Court—Justices White, Blackmun, Stevens, and O’Connor—concurred in the judgment of the Court, but did so solely on the grounds that the ordinance was overly broad, sweeping within its proscription expression that should be protected. The other five members of the Court, in the majority opinion of Justice Scalia, reached farther and found that the St. Paul ordinance was an unconstitutional content-based regulation of speech.

In R.A.V., the defendant Robert Viktora, then a minor, was accused of burning a cross on the lawn of Russell and Laura Jones and their children, an African-American family who had recently moved into the neighborhood. In moving to dismiss the indictment, Viktora asserted both that the ordinance was overbroad and that it was an unconstitutional, content-based restriction on speech. The Minnesota Supreme Court rejected the overbreadth challenge because that court construed the ordinance to apply only to “fighting words,” expression not protected by the First Amendment. The majority opinion by Justice Scalia accepted this construction, and thus reached the content-based challenge.

Justice Scalia utilized a limited categorical approach to the First Amendment. Acknowledging that “fighting words,” along with other categories of expression such as obscenity and defamation, are not entitled to full First Amendment protection, Justice Scalia asserted that these forms of expression nevertheless enjoy some limited protection and are not “entirely invisible to the Constitution.” Within any of these categories, expression may be proscribed only on the basis of its categorical nature and not on the basis of its content.

Justice Scalia’s approach to the content neutrality doctrine purports not to require the government to proscribe either all forms of proscribable speech or none at all. Rather, he identified two exceptions to the general unacceptability of content-based restrictions on expression. First, choices may be made as to which forms of speech to proscribe so long as these choices do not address the content of the expression. Second, regulations may address content for the “very reason the entire class of speech at issue is proscribable” in the first place. For example, a regulation prohibiting only obscenity, “which is the most patently offensive in its prurience” would be permissible.

Justice Scalia found that the St. Paul ordinance fell within neither exception. He concluded that the ordinance was aimed directly at racist speech and biased beliefs rather than at “fighting words” generally or at a subgroup of “fighting words” selected for reasons other than the content of those words. He thus held that the ordinance impermissibly chose sides in the debate over racial prejudice. “St. Paul has no such authority to license one side of a debate to fight freestyle, while requiring the other to follow Marquis of Queensbury Rules.”

The ultimate reach of R.A.V. was substantially limited by the Court’s decision one year later in Wisconsin v. Mitchell (1993) upholding the Wisconsin bias crime law.

FREDERICK M. LAWRENCE

Cases and Statutes Cited

Wisconsin v. Mitchell, 508 U.S. 476 (1993)

RAWLINGS V. KENTUCKY,
448 U.S. 98 (1980)

In order for a person to be entitled to suppress evidence that has been seized unconstitutionally by the police and is going to be used against him or her in a criminal trial, that person must have “standing” to raise the issue. Standing exists only when and if a person’s own constitutional rights have been violated, not when the police have violated another person’s constitutional rights. Put another way, there is no “vicarious standing.”

The Rawlings case is a classic example. Police officers entered a home with an arrest warrant for the owner. Rawlings, a visitor, was present and just prior to the officers’ arrival, he asked another visitor, Cox, to let him put his drugs in her purse. The police subsequently ordered Cox to dump out the contents of her purse, exposing the narcotics. Rawlings tried to have these drugs suppressed, arguing that the police search and seizure was unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court held that Rawlings lacked standing to raise the issue. Then-Justice Rehnquist, for the majority, held that Rawlings did not have a legitimate expectation of privacy in Cox’s purse necessary for standing because he had only known her for a few days, had never used her purse before, she had let another friend go through her purse that morning, the transaction was precipitous, and Rawlings had not taken “normal precautions” to maintain the privacy of his drugs.

The Rawlings decision reflects a narrow view of when a legitimate expectation of privacy exists, a view that has not always been followed so grudgingly by the Court. For example, the Court subsequently held that overnight visitors in an apartment have a reasonable expectation of privacy sufficient for standing to raise the issue of the constitutionality of searches and seizures on those premises.

JOHN M. BURKOFF

See also Exclusionary Rule; Privacy; Search (General Definition)

RAWLS, JOHN BORDLEY (1929–2002)

John Bordley Rawls, philosopher and political theorist, was born in Baltimore, Maryland on February 21, 1929, and died November 24, 2002. He married Margaret Warfield Fox and they had four children. Rawls earned a Ph.D. in 1950 in philosophy from Princeton University. He taught there, and then at Cornell University and MIT. In 1962 he joined the faculty of Harvard until his retirement. His work encompasses social contract theory including principles of justice, civil liberties, economics, religion, social science, international relations, human rights, just war criteria, and ethics. His theory reflects moral and egalitarian presuppositions, and his philosophical perspective pervades and enriches his thought.

Rawls sought to create a theory that could supplant that of utilitarianism with its inherent inequities. He wrote A Theory of Justice (1971), which offers a social contract theory for modern pluralistic democracies. Rawls’s principles of justice apply to the basic structure of society, which refers to major social institutions of society such as the political constitutions and major social and economic arrangements. Rawls’s theory is comprehensive, coherent, and internally consistent.

Justice and Liberties

Rawls’s principles of justice are chosen by rational contractors in a theoretical construct that he terms the “original position,” which is designed to foster impartiality in the choice of principles. In this hypothetical context, to ensure that the contractors do not select principles of justice that would preference their own individual self-interests, Rawls places them behind a “veil of ignorance.” They do not know what their social positions will be, or their religious beliefs, philosophical commitments, moral convictions, level of intelligence, or degree of wealth, the knowledge of which would enable the rational contractors to select principles of justice that would further their own interests. The principles are chosen in a context that eliminates bias, and are those that Rawls believes would be chosen in this situation.

Rawls’s two principles of justice guarantee that political liberties are to be equally held by all citizens. The first principle of justice specifies that each is to have a right to basic liberties that is compatible with the basic liberties of others. This principle takes priority over the second principle, which ensures equality of fair opportunity in respect to the attainment of offices and positions as well as specifying that social and economic inequalities are to be arranged so that they benefit the least advantaged. Over time, this tends to reduce inequalities among citizens by improving the lot of the least advantaged. It reflects the egalitarian perspective that pervades Rawls’s thought.

Rawls conceives of persons as rational, free, equal, having intrinsic worth and dignity, and possessed of two moral powers. These powers are a capacity for a sense of justice and the ability to conceive of the good and to rationally seek it. Liberties enable people to develop these moral powers. He envisions a well-ordered society as one in which equal citizens act according to a shared conception of justice, with cooperation and mutual respect prevailing. Rawls’s work moves from a consideration of social contract theory to a narrower focus on political liberalism’s capacity to achieve a stable society despite the pluralism intrinsic to modern democracies.

Rawls’s basic liberties include freedom of political speech and press, freedom of assembly, liberty of conscience, freedom of thought, and freedom of association. Rights and liberties are covered by the rule of law. The liberty and integrity of persons is violated by slavery and serfdom. Rawls sees liberties protected by the U.S. Constitution’s First Amendment as essential to control the misconduct of government. Basic liberties are inalienable and cannot be justly denied to any person, group, or all citizens by the majority. Free and equal citizens may vote as they wish.

Rawls discusses freedom of political speech and regards libel and defamation of private, not political, figures as private wrongs with no significance for the basic structure of society that is central to his theory.

Free political speech combined with the just political procedures specified by a constitution offer a way to avoid revolution and the use of force. He cites within the history of constitutional doctrine fixed points regarding free speech: the protection of the advocacy of subversive and revolutionary doctrines, unrestrained freedom of the press, with few exceptions, and that seditious libel is a nonexistent crime. If it were, this would impede free discussion that informs voters. Political, religious, and philosophical discussions are not to be censored.

If subversive advocacy is suppressed, the reasons being proposed for revolution are made unavailable to citizens who are then unable to judge from this perspective the justice of their society. This violates freedom of thought. The clear and present danger rule entails a consideration of the proximity and degree to which subversive advocacy will result in lawlessness. Rawls rejects these criteria and states that for free speech to be suppressed, there must be a constitutional crisis of the sort in which democratic institutions fail to function adequately, and emergency procedures are inoperable. He rejects appeals to emergencies even involving the possible destruction of the state as not offering sufficient reason to override freedom of speech. Rawls suggests that in the United States, historically free political institutions have continuously functioned and the requisite constitutional crisis justifying the suppression of free speech has not arisen.

Rawls strongly objects to Supreme Court rulings (Buckley v. Valeo [1976] and First National Bank v. Bellotti [1978]) that held unconstitutional components of the Election Act Amendment of 1974 which placed limits on campaign expenditures. The Supreme Court deemed these limitations a restriction of free speech.

Rawls advocates limits to political campaign donations. The equal opportunity component of his principles of justice in which all are equally to have access to political and social positions of power is undermined when the wealthy have an advantage over others in the electoral process and spheres of influence. All should have equal representation, which is essential to protect basic rights.

Rawls affirms the importance of due process, impartiality, and open and fair trials. He connects the rule of law with liberty. People have a right to own personal property. Rawls regards this liberty as providing a sense of independence and self-respect as well as enhancing moral powers. Significantly, the moral power of rationally determining and seeking one's good does not limit "good" to a moral designation, but expands it to include primary goods, which encompass not only liberties, rights, and opportunities, but things such as income and wealth, which people make rational plans to acquire in order to pursue desirable types of lives.

In the area of reproductive freedom, Rawls approves of abortion in the first trimester, because of the equality of women, which allows them to make this decision during the early stage of pregnancy. He views the role of the family to be one of not only raising and caring for children, but also of instilling within them a moral sense and an ability to fit into the culture and become good citizens. This does not require a particular form of family. Families that foster these values may be monogamous or heterosexual. Gay and lesbian rights and duties that are in this sphere of orderly family life are admissible.

Political Liberalism

Freedom of conscience is a significant theme in Rawls's work. He consistently and strongly advocates ensuring this liberty. Concerned with the divisive nature of the wars of religion arising from the multiplicity of religions in the aftermath of the Reformation, Rawls sought a way of obtaining a well-ordered democratic society in the face of rampant pluralism, not only of religions, but of cultural backgrounds and philosophical convictions. He removes these elements from the political sphere and places them in what he terms "comprehensive doctrines." These encompass religious, philosophical, and moral convictions and commitments that are central to people's conceptions of the good and impart meaning to their lives. Justice as fairness is a political conception of justice and not part of any comprehensive doctrine. By separating the political from privately held convictions in comprehensive doctrines, divisive elements are removed from the political sphere. This contributes to social stability, as does the fact that there is an overlapping consensus on the subject of justice by citizens with widely conflicting convictions within their comprehensive doctrines. Rawls does not advocate suppression of free speech regarding them, but disallows them as part of the political agenda. The enormously divisive issues in society, such as abortion, have not resulted in civil war. The government continues to function despite significant social problems. This may be attributable to the stabilizing influence of a shared acceptance and recognition of the value of the Constitution. This overlapping consensus leads to changes being sought within the system rather than by revolution. Rawls does not claim that an overlapping consensus on the subject of justice leads to a harmonious ideal society, but only that it fosters stability in the face of a multiplicity of exceedingly incompatible and divisive convictions.

The political virtues include fairness, tolerance, being ready to meet others halfway, and cooperation based on mutual respect, which is reflected by Rawls's conception of reciprocity. He stresses that social cooperation is for mutual benefit. Reciprocity ensures that each benefits and citizens mutually cooperate. The basic structure of society is based on fair terms of cooperation.

Religious Voices in the Public Sphere

While advocating freedom of speech, Rawls offers a proviso which requires that religious and nonreligious elements of comprehensive doctrines be permitted in political discussion only if they may ultimately be supported by proper public political reasons, and not reasons solely within comprehensive doctrines. He confines public reasoning to the domain of a political conception of justice. It entails public political deliberation that reflects political values such as justice and the common welfare, which are not components of comprehensive doctrines.

Rawls's political liberalism regards both rational secular arguments and religious ones in the same way: they do not provide public reasons and are outside the realm of the public political domain. Public justification is entailed; in addition to the requirement of valid reasoning, religious and secular arguments must also offer premises and conclusions that could be reasonably accepted by others. This transforms privately held convictions into ones that are compatible with public reason in the political domain. This requirement that others see the arguments as reasonable leads to concurrence by eliminating divisive stances that are unsupported by public reason and on which there is no agreement. This restriction disallows religious convictions that may not meet his proviso's criterion, but nonetheless could be considered reasonable within their own conceptual schemes, such as systematic theologies. Rawls's requirement does not counter his advocacy of freedom of conscience, but his narrow construal of "reasonable" may circumscribe the extent to which religious voices could be heard in public policy discussions.

Rawls advocates religious toleration, which mitigates conflicts both between religion and democracy, and among religious doctrines. His conception of justice protects religious liberty. The separation of church and state protects the church from the state and citizens from their churches (they may change their faiths and even apostatize), as much as it protects the secular culture from religious influence.

This separation strengthens democracy. The principles supporting it are those that citizens in a pluralistic society can endorse. Civil society need not be based on a religious establishment. The school prayer issue involves the type of reasons citizens offer to justify political choices. Given the pluralism of modern democracies, citizens would not accept religious reasons for school prayer.

Human Rights and Just War Criteria

In The Law of Peoples (1999), Rawls extends his theory to include international relations. He regards liberty of conscience as a human right and this stance concurs with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights of 1948, which includes the right to life, liberty, and security of the person, and prohibits torture and degrading treatments and punishments. Both the Declaration and Rawls's theory share the concepts of persons as free, rational, and equal in dignity and rights.

Rawls revises traditional powers of sovereignty including the right to go to war and unrestricted political autonomy. His just war thought limits the right to go to war to the criterion of self-defense. Well-ordered peoples may wage war against outlaw states whose expansionist aims threaten the security of well-ordered states, or, in grave cases, to protect human rights. The political and moral force of human rights extends to all nations, peoples, and societies. Outlaw states that severely violate them may face intervention by well-ordered states. Internal autonomy does not extend to suspending human rights.

Rawls's theory is comprehensive, cogent, and consistent, and has had inestimable influence in a number of fields including philosophy, law, and political theory. He is widely regarded as the most significant political theorist of the twentieth century.

ELIZABETH S. CARPENTER

References and Further Reading

- John Rawls. A Theory of Justice. Cambridge, MA: Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1971.
- . Political Liberalism. New York: Columbia University Press, 1993.
- . The Law of Peoples. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- . Collected Papers. Edited by Samuel Freeman. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976).

First National Bank v. Bellotti, 435 U.S. 765 (1978).

REAPPORTIONMENT

Apportionment—the division of a state into districts for the purposes of electing legislative representatives—raises profoundly important political and legal questions. The democratic right of individuals to cast equally valuable votes, and the republican commitment to equal representation are sometimes complementary, and sometimes conflicting, values. When changes in population necessitate the redrawing of the boundaries of electoral districts—reapportionment—the process is fraught with controversy. Since the 1960s, the courts have played an increasingly prominent role in legislative reapportionment. This is because legislators have often been more concerned with protecting their political power than protecting the civil liberties of voters.

The Court Enters the “Political Thicket”

Reapportionment was traditionally considered an issue to be resolved by the political branches of government. After World War II, as American society experienced significant population shifts from rural to urban areas there was increasing pressure on the courts to intervene and protect the fundamental civil liberty of honest representation. Legislative remedies were not forthcoming; the rural interests that dominated legislatures were unwilling to reapportion districts because this would reduce their political power.

By the late 1950s, at least ten states had sought to remedy this electoral discrimination by giving their courts responsibility for legislative apportionment. The effects were limited, however, because the federal courts were reluctant to become involved. They adhered to the Supreme Court’s 1946 decision in Colegrove v. Green, in which Justice Felix Frankfurter wrote that legislative apportionment was a “political thicket” that courts should avoid entering. It was, said Frankfurter, a subject matter that constituted a purely “political question”; in brief, it was an issue to be settled by the ballot box, not judicial opinion.

In 1962, the Court’s landmark decision in Baker v. Carr overruled Colegrove. Despite decennial censuses showing that Tennessee had experienced a significant increase in its urban population and an accompanying decline in rural areas, the districts for its state legislature were still apportioned according to the 1901 census. This created a situation whereby voters living in rural areas enjoyed a far greater share of legislative seats than those living in the more heavily populated urban districts. In Baker, although the Court did not determine whether this plan was constitutional, it did decide that this was a question that could be reviewed by a court—legislative apportionment was, the Court held, a justiciable issue. Convinced that the Court’s decision in Colegrove had been correct, in a dissenting opinion in Baker, Frankfurter wrote: “[I]n a democratic society like ours, relief must come through an aroused popular conscience that sears the conscience of the people’s representatives.” The Court responded that however strong were the people’s calls for relief they went unheard by the legislators, in whose own interests the malapportioned districts were drawn.

Chief Justice Earl Warren later stated that Baker was the most significant decision made by the Court during his sixteen years as chief justice.

The 1963/1964 Reapportionment Cases

The majority of the reapportionment cases decided before Baker addressed the republican ideals that the guarantee clause of Article IV wrote into the Constitution. In Baker, the Court avoided this provision that guaranteed every state a republican form of government; instead it overcame the political question doctrine by using the democratic values of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Between 1962 and 1964, in a series of major decisions, the Court expanded its involvement by ruling on the merits of specific apportionment plans. These decisions demonstrated the “fundamental” and democratic nature of the basic civic liberty of honest electoral representation through equal worth of individual votes, and the republican value of equal legislative representation.

The decisions in Gray v. Sanders (1963) and Wesberry v. Sanders (1964) represented the transition from Baker to the landmark cases decided in June 1964. In Gray the Court heard a challenge to Georgia’s system of counting primary election votes based on county units, a system that greatly benefited the residents of rural counties. Writing for the Court, Justice William O. Douglas concluded that “political equality from the Declaration of Independence, to Lincoln’s Gettysburg Address, to the Fifteenth, Seventeenth, and Nineteenth Amendments can mean only one thing—one person, one vote.” Eleven months later, in Wesberry v. Sanders, the Court modified this standard and applied it to elections nationwide when it concluded that the Constitution required that “as nearly as is practicable” votes in congressional elections should carry equal weight.

In six cases decided in June 1964, headed by Reynolds v. Sims, the Court applied these principles to the states, ruling that the Constitution required per capita apportionment in both houses of every bicameral state legislature. The Court’s opinion, written by Chief Justice Warren, effectively ended legislators’ attempts to rationalize malapportionment. His opinion declared, “Legislators represent people, not trees or acres. Legislators are elected by voters, not farms or cities or economic interests.” The Court categorized equal political representation as a “fundamental” right of the individual voter, protected by the equal protection clause. As the Court said, “The right to vote freely for the candidate of one’s choice is of the essence of a democratic society.” Traditionally, the Court had rarely required the government to present anything more than a rational justification for actions challenged under this provision of the Constitution. In Reynolds, labeling this right “fundamental” meant applying the standard of strict scrutiny that now required the government to show that its actions were narrowly tailored to further a compelling state interest. There could be no such interest in apportionment that was not per capita because, Warren concluded, “To the extent that a citizen’s right to vote is debased, he is that much less a citizen.”

Frankfurter left the Court in 1962, but the position he took in Baker—that reapportionment was a purely political question—was maintained by Justice John Marshall Harlan II, who dissented alone in Reynolds. In the accompanying cases, however, the Court was split over whether its decisions actually reflected democratic or republican values. This division was clearest in Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado, involving an apportionment plan that became a state constitutional amendment after adoption, by referendum, by a majority of the voters in every county of the state. The plan only provided for per capita apportionment in the lower house of the state legislature. The Court maintained that this plan was unconstitutional because, as in Reynolds, individuals’ votes were not equally weighted. Dissenting in Lucas, Justice Potter Stewart rejected this, saying that the cases decided with Reynolds “have nothing to do with the denial or impairment of any person’s right to vote.” Instead, they involved the limits that the equal protection clause places on states’ choices of apportionment plans.

In Reynolds, the Court was committed to the fundamental civil liberties principle that “the basic aim of legislative apportionment” is “fair and effective representation for all citizens.” It recognized, however, that differences among the states made it unreasonable to insist on “a strict population standard” if there existed “legitimate considerations incident to the effectuation of a rational state policy” that could justify “deviations from the equal-population principle.” Although this rational basis standard of judicial review made it easier for a state to defend its redistricting actions than would have been the case if the Court imposed strict judicial scrutiny, the Court warned that “neither history alone, nor economic or other sorts of group interests, are permissible factors in attempting to justify disparities from population-based representation. Citizens, not history or economic interests, cast votes.” This observation would have significant consequences, in later decades, as the Court considered whether these rules applied when the “group interests” were based on ethnicity or race.

The reapportionment cases of 1963 and 1964 received the public support of Presidents John F. Kennedy and Lyndon B. Johnson, who integrated the broad civil liberties principles of the decisions into civil rights agendas. Many members of Congress, however, agreed with Frankfurter and Harlan that malapportionment remedies should be sought at the ballot box, not through judicial action. There were repeated congressional calls, during 1964 and 1965, for punitive legislation or constitutional amendments to prevent future judicial involvement in legislative apportionment. Support for these changes was lacking, however, as attention turned to the passage of major civil rights legislation, in particular the Voting Rights Act of 1965 (VRA). Representing the spirit of both the Fifteenth Amendment, which prohibits the denial of voting rights based on race, and the vote dilution concerns of Baker and its 1964 progeny, the VRA placed greater protections on the voting rights of minorities (initially blacks, then other groups), and required states to seek Justice Department approval for any electoral representation changes involving the “effectiveness” of votes.

Where and How to Draw District Boundaries

Since 1965, reapportionment challenges have usually involved one of two issues—the mathematical equality of district populations, and the factors that may be used to determine where boundaries are drawn. In Lucas, the Court said that “one of the most undesirable features” of Colorado’s apportionment was the requirement that counties with multiple legislative seats were required to hold at-large county elections. This debased the votes of the residents in the most populous counties, because, the Court observed, “No identifiable constituencies within the populous counties resulted, and the residents of those areas had no single member of the Senate or House elected specifically to represent them.” Critical that the Court’s decision ignored the more important, and traditional geographical considerations for reapportionment, the dissenters argued that if “the goal is solely that of equally ‘weighted’ votes,” then the preferable remedy is “the abolition of districts and the holding of all elections at-large.” Responding to this debate, in 1967 Congress passed legislation requiring single-member districts for congressional elections in states with more than one seat.

The Court has traditionally placed greater importance on the mathematical equality of the populations of congressional districts than those created for state legislative elections. In 1983, in Karcher v. Daggett, a five-justice majority rejected the reapportionment of New Jersey into districts, the largest and smallest of which were separated by less than four thousand votes. The Court concluded that “absolute population equality” was “the paramount objective of apportionment” for congressional seats under Article I of the Constitution. However, it retained the recognition, made in Reynolds, that differences among the states permitted greater deviation from mathematical equality for state legislative apportionment.

Gerrymandering

Taking its name from the salamander-shaped district created in 1811 by Massachusetts Governor Elbridge Gerry in an attempt to maximize his political power, “gerrymandering” is the practice of drawing the boundaries of legislative districts in order to favor or disadvantage a political party or group. Traditionally used as a negative term describing discriminatory reapportionment practices, or bizarrely shaped districts, litigation usually involves either partisan or racial gerrymandering.

Recognizing that reapportionment always involves political motives, the courts have been reluctant to decide the legality of redistricting that favors one political party at the expense of another. The continuing importance of honest representation has led the Court to hold that partisan gerrymandering is a justiciable issue—Davis v. Bandemer (1986). In this case, however, the Court found that an Indiana state legislative apportionment plan did not dilute the votes of Democrats. To show that a plan “substantially disadvantages certain voters in their opportunity to influence the political process effectively,” the Court said, required “evidence of continued frustration of the will of a majority of the voters or effective denial to a minority of voters of a fair chance to influence the political process.” The Court found that this evidence did not exist in Indiana.

Since the 1960s, the Court has been more willing to consider whether such disadvantages exist when reapportionment is challenged based on race. In 1960, in Gomillion v. Lightfoot, the Court struck down a plan that redrew the boundaries of the city of Tuskegee, Alabama, to exclude black residents and maintain whites’ control of the city’s politics, creating, in the words of the Court, a district that was an “uncouth twenty-eight-sided figure.” The Court unanimously ruled that state redistricting could not constitutionally violate a right protected by federal law—in this case the voting rights protections of the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Two decades later, in Mobile v. Bolden (1980), the Court ruled that reapportionment could only be found to violate either of these amendments because of race if there was evidence of a legislative intent to engage in such discrimination. In 1986, the Court expanded the opportunities for racial minorities to mount successful challenges to reapportionment plans when it decided, in Thornburg v. Gingles, that the effects of redistricting could be used to prove racial discrimination. It is important to note, however, that Gingles was limited to claims based on the VRA. It was a reaction to amendments to that law; as such, it left Bolden untouched because that case involved a constitutional, rather than statutory, claim.

Although answering some important questions about racially discriminatory reapportionment, these cases did not consider the contentious question of whether legislative districts could be drawn to increase minority power. Did the “one man, one vote” guarantee mean that every individual’s one vote carried equal weight, or was it necessary to provide political advantages to groups whose votes, because of discriminatory practices, did not actually result in equal legislative representation?

“Majority-Minority” Districts

Beginning in the 1970s, the federal government, through its enforcement of the VRA, promoted the creation of so-called “majority-minority” districts.

When they reapportioned their states, legislators were encouraged to create districts that contained a majority of residents of ethnic or racial minorities. One result was a sharp increase in the number of blacks and Hispanics elected to the House of Representatives. Following the 1990 census, a number of states redrew the boundaries of their legislative constituencies in order to include majority-minority districts after their initial reapportionment plans were rejected by the Justice Department. In Shaw v. Reno (1993) and Miller v. Johnson (1995), a closely divided Court concluded that these efforts to create political communities out of racial communities were unconstitutional, and that residents must create any such communities voluntarily, without a state assumption “that voters of a particular race, because of their race, “think alike, share the same political interests, and will prefer the same candidates at the polls” (Miller, quoting from Shaw).

In Shaw, the Court was confronted with a North Carolina reapportionment plan that contained, in the Court’s words, “district boundary lines of dramatically irregular shape,” creating one district whose shape was described by some, the Court observed, as resembling a “bug splattered on a windshield.” Politically, the plan benefited minorities because it created two districts that sent black members to Congress from North Carolina for the first time in the twentieth century. However, from a legal perspective, the Court concluded, the plan violated the constitutional protections that existed to protect the civil liberties of everyone in American society. “Racial gerrymandering,” wrote Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, “even for remedial purposes, may balkanize us into competing racial factions; it threatens to carry us further from the goal of a political system in which race no longer matters—a goal that the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments embody, and to which the Nation continues to aspire.” Therefore, she concluded, “race-based districting by our state legislatures demands close judicial scrutiny”—the test that required such plans to be defended as narrowly tailored to further a compelling state interest.

Two years later, in Miller, the Court explained that its objections to the North Carolina plan in Shaw were not confined to the bizarre shape of the districts. Again confronted with the creation of majority-minority districts, this time in Georgia, the Court, through Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, stated that a reapportionment plan was unconstitutional when race was found to be “the predominant factor” in determining the boundaries of districts. In Hunt v. Cromartie, in 1999, the Court further clarified that the existence of a majority of blacks in a district was not, on its own, proof of racially motivated redistricting.

Reapportionment: A Continuing Controversy

In reapportionment cases, the Supreme Court has had a longstanding affinity for the protection of the civil liberties of individuals rather than community interests. Shaw and Miller demonstrated that this tradition faces its strongest challenge when the group interests at stake are defined by race or ethnicity. The four dissenters in both cases concluded, as Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg wrote in Miller, “Apportionment schemes, by their very nature, assemble people in groups.... That ethnicity defines some of these groups is a political reality.”

In the 1990s, a majority of the Supreme Court agreed that Americans “share both the obligation and the aspiration of working toward” the goal of “eradicating invidious discrimination from the electoral process” (Miller). Yet, it is unclear what this means for the law and politics of reapportionment. It is clear, however, that the judicial branch will continue to play a major role in protecting the voting rights of individuals. This is because legislators cannot be guaranteed to do so, and because it is a fundamental premise of America’s constitutional democracy that “[c]ourts sit to adjudicate controversies involving alleged denials of constitutional rights” (Lucas).

HELEN J. KNOWLES

References and Further Reading

- Buchman, Jeremy. Drawing Lines in Quicksand: Courts, Legislatures, and Redistricting. New York: Peter Lang, 2003.
- Davidson, Roger H., and Walter J. Oleszek. Congress and Its Members. 10th ed. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 2005.
- Epstein, Lee, and Thomas G. Walker. Constitutional Law for a Changing America: Rights, Liberties, and Justice. 5th ed. Washington, D.C.: CQ Press, 2004.
- Knowles, Helen J., May It Please the Court? The Solicitor General’s Not So ‘Special’ Relationship—Archibald Cox and the 1963–1964 Reapportionment Cases, Journal of Supreme Court History (July 2006).
- Peacock, Anthony A., ed. Affirmative Action and Representation: Shaw v. Reno and the Future of Voting Rights. Durham: Carolina Academic Press, 1997.
- Ryden, David K., ed. The U.S. Supreme Court and the Electoral Process. Washington, D.C.: Georgetown University Press, 2000.
- Yarbrough, Tinsley E. Race and Redistricting: The Shaw-Cromartie Cases. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Baker v. Carr*, 369 U.S. 186 (1962)
- Colegrove v. Green*, 328 U.S. 549 (1946)
- Davis v. Bandemer*, 478 U.S. 109 (1986)

Gomillion v. Lightfoot, 364 U.S. 339 (1960)
Gray v. Sanders, 372 U.S. 368 (1963)
Hunt v. Cromartie, 526 U.S. 541 (1999)
Karcher v. Daggett, 462 U.S. 725 (1983)
Lucas v. Forty-Fourth General Assembly of Colorado, 377 U.S. 713 (1964)
Miller v. Johnson, 515 U.S. 900 (1995)
Mobile v. Bolden, 446 U.S. 55 (1980)
Reynolds v. Sims, 377 U.S. 533 (1964)
Shaw v. Reno, 509 U.S. 630 (1993)
Thornburg v. Gingles, 478 U.S. 30 (1986)
Wesberry v. Sanders, 375 U.S. 1 (1964)
 Single-Member District Act of 1967, 2 USC Sec. 2c.
 Voting Rights Act Amendments of 1982, Pub. L. 97-205, 96 Stat. 131
 Voting Rights Act of 1965, Pub. L. 89-100, 79 Stat. 437

See also Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Voting Rights (Compound); Warren Court

RED LION BROADCASTING CO. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

Over-the-air radio and television broadcasters receive generally fewer constitutional safeguards than their counterparts in printed media. This disparity in First Amendment jurisprudence originated in the 1969 case of Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC. That decision upheld the Federal Communications Commission's (FCC) fairness doctrine, which comprised two distinct rules. The "personal attack" rule required an FCC-licensed broadcaster to offer an opportunity to respond to any public figure who had been personally attacked during a broadcast. The "political editorializing" rule required a broadcaster who endorsed or opposed a political candidate to offer reply time to all disfavored candidates.

Red Lion upheld the fairness doctrine. Mindful of physical limits on the extent of the electromagnetic spectrum, Justice Byron White observed that "only a tiny fraction of those with resources and intelligence can hope to communicate by radio at the same time." This scarcity, held the Court, justified limits on the First Amendment rights of broadcasters: "Where there are substantially more individuals who want to broadcast than there are frequencies to allot, it is idle to posit an unabridgeable First Amendment right to broadcast comparable to the right of every individual to speak, write, or publish."

The Supreme Court has never upheld a right-of-reply regime of the sort at issue in Red Lion in any context outside broadcasting. Five years later, in a decision that did not cite Red Lion, the Supreme Court in Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974) invalidated a state right-of-reply law that was functionally identical to the fairness doctrine at issue in Red Lion. The Tornillo Court found that a compulsory right of reply impermissibly impaired the editorial freedom of newspaper publishers. In the 1998 case of Arkansas Educational Television Commission v. Forbes, the Court observed that "broad rights of access for outside speakers" to nonbroadcast facilities are "antithetical" to publishers' constitutional rights. In a 1987 proceeding called In re Syracuse Peace Council, the FCC repealed the fairness doctrine as a matter of administrative law.

The scarcity rationale that justified Red Lion's endorsement of the fairness doctrine has faced withering criticism in lower court decisions and in the academic literature. Every communicative medium is scarce in the sense that not every willing speaker will have access. The "analytical confusion" that has surrounded Red Lion's scarcity rationale, as Judge Robert Bork observed in 1986, arises from the Supreme Court's fruitless "attempt to use a universal fact as a distinguishing principle."

Although broadcasters are no longer required to follow the fairness doctrine, Red Lion retains enormous importance within free speech jurisprudence. Together with the 1943 case of National Broadcasting Co. v. United States, Red Lion stands for the proposition that "differences in the characteristics of new media justify differences in the First Amendment standards applied to them." This endorsement of medium-specific approaches to the First Amendment all but dictated the Supreme Court's decision to uphold a "must-carry" regime for cable television in the Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC controversy. As illustrated in the 1996 case of Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. FCC and in the 2000 case of United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc., however, the Supreme Court has never equated the constitutional status of cable television with that of broadcasting. Nor has the Court used Red Lion to justify a reduction in constitutional protection for sexually explicit speech on the Internet. Indeed, the Court has blocked full enforcement of the Communications Decency Act of 1996 and the Child Online Protection Act of 1998 on constitutional grounds.

Perhaps Red Lion's most enduring legacy is its blueprint for judicial evaluation of novel communications conduits. As summarized in the 1997 case of Reno v. ACLU, which invalidated the Communications Decency Act, Red Lion invites courts to examine the history of regulation within a particular medium (such as conventional broadcasting, cable television, or the Internet), the scarcity of available channels for expression, and the extent to which a medium has an "invasive" impact on its audience. Despite the limited reach of the so-called "broadcast model" of free speech jurisprudence and the decline of the fairness doctrine, Red Lion can be expected to figure prominently in any case that contests the constitutional status of a new communications medium for the first time.

JIM CHEN

References and Further Reading

- Benjamin, Stuart Minor, The Logic of Scarcity: Idle Spectrum as a First Amendment Violation, Duke Law Journal 52 (2002): 1.
- Bloch, Susan Low, Orphaned Rules in the Administrative State: The Fairness Doctrine and Other Orphaned Progeny of Interactive Deregulation, Georgetown Law Journal 76 (1987): 59.
- Chen, Jim, Conduit-Based Regulation of Speech, Duke Law Journal 54 (2005).
- , Liberating Red Lion from the Glass Menagerie of Free Speech Jurisprudence, Telecommunications and High Technology Law Journal 1 (2002): 293.
- Robinson, Glen O., The Electronic First Amendment: An Essay for the New Age, Duke Law Journal 47 (1998): 899.
- Van Alstyne, William W., The Möbius Strip of the First Amendment: Perspectives on Red Lion, South Carolina Law Review 29 (1978): 539.
- Weinberg, Jonathan, Broadcasting and Speech, California Law Review 81 (1993): 1103.
- Yoo, Christopher S., The Rise and Demise of the Technology-Specific Approach to the First Amendment, Georgetown Law Journal 91 (2003): 245.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arkansas Educ. Television Comm'n v. Forbes*, 523 U.S. 666 (1998)
- Denver Area Educational Telecommunications Consortium, Inc. v. FCC*, 518 U.S. 727 (1996)
- In re Syracuse Peace Council*, 2 F.C.C.R. 5043 (1987)
- Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo*, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
- National Broadcasting Co. v. United States*, 319 U.S. 190 (1943)
- Reno v. ACLU*, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)
- Telecommunications Research & Action Center v. FCC*, 801 F.2d 501 (D.C. Cir. 1986) (Bork, J.)
- Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC*, 512 U.S. 622 (1994)
- Turner Broadcasting System, Inc. v. FCC*, 520 U.S. 180 (1997)
- United States v. Playboy Entertainment Group, Inc.*, 529 U.S. 803 (2000)
- See also Miami Herald Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974); Turner Broadcasting Sys. Inc. v. FCC (Turner I), 512 U.S. 622 (1994); 520 U.S. 180 (1997) (Turner II)

RED SCARE OF THE EARLY 1920s

The signing of an armistice in November of 1918 marked the official end of the “Great World War” and might have promised a new era of peace and global stability. For Americans the years of 1919 and 1920 were in fact years of turmoil, fear, and hysteria. The context of this first red scare was one of economic dislocation (the impact of war and demobilization), high levels of immigration, rising union membership, nationwide strikes, and the ripple effects of the Russian Revolution of 1917.

Fear of a spreading communist revolutionary movement was exacerbated by the growing presence of immigrants from Southern and Eastern Europe and Russia. Over thirteen million immigrants arrived in the United States between 1901 and 1920, and among them were small numbers of anarchists, socialists, and revolutionaries. Immigrants, labor organizers, and political activists played a part in the significant opposition that arose to the decision of President Wilson to join the war in 1917. Likewise, they were among those who opposed the wartime draft. They soon became the target of official reprisal. Federal legislation was devised to secure a minimum of opposition to the draft and the war; the Immigration Act (1917), the Espionage Act (1917), and the Sedition Act (1918) were some noteworthy examples. Many states followed suit. Meanwhile, labor unrest reached new peaks—in 1919 alone there were 3,600 strikes involving over four million workers. The public was primed by government-supported propaganda to expect violent uprisings at any time.

Promoting Americanism by Prosecution

The implementation of federal law fell to Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer, a former vice chair of the Democratic National Committee. Prior to May 1919, Palmer’s views on civil liberties attracted little attention. Then in late April, a bombing campaign was launched by radicals against prominent officials and businessmen. Among the targets (most of whom were unscathed) were Supreme Court Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., John D. Rockefeller, and J.P. Morgan. Another target was the attorney general himself; the bomber who approached his house tripped on a step, killing himself in the explosion that followed. At a time when the government was already promoting true “Americanism” and antiradical propaganda, the bomb attacks struck a raw nerve. Subsequent antiradical rioting in major cities heightened the stakes for government, and generated more public fear.

The policies of the attorney general now turned draconian. He created the General Intelligence Division (the forerunner of the Federal Bureau of Investigation) and chose a young bureaucrat,

J. Edgar Hoover, to run it. Thus began a systematic government investigation of the politics and behavior of thousands of dissidents, dissenters, communists, radicals, labor organizers, socialists, aliens, and anyone else who might be labeled “un-American.” Then came the arrest campaigns: the first was an eighteen-city event involving few warrants and the invasion of hundreds of homes and businesses. In 1920, the second “Palmer raid” took place; by Patrick Renshaw’s account, there were 10,000 arrests in seventy cities. Palmer arranged for a very public deportation of some aliens caught in his dragnet, but the number of deportees, 250, suggested his raids had overreached. Prosecutions from this period frequently focused on political beliefs (for example, speeches, magazines, leaflets), not on criminal or violent activities. The legal philosophy adopted by Palmer was that emergencies created power in the executive branch, power to which the Bill of Rights had to bend.

The Supreme Court Responds

The red scare was the context of the federal courts’ seminal engagement with one of the central meanings of the free speech guarantee. The problem for the courts was how to reconcile the First Amendment’s guarantee of free speech with government prosecution of dissent, revolutionary speech, opposition to war, and opposition to the draft. In March 1919, the Supreme Court decided the landmark case of Schenck v. United States. The petitioner had distributed leaflets encouraging opposition to the draft during wartime. Justice Holmes rejected his free speech claim, pointing out that the “most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic.” He determined that speech would lose First Amendment protection when words were used “in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent.” One week later, relying on the same reasoning, Holmes upheld the conviction of the leader of the Socialist Party, Eugene Debs. The Debs conviction was based on a political speech in which he had expressed admiration for draft resisters; his conviction led to a ten-year prison sentence. The influence of Holmes on the course of First Amendment doctrine cannot be underestimated. While he nominally relied on the clear and present danger test in later cases, he found himself dissenting more often. His skepticism about government’s latitude in radical speech cases was evident as early as November 1919 when he dissented in Abrams v. United States.

In a ten-year period beginning in 1919, the Supreme Court decided again and again in favor of the government’s power to punish radical speech—Schenck, Debs (Debs v. United States [1919]), Frohwerk (Frohwerk v. United States [1919]), Abrams, Pierce (Pierce v. United States [1920]), Schaefer (Schaefer v. United States [1920]), Gilbert (Gilbert v. State of Minnesota [1920]), and Gitlow (Gitlow v. New York [1925]) were all punished for expression. Nevertheless, while protection for opponents of government policy was more theoretical than real, the seeds for a new more liberal First Amendment jurisprudence were being sown. It was Justice Holmes who developed the analogy of “free trade in ideas,” as a rationale for minimal government interference in political debate. Holmes, joined by Justice Brandeis, wrote the dissents in Abrams and Gitlow v. New York that had a profound impact later in the twentieth century. One of the few federal judges to rule in favor of dissenters in this period was District Court Judge Learned Hand (see Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten [1917]). The hysteria of the red scare was also the major catalyst in an ongoing conversation on the jurisprudence of free speech among constitutional experts Holmes, Hand, Zechariah Chafee, Ernst Freund, and Harold Laski.

For all the strikes, riots, arrests, and prosecutions that marked the red scare, little was found to suggest a real threat of violent government overthrow. Many of those sentenced in the early phase (for example, Debs) were released by presidential pardons in 1922–1923. Prominent law professors such as Roscoe Pound, Felix Frankfurter, and Zechariah Chafee spoke out against the Palmer raids as early as the fall of 1920. Palmer himself, hoping to use his anti-red crusade as a stepping stone to the White House, lost the Democratic Party’s nomination battle in 1920.

In the words of the historian Robert K. Murray, “[F]ew occurrences in modern American history ... have involved so much exaggeration and fear.” There can be little doubt that the influence of the red scare in the twentieth century could be seen, as Murray puts it, in the “continued insistence upon ideological conformity, suspicion of organized labor, public intolerance toward aliens, and a hatred for Soviet Russia.” The ability of the government to manipulate fear and rile the public into support for reactionary policies remains a key concern for advocates of civil liberties. The story of the red scare is a cautionary one; despite the guarantees of the Bill of Rights and despite the independence of the federal judiciary, the choice to openly voice opposition to government was a choice laden with danger.

JEROME D. O'CALLAGHAN

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Frederick Lewis. Only Yesterday: An Informal History of the Nineteen-Twenties. New York: Harper & Row, 1957.
- Asinof, Eliot. 1919: America's Loss of Innocence. New York: D.I. Fine, 1990.
- Coben, Stanley. A. Mitchell Palmer: Politician. New York: Columbia University Press, 1963.
- Murphy, Paul L. World War I and the Origin of Civil Liberties in the United States. New York: Norton, 1979.
- Murray, Robert K. Red Scare: A Study in National Hysteria, 1919–1920. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1955.
- Neuborne, Burt. The Role of Courts in Time of War. New York University School of Law Review of Law and Social Change 29 (2005): 555–72.
- Polenberg, Richard. Fighting Faiths: The Abrams Case, the Supreme Court, and Free Speech. New York: Viking, 1987.
- Renshaw, Patrick. The Longman Companion to America in the Era of the Two World Wars, 1910–1945. London; New York: Longman, 1996.
- Stone, Geoffrey R., The Origins of the "Bad Tendency" Test: Free Speech in Wartime, Supreme Court Review (2002): 411–53.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
- Debs v. United States*, 249 U.S. 211 (1919)
- Espionage Act of June 15, 1917, c. 30, 40 Stat. 217
- Frohwerk v. United States*, 249 U.S. 204 (1919)
- Gilbert v. State of Minnesota*, 254 U.S. 325 (1920)
- Gitlow v. New York*, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
- Immigration Act of February 5, 1917, 39 Stat. 874
- Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten*, 244 F.535 (S.D.N.Y. 1917)
- Pierce v. United States*, 252 U.S. 239 (1920)
- Schaefer v. United States*, 251 U.S. 466 (1920)
- Schenck v. United States*, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
- Sedition Act of May 16, 1918, Chapter 75, 40 Stat. 553

See also Abrams v. United States, 250 U.S. 616 (1919); Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Statutes; Bad Tendency Test; Bill of Rights: Structure; Brandeis, Louis Dembitz; Chafee, Zechariah, Jr.; Clear and Present Danger Test; Communist Party; Debs, Eugene V.; Debs v. United States, 249 U.S. 211 (1919); Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties; Frankfurter, Felix; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925); Hand, (Billings) Learned; Holmes, Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Hoover, J. Edgar; Ku Klux Klan; Masses Publishing Co. v. Patten, 244 U.S. 535 (1917); Palmer, A. Mitchell; Sacco and Vanzetti; Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919); Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927); Wilson, Woodrow; World War I, Civil Liberties in

REDRUP v. NEW YORK, 386 U.S. 767 (1967)

Redrup consolidated three obscenity cases from New York, Kentucky, and Arkansas; the first two cases involved appeals of criminal convictions for selling allegedly obscene material while the third appealed a civil action enjoining the distribution of various magazines and their destruction. In a per curiam opinion, the Court reversed the three lower courts' decisions; Harlan's dissent was joined by Clark.

The Court granted certiorari and review because it presumed the material in question was "obscene in the constitutional sense," but ultimately concluded that the assumption was invalid. It then decided the cases on a common basis, declaring the distribution of the publications in the cases was protected from governmental suppression, whether criminal or civil, in personam or in rem.

The Court noted that the cases did not involve juveniles; the sale or distribution of material sufficiently obtrusive that unwilling individuals could not avoid exposure to it; and there was no suggestion of "pandering," which the Court considered significant in Ginzburg v. United States (1966). This itemization of what the cases did not involve led many observers to consider Redrup, despite being a per curiam decision, as important in sorting out the Court's previous obscenity decisions; sexually explicit material or its sale featuring one or more of these facts was unlikely to be protected under the First Amendment.

For the justices, Redrup provided grounds for the summary disposition of a stockpile of cases during the 1966 term and other cases later on (for example, Cain v. Kentucky [1970] or Hoyt v. Minnesota [1970]). As to whether Redrup extricated the Court from the controversies its decisions created is another matter, as the Redrup opinion explicitly revealed the different, conflicting views among the justices regarding whether and how to apply the Roth standard; these divisions would reappear in subsequent cases.

The justices who voted to reverse the lower court in Redrup focused originally on the scienter requirement that the government prove Redrup knew the books he sold were obscene. Fortas, convinced that the obscenity exception to the First Amendment should be limited only to instances of pandering, was assigned to prepare the Court's per curiam opinion and accordingly wrote a draft on this basis. Brennan circulated a memorandum supporting Fortas's approach but upon different scienter grounds. Stewart distributed a memorandum arguing that the books were not obscene. In the end, because the justices could not agree on a common constitutional definition of scienter, the majority, except for the two dissenters, coalesced around Stewart's position and, using a per curiam opinion, reversed the lower courts because the books Redrup sold were not obscene. Harlan, who had prepared a long dissent that attacked the majority's scienter rationale, instead issued a brief one criticizing the majority's handling of Redrup and the other cases.

In Miller v. California (1973), a major transition in the Court's obscenity jurisprudence, Chief Justice Burger appended a footnote to his ruling that attacked the use of per curiams based on Redrup. "Thirty-one cases have been decided in this manner," he complains, but "no justification has ever been offered in support of the Redrup 'policy.' ... The Redrup procedure has cast us in the role of an unreviewable board of censorship for the 50 States, subjectively judging each piece of material brought before us." In Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton (1973), the companion decision to Miller and released on the same day, Brennan, in dissent, lamented that, although justices could support Roth in the abstract, they differed in specific cases and thus resorted to the Redrup approach, which resolves cases as between the parties, but offers only the most obscure guidance to legislation, adjudication by other courts, and primary conduct. By disposing of cases through summary reversal or denial of certiorari, we have deliberately and effectively obscured the rationale underlying the decisions. It comes as no surprise that judicial attempts to follow our lead conscientiously have often ended in hopeless confusion.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- O'Brien, David M., Justice John Marshall Harlan's Unpublished Opinions: Reflections of a Supreme Court at Work, Journal of Supreme Court History (1991): 27-49.
Teeter, Dwight L., and Don R. Pember, The Retreat from Obscenity: Redrup v. New York, Hastings Law Journal 21 (1969): 175.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Cain v. Kentucky*, 397 U.S. 319 (1970)
Ginzburg v. United States 383 U.S. 463 (1966)
Hoyt v. Minnesota, 399 U.S. 524 (1970)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1972)
Paris Adult Theatre I v. Slaton, 413 U.S. 49 (1972)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

REFUSAL OF MEDICAL TREATMENT AND RELIGIOUS BELIEFS

Under the free exercise clause, individuals may refuse medical attention, even that which is necessary to save their lives, as an incident to their religious convictions. As with other religious freedoms, the government may limit this freedom under a strict scrutiny standard, requiring a compelling government interest. In cases where there is no compelling government interest, such as with adults of sound mind, the government should not order unwanted medical procedures. On the other hand, courts have considered the state's obligation to the health and safety of minor children as a compelling interest. When it is determined that a compelling state interest exists, the religious beliefs are not recognized, and the medical treatment is ordered.

Arguments against court-ordered medical procedures rooted in the free exercise clause regularly fail under the states' right to protect public safety and health. In Reynolds v. United States (1878), the U.S. Supreme Court enunciated the supremacy of public health laws over religious practices. The Court held that although laws "cannot interfere with mere religious beliefs and opinions, they may with practices."

Another argument against court-ordered medical procedures, particularly in the case of minors, is based on fundamental parental rights. The U.S. Supreme Court in Wisconsin v. Yoder (1972) recognized the wide latitude afforded to parents in determining their children's education. The Court in Prince v. Massachusetts (1944), however, stated that, "[T]he family itself is not beyond regulation of public interest." The doctrine of parens patriae (recognizing the government's interest in a child's welfare) provides a basis for overriding religious objections in court-ordered medical procedures. The extent of treatment that may be ordered, however, is subject to the compelling government interest test.

In the most common cases, the life interest of a child is paramount to the religious interest of the child's parents. While this satisfies the requirement for minor children faced with life-threatening conditions or illnesses, a different test must be used for non-life-threatening diseases. The state power to protect the health and safety of its population, including minors, provides a state interest, but the extent to which that interest meets the compelling interest requirement is not necessarily a settled issue.

Life-threatening conditions are virtually always subject to court intervention. Generally, those interventions are possible only through a finding of neglect on the part of the parents, followed by a court ordered procedure while the child is a ward of the state. Inconsistencies exist, however, when courts determine the extent to which nonemergency medical treatment may be ordered. Courts are often reluctant in such situations to order risky, invasive, and life-threatening treatment. Even as it relates to blood transfusions, which are regularly ordered even when the situation is not life threatening, some courts have refused to order blood transfusions where death was not highly probable.

The current trend among courts, however, is to intervene in situations where treatment is certainly advisable. For example, the Minnesota Supreme Court even upheld an ordered enrollment of a minor in a speech therapy program. The trend of ordering treatment appears to be limited to situations where there is no serious medical disagreement about either the necessity of treatment or the preferred course of therapy. This trend does not apply to complex medical situations and unconventional treatments.

Courts must also balance the religious rights of the minor. In cases where a minor is mature enough to make medical decisions based on his or her religious faith, courts are often willing to allow refusal of treatment when the court would have rejected parental objections. For example, in a case involving a seventeen-year-old Jehovah's Witness who refused blood transfusions with parental support, the court recognized the distinctiveness of the case because it involved a mature minor, not a younger child. On the whole, however, courts retain more discretion to order medical treatment in cases involving older minors than in cases involving adults.

MICHAEL KOBY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 208 (1972)

REGENTS OF UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA v. BAKKE, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)

Background

Beginning in the 1960s, states and the federal government began to adopt "affirmative action" programs. These programs, typically justified as a means to counteract the lingering effects of pervasive racial discrimination, offered preferential treatment in education and employment to racial minorities. Opponents of the programs attacked them as "reverse discrimination," and charged that they violated the principles of equal protection. In 1978, the Supreme Court decided its first major affirmative action case, Regents of the University of California v. Bakke.

Bakke's analysis greatly influenced the development of affirmative action jurisprudence and still controls admissions policy in higher education.

The U.C. Davis Medical School adopted a special admissions program designed to increase the representation of "disadvantaged" students. The special admissions program was open to "Blacks," "Chicanos," "Asians," and "American Indians." Members of these groups could qualify for the program if the chairman of the special admissions committee found that their applications demonstrated "economic or educational deprivation." By faculty vote, sixteen spaces in an entering class of 100 were allocated to students admitted through the special program.

Alan Bakke, a white male, applied for admission to Davis in 1973 and 1974. In each year, his application was considered under the general admissions program and was rejected. Bakke sued in California state court, arguing that the special admissions program violated the state and federal constitutions and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The Supreme Court of California ultimately resolved the case only on federal constitutional grounds, ruling that the special admissions program violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. It enjoined Davis from considering race in its application process and ordered Bakke's admission.

The Supreme Court Decision

The U.S. Supreme Court produced a strikingly fractured opinion. Justice John Paul Stevens, joined by Chief Justice Warren Burger and Justices Potter Stewart and William H. Rehnquist, would have affirmed the order to admit Bakke on the grounds that the special admissions program violated Title VI, without reaching the constitutional issue. Justices William Brennan, Byron White, Thurgood Marshall, and Harry Blackmun would have reversed both parts of the California Supreme Court's order. In their view, strict scrutiny was appropriate for racial classifications that stigmatized or injured politically weak groups: such classifications should survive only if narrowly tailored to serve a compelling state interest. However, they argued that benign discrimination, like the special admissions program, should be permitted if it substantially furthered an important state interest, the same "intermediate" level of scrutiny applied to sex-based discrimination. They believed that Davis's interest in "remedying the effects of past societal discrimination" was sufficiently important to justify the special admissions program.

Justice Lewis F. Powell, writing in large part only for himself, rejected the idea that the level of scrutiny under the equal protection clause should turn on factors such as stigma, political power, or a history of discrimination. He asserted that all racial classifications should receive strict scrutiny. "It is far too late to argue that the guarantee of equal protection to all persons permits the recognition of special wards entitled to a degree of protection greater than that accorded others." He thus asked whether Davis could demonstrate a compelling state interest, and he did not believe that overcoming the effects of societal discrimination qualified. Instead, Powell found that a medical school had a compelling interest, rooted in academic freedom, in promoting diversity to "enrich the training of its student body and better equip its graduates to render with understanding their vital service to humanity." This was not, however, "an interest in simple ethnic diversity," but rather "a far broader array of qualifications and characteristics of which racial or ethnic origin is but a single though important element." Davis's special admissions program, he found, was not necessary to this goal and indeed "would hinder rather than further attainment of genuine diversity." As an alternative model, Powell recommended the Harvard College program, which "considers race only as one factor" among many.

Powell's split votes led the Court to reverse the injunction against the use of race in the admissions process but affirm the order admitting Bakke.

Bakke's Legacy

Despite the lack of a clear majority opinion, Bakke's impact on equal protection jurisprudence has been immense. Justice Powell's argument that "[t]he guarantee of equal protection cannot mean one thing when applied to one individual and something else when applied to a person of another color" provided the rationale adopted by the Supreme Court in City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co. (1989) and Adarand v. Peña (1995), holding that all racial classifications should receive strict scrutiny.

In the specific context of higher education, Bakke's effect was understandably even more profound. Many, if not most, race-conscious admissions programs, like that of Davis, had been adopted out of a desire to promote equality or remedy societal discrimination. Powell's rejection of this "amorphous concept" as insufficient to constitute a compelling interest forced admissions committees to justify their programs on grounds of diversity, regardless of the actual motive. The merits and nature of diversity became a central issue in the political debate over affirmative action, and the key concept in designing both admissions programs and litigation strategies. Commentators suggested that Bakke had produced pervasive subterfuge and prevented a frank discussion of the costs and benefits of affirmative action.

When the Supreme Court revisited the issue, in Gratz v. Bollinger (2003) and Grutter v. Bollinger (2003), it endorsed Justice Powell's analysis of diversity. The Court struck down the University of Michigan's undergraduate admissions system, but it upheld the Law School's program, reaffirming that race-conscious admissions programs are constitutionally permissible as long as they offer applicants individualized consideration and weigh race as one factor among many. The prohibition of "mechanical" quantitative systems prevents race from being an overt deciding factor in any individual case, although presumably it will be decisive in some. Because individualized assessment is more expensive and time consuming, the Gratz-Grutter rule also raises the cost of affirmative action programs for schools. Like Bakke itself, the Court's current position on affirmative action is less a stable compromise than the temporary stalemate of starkly opposed forces. Time will tell how long it endures.

KERMIT ROOSEVELT III

References and Further Reading

- Calabresi, Guido, Bakke as Pseudo-Tragedy, Catholic University Law Review 28 (1979): 427.
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944).
- Sedler, Robert A., Affirmative Action, Race, and the Constitution: From Bakke to Grutter, Kentucky Law Journal. 92 (2003): 219.
- Symposium on Affirmative Action*, University of California-Los Angeles Law Review 43 (1996): 1745.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adarand v. Peña*, 515 U.S. 200 (1995)
- City of Richmond v. J.A. Croson Co.*, 488 U.S. 469 (1989)
- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 244 (2003)
- Grutter v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)

See also Academic Freedom; Affirmative Action; Compelling State Interest; Invidious Discrimination

REGINA v. HICKLIN, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)

In the early nineteenth century, the Society for the Suppression of Vice in Great Britain mobilized to control pornography and to promote morality through vigorous enforcement of existing laws and adoption of new ones. In 1857, Parliament enacted the Obscene Publications Act, commonly referred to as “Lord Campbell’s Act” after John Campbell, the Chief Justice of the Queen’s Bench, who as a member of the House of Lords had introduced the bill. Before the law’s passage, Britain had relied on local courts and the common law offense of “obscene libel” to regulate indecent or immoral material. The new statute brought Parliament into the regulation of pornography and centralized public authority over the control of “obscene books, pictures, prints, and other articles.” In particular, the law empowered local magistrates to confiscate and destroy material deemed to be obscene. Simple possession was sufficient for prosecution under the law in addition to selling or making it available to others, but as Lord Campbell assured Parliament only material “corrupting the morals of youth and of a nature calculated to shock the common feelings of decency in a well regulated mind” would fall under the law’s ambit.

Regina v. Hicklin’s significance rests in the definition or test of what constitutes “obscene” material by the Queen’s Court. The case involved a salacious anti-Catholic pamphlet and the trial had as much to do with quelling political unrest as protecting the morals of British citizens. The tract, “The Confessional Unmasked: Shewing the Depravity of the Romanish Priesthood, the Iniquity of the Confessional and the Questions Put to Females in Confession,” purported to expose what Catholic priests talked about with young women during their confessions. The tract was part of a wider campaign led by a militant Protestant, William Murphy, who stoked the anti-Catholic sentiments of the working and lower-middle classes that erupted in Irish-Protestant riots during 1867–1869. A local magistrate ordered the seizure of the pamphlets; the order was appealed to Benjamin Hicklin, a Recorder’s Court judge, who reversed the decision and suspended the order. Hicklin did not disagree that the tract was licentious; however, he declined to suppress the pamphlet, despite its indecency, because of the tract’s political purposes.

Three Queen’s Bench judges affirmed the magistrate’s decision. Alexander Cockburn, who succeeded Lord Campbell as chief justice of the Queen’s Bench, speaking for the court announced what became known as the Hicklin rule. In Cockburn’s formulation, “The test of obscenity is whether the tendency of the matter charged as obscenity is to deprave and corrupt those whose minds are open to such immoral influences and into whose hands a publication of this sort may fall.” The implications of the decision, because the pamphlet’s “obscene” aspects were subsumed by its larger political purposes, were that material could be declared obscene if isolated parts rather than the publication taken as a whole contained immoral or indecent material. The ruling further meant that the test depended on the impact the material would have on the most susceptible audience, not the average reader. The Hicklin test entered American legal doctrine in the Court of Appeals case, United States v. Bennett (1879), and its place was consolidated by the Supreme Court in Rosen v. United States (1896).

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Kendrick, Walter. The Secret Museum: Pornography in Modern Culture. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1996.
- Marcus, Steven. The Other Victorians: A Study of Sexuality and Pornography in Mid-Nineteenth Century England. New York: Basic Books, 1966.
- Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.
- Robertson, Geoffrey. Obscenity: An Account of Censorship Laws and Their Enforcement in England and Wales. London: Weidenfeld and Nicolson, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Regina v. Benjamin Hicklin*, Law Reporter 3 Queen’s Bench 360 (1868).
- Rosen v. United States*, 161 U.S. 29 (1896).
- United States v. Bennett*, 24 F.Cas. 1093 (1879).

REHNQUIST COURT (1986–2005)

Yet to go beyond the language of the Constitution, and the meaning that may be fairly ascribed to the language, and into the consciences of individual judges, is to embark on a journey that is treacherous indeed.—William H. Rehnquist (October 1, 1924–September 3, 2005)

The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is

With his passing at the age of eighty from thyroid cancer and after thirty-three years on the U.S. Supreme Court, with nineteen of them as the sixteenth chief justice, William Hobbs Rehnquist left a conservative mark on the Court, just as Chief Justice Earl Warren shaped a liberal Court in the 1960s. Rehnquist served as a law clerk to Supreme Court Justice Robert H. Jackson, practiced law in Phoenix, and was active in local politics, which led to a friendship with and speech writing for Senator Barry Goldwater. After a stint in the Justice Department's Office of Legal Counsel, Rehnquist was nominated to the U.S. Supreme Court at the age of forty-seven by President Richard M. Nixon and confirmed by the U.S. in a sixty-eight to twenty-six vote in 1972 to a seat vacated by Justice John Marshall Harlan. Rehnquist was elevated to chief judge in 1986 by President Ronald Reagan and confirmed by a Democratic-controlled Senate to become the third-longest serving chief justice, with a record of working with sixteen other justices during his tenure on the high court.

Like the stylistic touch of adding gold stripes to the sleeves of his black robe in 1995 after being inspired by the robes worn by the Lord Chancellor in a production of the Gilbert and Sullivan operetta Iolanthe, Justice Rehnquist's position on many fronts and dissents earned him the nickname "Lone Ranger." Justice Rehnquist at one time stood alone against the rest of the Supreme Court in trying to curb the direction that individual rights took over societal interests, and after nearly two decades as its chief, he transitioned the Court's direction on individual rights by not recognizing any new suspect classifications that would otherwise call for an intermediate or strict scrutiny review. It can also be noted that the Court under Chief Justice Rehnquist did not create any serious expansions of individual protections beyond those established by the Burger and Warren Courts of the 1960s up through the mid-1980s.

Judge Rehnquist dissented when the Court struck down all state death penalty laws in 1972, when the right to abortion was considered a constitutional guarantee of personal liberty in the 1973 decision of Roe v. Wade, in 1992 in Planned Parenthood v. Casey, and in Stenberg v. Carhart (2000), a five-justice majority with O'Connor striking down a Nebraska state law banning what critics called "partial birth" abortions.

Decisions in the Rehnquist era have also rejected nearly every affirmative action plan in whole or in part involving education scholarships, voting districts, public contracts, and even law school admission programs. The Rehnquist Court was also not as aggressive as the Warren or Burger Courts in affirmative action as a vehicle that has been viewed as remedying past discrimination.

Justice Rehnquist, a longtime critic of the Court's ruling in 1966 that requires police to give crime suspects "Miranda warnings" of the right to remain silent, came to accept such warnings as "a part of our national culture" in Dickerson v. United States (2000) by finding that Congress could not legislatively reverse the Court's long-held decision of Miranda v. Arizona (1966) and supported the continuance of the now well-known Miranda rights.

In the twilight of his leadership, Rehnquist himself was still on the dissenting side in several major rulings, including those favoring gay rights in 2003 and congressional limits on campaign contributions in 2004. In the 2005 term, he dissented in a ruling that said federal antidrug laws trumped state laws that allow "medical marijuana," and another that allows governments to use their eminent domain powers to seize property for private economic development. He also opposed the Court's ban on capital punishment in 1972 and was with the majority when the Court reinstated it four years later.

When William H. Rehnquist joined the U.S. Supreme Court, less conservative justices outnumbered him. But as President Ronald Reagan made appointments—Sandra Day O'Connor in 1981, Antonin Scalia in 1986, and Anthony Kennedy in 1988—the views of the Court's majority quickly merged with those of Rehnquist. During the final years of the twentieth century, Rehnquist, Scalia, and Clarence Thomas, an appointee of the President George H.W. Bush in 1991, have made up the core of the court's conservative wing, often joined by O'Connor and Kennedy. Those five justices were in the majority in one of the Court's biggest decisions, and that may very well be the case most representative of the Rehnquist era, a five-to-four ruling in Bush v. Gore (2000) in which the Court stopped the recounts of presidential ballots in Florida and handed Republican George W. Bush the White House. For a Court that normally focused on ensuring states' rights, the decision was a dramatic statement of federal power. It also raised questions about whether the decision was a reflection of partisan politics as much as it was law. Rehnquist was clearly uncomfortable with the Court's role in the election dispute—and perhaps by how his Court's legacy would be marked by it. He said in his year-end report on January 1, 2001, that he hoped the Court would never be in such a position again.

Just as the Warren Court worked to define and give new direction to the protections of what was viewed as the fundamental rights of the individual, the Rehnquist-era Court has done so as well in a different direction with decisions that have shaped the country. Chief Justice Rehnquist articulated and guided the Supreme Court in a direction toward what some consider a narrower view of the "plain meaning" of the Constitution.

ROBERT DON GIFFORD

References and Further Reading

Chermerinsky, Erwin, Access to Justice. The Rehnquist Court and Justice: An Oxymoron? Washington University Journal of Law & Policy 1 (1999): 37.

- Dean, John W. The Rehnquist Choice: The Untold Story of the Nixon Appointment that Redefined the Supreme Court. New York: New York University Press, 2001.
- Friedelbaum, Stanley H. The Rehnquist Court: In Pursuit of Judicial Conservatism. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 1994.
- Lazarus, Edward. Closed Chambers: The Rise, Fall, and Future of the Modern Supreme Court. New York: Penguin Press, 1998.
- Rehnquist, William H. The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is. New York: Morrow, 1987.
- Starr, Kenneth W. First Among Equals. New York: Warner Books, 2002.
- Woodward, Bob, and Scott Armstrong. The Brethren: Inside the Supreme Court. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1979.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bush v. Gore*, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
- Dickerson v. United States*, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)

REHNQUIST, WILLIAM H. (1924–2005)

William Rehnquist grew up in a Republican suburb of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. After serving in the Army Air Corps during World War II, he attended Stanford University on the G.I. Bill, where he earned bachelor's and master's degrees in political science. After earning a second master's in government at Harvard University, he returned to Stanford for law school, where he graduated first in his class in December 1951. After graduation, he served for sixteen months as a clerk for Supreme Court Justice Robert Jackson. Afterward, he moved to Phoenix, Arizona, joined a local law firm, married and had three children, and became involved in Republican politics. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968, Rehnquist was one of a number of former Barry Goldwater supporters who traveled to Washington to assume positions in the Department of Justice. Rehnquist himself took charge of the Office of Legal Counsel, a prestigious but not very public position providing legal advice to the president.

He was the surprise nominee for the last Supreme Court vacancy during the Nixon administration in October 1971. In the years prior to his nomination, confirmation battles over Supreme Court appointments had become common and intense. Organized opposition quickly arose to the conservative Rehnquist's confirmation, and nearly two months after his nomination he was confirmed by a divided Senate.

On the Court, Rehnquist met the expectations of friends and foes alike, establishing a reputation for an excellent legal mind and iconoclastic conservative views. In the 1970s, he became known as the “Lone Ranger” for his frequent solo dissents. When Chief Justice Warren Burger decided to retire in 1986, officials in Ronald Reagan's administration had no doubt as to his preferred replacement. After another prolonged and bitter confirmation fight, the Republican-controlled Senate approved Rehnquist's elevation to chief justice. As chief justice, Rehnquist helped guide the Court in a generally more conservative direction.

In addition to his judicial opinions on the bench, Rehnquist also spoke and wrote frequently off the bench. He first came to public attention with a 1957 article in U.S. News and World Report decrying the influence of liberal law clerks on the work of the Supreme Court. While serving as associate justice, his speech criticizing the “notion of a living constitution” and calling for a more restrained judiciary gained particular notoriety. After being elevated to chief justice, he indulged his more scholarly and historical interests with books on the history of the Supreme Court, the disputed presidential election of 1876, historical impeachments, and civil liberties in times of war. The latter works proved surprisingly timely, as they were soon followed by the impeachment of President Bill Clinton (with the chief justice presiding over the subsequent trial in the Senate) and the launch of the war on terrorism, respectively. The book on the election of 1876 followed the election dispute of 2000.

From the moment he joined the Supreme Court, Rehnquist became perhaps the most prominent critic of the liberal jurisprudence of the Warren Court and early Burger Court. In his written opinions and public speeches, Rehnquist warned against judicial activism and policymaking. Rather than being the “voice and conscience of contemporary society,” Rehnquist urged judges to see their role as a more limited one of deciding cases in accord with the values “derived from the language and intent of the framers” of statutes and the Constitution. In a pluralistic society, people will necessarily differ on judgments of moral values and political principle. Such judgments have a “moral claim ... upon us as a society” only as they derive from their “having been enacted into positive law.” The exercise of judicial review based on value judgments that cannot fairly be derived from the Constitution “is genuinely corrosive of the fundamental values of our democratic society” and “an end run around popular government.” The only alternative for judges is the discipline of the legal text read in light of its original meaning. More substantively, Rehnquist argued, the Constitution is most notably a grant of power to government to resolve social problems through democratic deliberation. The central purpose of judicial review, in his view, is to uphold the balance established in the Constitution between government power and individual liberties. The Court “upholds the Constitution” just as much when it rules in favor of the government as when it rules in favor of individual liberties. In these arguments, Rehnquist echoed the Progressive critics of the Court of the early twentieth century, who similarly complained that judges were insufficiently deferential to legislative majorities, excessively prone to reading their own moral judgments into the law, and too willing to act as a “third legislative branch.”

Rehnquist staked out firm positions in a variety of areas of constitutional law. In addressing separation of powers and federalism, Rehnquist was guided by a distinct sense of the respective responsibilities of the different branches and levels of government. He was relatively protective of what he regarded as important to the president’s ability to carry out his duties. The chief justice wrote the opinion upholding the independent counsel statute, however, arguing that the independent counsel neither unduly interfered with the performance of the president’s constitutional duties nor signified the encroachment of another branch of government on the president’s prerogatives. From his service as a law clerk through his tenure as chief justice, Rehnquist insisted that the Court is the “ultimate expositor of the constitutional text.” Although he argued that the Court should exercise restraint when facing controversial social issues or innovative claims of new constitutional rights, he believed that the judiciary should act more aggressively in patrolling the boundaries of authority among the various branches of government and between the state and national governments. In particular, Rehnquist was a strong supporter of reviving judicial enforcement of constitutional limits on federal power vis-à-vis the states. He was briefly able to win the support of a majority of the justices for this view in the 1976 decision in National League of Cities v. Usery, which prevented the application of the federal Fair Labor Standards Act to state government employees. That decision was later overturned, but in the 1990s the chief justice found a stable five-person majority that imposed a variety of new constitutional restrictions on congressional power relative to the states.

The federalism decisions of the Rehnquist Court have particular implications for civil liberties, especially when combined with Rehnquist’s understanding of the substantive content of individual rights. As Rehnquist concluded in one such case, “Congress may not legislatively supersede our decisions interpreting and applying the Constitution” by, for example, altering judicially determined protections against coerced confessions for criminal defendants in state courts. Rehnquist led the Court in arguing that Congress is limited in its authority to allow private lawsuits against state and local governments in the federal courts or to create new rights for individuals against the state governments. The states, under this approach, are primarily constrained by the judiciary’s understanding of civil liberties, not by the federal legislature’s.

Rehnquist also took influential positions on a number of substantive civil liberties. He was generally skeptical of the expansion of civil liberties undertaken by the Court since the late 1950s, especially those that are not clearly found on the face of the constitutional text or in historical practice. He also urged his colleagues to adopt a strong presumption of constitutionality for the acts of government challenged in civil liberty cases so as to allow elected representatives to balance the competing concerns of individual rights and the public welfare.

Rehnquist was more successful in winning support for his views on civil liberties in some areas than in others. One area of relative success was criminal justice, where Rehnquist’s support for law enforcement was shared by Richard Nixon, Ronald Reagan, and their judicial appointees. Rather than “incorporating” the requirements of the Bill of Rights into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and applying them to the states, Rehnquist favored a more conservative approach to due process requirements that emphasized fundamental fairness. Such fairness to individual criminal defendants could be achieved by a variety of procedures, including some that the Court would not accept under the Bill of Rights if implemented by the federal government. To Rehnquist, the Court should accept a “healthy pluralism” in the states with minimal federal review. In keeping with this approach, Rehnquist helped expand the authority of police officers to search suspects for weapons and evidence and to carve out exceptions to the exclusionary rule, by which evidence unconstitutionally seized by the police is kept out of criminal trials. He likewise helped limit the application of the Miranda rule and its protections against self-incrimination. He favored a streamlined appellate process in death penalty cases, and accepted both the death penalty and long sentences for “career criminals” as consistent with the constitutional ban on cruel and unusual punishment.

Rehnquist also found allies for his accommodationist view of church and state issues. He strongly argued against the “wall of separation between church and state” that guided the Court from the late 1940s as unworkable in practice and based on bad history. The establishment clause of the First Amendment is better understood, according to Rehnquist, as prohibiting governmental preferences among religious sects or the establishment of a single national religion but allowing the government to pursue “legitimate secular ends through nondiscriminatory sectarian means.” This would allow, for example, religious schools to participate in student voucher programs. Rehnquist would also have allowed governments to express a generalized preference for religion over non-religion, but this was firmly rejected by Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, among others. In relation to the free exercise clause, Rehnquist argued that the government should not be required to grant exemptions from generally applicable laws that happen to burden religious beliefs, although the state may voluntarily grant such exemptions. This position was later adopted by the Court.

Rehnquist read the free speech and press clauses of the First Amendment narrowly. He was willing to balance the public interest in social order against various forms of expressive conduct, such as flag burning or nude dancing, although he also wrote the opinion protecting a scandalous political parody in Hustler magazine. When the government acts in something other than its capacity as a legislator—for example, when operating a school, library, prison, or army—he was willing to give it a freer hand to regulate speech. Rehnquist was willing to give the government substantial discretion in passing commercial regulations that affect speech. He wrote the opinion for the Court allowing states to require private shopping malls to open their doors to petition signature collectors, for example. He was sharply opposed to the initial extension of First Amendment protection to “commercial speech,” arguing that the Constitution was concerned with “public decisionmaking as to political, social, and other public issues, rather than with the decision of a particular individual as to whether to purchase one or another kind of shampoo.” He also emphasized that corporations enjoy free speech protections only to the extent that they advance “the societal interest in receiving information and ideas.” Although Rehnquist recognized political speech as central to the First Amendment, leading him to object to campaign finance regulations that circumscribe donations to political parties; for example, he was still willing to accept various restrictions on how that speech is organized and exercised, such as government regulation of fundraising for political causes and door-to-door political canvassing.

In keeping with his general approach to constitutional interpretation and civil liberties, Rehnquist was particularly critical of the Court’s jurisprudence on “unenumerated rights” or “substantive due process.” To Rehnquist, such rights were the legacy of the Court’s economic liberty decisions in the early twentieth century, which were abandoned under political pressure during the New Deal. In his first judicial encounter with such a case, in Roe v. Wade (1973), which established a constitutional right to abortion, Rehnquist argued that all “unwanted state regulation of consensual transactions,” whether contracts for labor or medical services, were subject to a common standard of deferential judicial review to ensure only that the law in question was rationally related to a valid state objective. He continued to complain in such cases that, quoting Justice Byron White, the “Court is most vulnerable and comes nearest to illegitimacy when it deals with judge-made constitutional law having little or no cognizable roots in the language or design of the Constitution.” But he also came to accept the existence of some “fundamental rights and liberties” that require more searching judicial scrutiny under the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, although he held that these must be deeply rooted in “our Nation’s history, legal traditions, and practices,” such as the right to marry or to refuse unwanted medical treatment.

In interpreting the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, Rehnquist similarly urged his colleagues to avoid the temptation to engage in “endless tinkering with legislative judgments” simply because legislators could have drafted “a fairer or a better law.” To Rehnquist, the only “area of the law which the Framers [of the equal protection clause] obviously meant it to apply” was in the context of “classifications based on race or national origin, the first cousin of race.” Any governmental classification by race, notably including affirmative action programs, therefore faced strict judicial scrutiny and was presumptively invalid. He denounced efforts to move beyond this core area of equal protection concern as creating “out of thin air” doctrines that are “so diaphanous and elastic as to invite subjective judicial preferences or prejudices relating to particular types of legislation.” In particular, he dissented from the Supreme Court decisions of the mid-1970s extending heightened judicial scrutiny to governmental classification by gender, arguing that such doctrinal innovations were inconsistent with the history and purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment. By the mid-1990s, however, he had accepted this extension of the equal protection clause as well settled and wrote a concurring opinion in the case striking down the male-only admission policies of the Virginia Military Institute and the majority opinion allowing Congress to use the Fourteenth Amendment as a justification for applying federal family leave requirements to state governments.

From his initial appointment to the Supreme Court in 1971, Rehnquist was a powerful advocate of a more conservative constitutional philosophy. In conflicts between the individual and the government, he typically showed deference to the government. Wary of the possibility of judges imposing their own values on society, he urged the Court to read individual rights narrowly and uphold the decisions of democratic majorities. Rehnquist was willing for the Court to play a more active role in umpiring disputes between government institutions. In this context, he often favored protecting the discretion of state and local governments from national interference in order that they might respond to the preferences of their particular communities.

KEITH E. WHITTINGTON

References and Further Reading

- Bradley, Craig, ed. The Rehnquist Legacy. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Davis, Sue. Justice Rehnquist and the Constitution. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1989.
- Irons, Peter H. Brennan vs. Rehnquist: The Battle for the Constitution. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1994.
- Rehnquist, William H., The Notion of a Living Constitution, Texas Law Review 54 (1976): 693–706.
- , Government by Cliché, Missouri Law Review 45 (1980): 379–93.
- , The Supreme Court: How It Was, How It Is. New York: William Morrow and Company, 1987.
- , Grand Inquests: The Historic Impeachments of Justice Samuel Chase and President Andrew Johnson. New York: William Morrow and Company, 1992.
- , All the Laws But One: Civil Liberties in War Time. New York: Vintage Books, 2000.
- , Centennial Crisis: The Disputed Election of 1876. New York: Knopf, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- National League of Cities v. Usery*, 426 U.S. 833 (1976)

REID v. COVERT, 354 U.S. 1 (1957)

Clarice Covert, a civilian, killed her husband, a U.S. Air Force sergeant, at an English airbase. Covert was tried by a court-martial, convicted of murder, and sentenced to life imprisonment. Covert petitioned for a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the Constitution prohibited trial of civilians by court-martial or military tribunal. The District Court granted the petition and released Covert.

On direct appeal to the Supreme Court, the U.S. government contended that a treaty between the United States and Great Britain required, and that the Constitution permitted, U.S. courts-martial to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over crimes committed in Great Britain by members of the U.S. armed forces and their dependents.

The Court, while recognizing the government's power to create courts-martial to prosecute military defendants, nonetheless held, based on historical analysis of protections afforded to civilian criminal defendants under the English tradition of civil liberties, the drafting and ratification of the Constitution, and the plain text of that document, that civilian criminal defendants are under all circumstances entitled by the Fifth Amendment to the protection of indictment by a grand jury and by the Sixth Amendment right to trial by a civilian jury. Analyzing the history of state practice, relevant case law, and the framers' original intent, the Court concluded that a "deeply rooted and ancient opposition in this country to the extension of military control over civilians" mandated that Covert, although the spouse of an individual subject to military criminal jurisdiction, was a civilian not amenable to prosecution by court-martial.

In affirming Covert's release, the Reid Court elaborated the broader principle that all treaties and laws of the United States must comply with the provisions of the Constitution, strongly suggesting that the individual rights elaborated in that document are the supreme sources of law in our governmental framework.

WILLIAM C. BRADFORD

See also English Tradition of Civil Liberties; Grand Jury Indictment (V); Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Jury Trial Right; Military Tribunals; Rights of the Accused

REID v. GEORGIA, 448 U.S. 438 (1980)

Reid v. Georgia involved a question of search and seizures. Early one morning, the petitioner arrived at the Atlanta Airport for a commercial flight. While there, a federal narcotics agent from the Drug Enforcement Agency (DEA) noticed that the man occasionally looked back at a second man, both of whom was carrying a shoulder bag with no other luggage. The two men then proceeded to leave the terminal together when the agent approached the men and asked for identification. Both men consented to a search of their shoulder bags. However, Reid tried to run away before the search of his belongings began. While running, he abandoned his bag in one of the terminals. His bag was found to contain cocaine and he was later apprehended and charged with possession. The Georgia Court of Appeals reversed the ruling of a lower court and determined that stopping Reid was permissible under the law since he fit the profile of a drug smuggler according to the accounts of the federal agent.

The Supreme Court reversed the ruling of the Georgia Court of Appeals. According to the legal interpretation of reasonable suspicion, the Court held that the agent could not have reasonably suspected Reid of criminal activity based on the circumstances. The actions that the agent saw could be applicable to almost any traveler. The cocaine could not be introduced as evidence because the Court found that it was obtained in violation of the petitioner's Fourth and Fifth Amendment Rights.

CAROL WALKER

References and Further Reading

- Garcia, Alfredo. The Fifth Amendment: A Comprehensive Approach. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.
 LaFave, Wayne R. Search and Seizure: A Treatise on the Fourth Amendment. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004.
 Wilson, Bradford P. Enforcing the Fourth Amendment: A Jurisprudential History. New York: Garland Press, 1986.

See also Airport Searches; Probable Cause; Profiling (including DWB); Search (General Definition)

RELEASE TIME FROM PUBLIC SCHOOLS (FOR RELIGIOUS PURPOSES)

Relationships between religious institutions and public schools have taken many forms and presented various First Amendment issues over the years. One frequently arising issue is whether a public school violates the establishment clause or the free exercise clause when it releases students from school before the usual end of the school day to attend a religious education class.

Religious educators began a movement early in the twentieth century to expand their religious education programs by adding weekday classes. Proponents argued that public schools had included some aspect of religious education until late in the nineteenth century, but that was no longer the practice. Many clergy claimed that only a small proportion of school-age children were attending religious classes on Sundays. They said they could increase attendance at religious classes if they could offer weekday religious classes in the churches and synagogues. To encourage religious class attendance, they proposed that students who wanted to attend these classes be released early from their public school classes.

One such program started in White Plains, New York, in the early 1920s. Joseph Lewis, president of the Free Thinkers Society, challenged the program as violating the provision of the New York Constitution that prohibited the "use of property or money in aid of" religious schools. (Clarence Darrow wrote to Lewis in 1925, and offered to assist him in this case, as soon as he was finished with the Scopes Monkey Trial.) The New York Court of Appeals rejected Lewis's argument, since the program did not use public school buildings or public money. (This case, decided in 1927, predated the application of the First Amendment to states, at least for the religion clauses, which might explain why Lewis did not seek U.S. Supreme Court review of the New York decision.)

In 1940, clergy from several faiths persuaded the school board in Champaign, Illinois to allow them to conduct religious education classes in the public schools. If parents consented, their children would attend these classes, which were forty-five or sixty minutes once a week. Children who were released for the religious classes were required to attend them—absences were reported to the school administration and to the parents. Children who did not sign up for these classes went elsewhere in the building for other activities.

A challenge to the Illinois program reached the Supreme Court in 1948 in the case of McCollum v. Board of Education. The Court pointed out that they had recently decided, in Everson v. Board of Education (1947), that the religious clauses of the First Amendment applied to the states. Following Everson, the Court ruled that the combination of the use of public school buildings and compulsory school attendance machinery violated the establishment clause.

At about the same time the Illinois program began, the New York legislature considered a bill that would allow local school boards to adopt released time programs. The New York plan, however, provided that the classes were to be held in the religious institutions, not in the public schools. During the debate on this legislation, one proponent argued that this concept was not novel—similar programs were in effect in forty-one other states, and in many communities in New York State. Some opponents objected to the bill because they opposed any reduction in the time students spent in school. Some objected on constitutional grounds, arguing that the schools would be endorsing religion by participating in such a program.

Some religious leaders opposed the plan for what seemed to be competitive reasons—that their particular denominations did not have sufficient staff or facilities to offer weekday programs.

The McCollum decision prompted opponents of the New York program to go to court. In Zorach v. Clauson (1952), the Court distinguished the New York program from the Illinois program, primarily on the basis that the religious instruction took place in the religious institution, not in the public school. The Court also pointed out that schools neither encouraged students to participate nor penalized those who did not.

Zorach is the most recent Supreme Court case involving a released time program. There have been several lower court decisions in cases challenging released time programs. These have addressed such issues as whether religious program recruiters can come onto school grounds to publicize their programs (Doe v. Shenandoah County School Board [1990]), whether the public school can give credit toward graduation requirements for religious classes taken in the released time program (Lanner v. Winner [1981]), and how involved public school officials can get in recruiting students for released time classes (Smith v. Smith [1976]) or enforcing attendance (Lanner).

ELI C. BORTMAN

References and Further Reading

- Kurland, Philip, The Supreme Court, Compulsory Education, and the First Amendment's Religion Clauses, West Virginia Law Review 75 (1973): 213.
Note: The "Released Time" Cases Revisited: A Study of Group Decisionmaking by the Supreme Court, Yale Law Journal 83 (1974): 1202.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Doe v. Shenandoah County School Board*, 737 F. Supp. 913 (W.D. Va. 1990)
Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
Lanner v. Wimmer, 662 F.2d 1349 (10th Cir. 1981)
McCollum v. Board of Education, 333 U.S. 203 (1948)
Smith v. Smith, 523 F.2d 121 (4th Cir. 1975) cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1073 (1976)
Zorach v. Clauson, 343 U.S. 306 (1952)

RELIGION IN NINETEENTH-CENTURY PUBLIC EDUCATION (INCLUDES "BIBLE WARS")

The development of public schools in northern states in the first half of the nineteenth century offered well-intentioned reformers an opportunity to mold children into upstanding, morally responsible adults. As long as most of the children provided that education were Protestant, daily readings without comment from the King James Bible were accepted as a tool to teach both reading and lessons in morality. The influx of Roman Catholics to the United States disrupted this arrangement, and resulted in the "Bible wars."

The first of the Bible wars occurred in New York City in 1840. The Public School Society, a private organization established to teach the poor children of New York City, operated free common schools. Historians of the conflict estimate that over 10,000 Roman Catholic children of school age in New York City did not then attend school. Although some Catholic schools existed, they were not sufficient in number or size to teach all Catholic children. One reason that Catholic children did not attend the schools operated by the Public School Society was the manifestly bigoted views of Catholics and Roman Catholicism promoted by many of the textbooks. Another reason was the use of King James Bible to teach reading and moral instruction, which Catholics rejected in favor of the Douay Bible. In January 1840, New York Governor William Seward urged the creation of schools that attended to the needs of children "professing the same faith." The Public School Society responded to this political pressure by offering to black out those textbook passages offensive to Catholics. The Society refused to eliminate its use of King James Bible or to allow the Douay Bible to act as a substitute for Catholic pupils. Because the Society barred any commentary on or interpretation of passages read from the King James Bible, it claimed that the use of the King James Bible was nonsectarian. Although the prohibition of commentary on the King James readings may have resolved any theological disputes among various Protestant faiths, this was irrelevant to Catholics. Consequently, Catholics charged that the Society was sectarian, and requested money from the New York City Common Council to fund Catholic schools. After statewide elections, the New York legislature adopted a bill displacing the Public School Society and creating local districts controlling public education. However, the law forbade those districts from funding schools that engaged in sectarian religious education. Reading from the King James Bible was declared nonsectarian, for more than one Protestant faith desired its use in public schools. Catholic teachings were sectarian, and thus Catholic schools were excluded from the public school fund. Catholics then greatly expanded their school system in New York City. Subsequently, reading from the King James Bible was made mandatory in New York for any school funded by the public school fund.

The Bible war in New York was political only. In Philadelphia, the "war" led to violence. In 1843, the local Board of Controllers allowed students to read from a version of the Bible chosen by their parents. By March 1844, this action was declared an attempt to eliminate the use of the Bible in public institutions, including schools. Two months later, an anti-Catholic riot left a substantial number dead or wounded. In other parts of the United States during the remainder of the nineteenth century, the issue of the constitutionality of the use of the King James Bible in a public or common school was tested in courts. It was not until the 1850s that the first appellate case was heard concerning the use of the King James Bible in a public school. In Donahoe v. Richards (1854), Bridget Donahoe, a Roman Catholic, refused to read from the King James Bible. She was then expelled. She sued, claiming a constitutional right to be exempted from this duty. The Maine Supreme Judicial Court rejected Donahoe's claim of liberty of religious conscience. Any such right, concluded the court, would "undermine ... the power of the State," and force the will of the majority to bow to the conscience of the minority, contrary to democratic principles.

In the same year that Donahoe was decided, the Know-Nothing Party swept elections in Massachusetts. This nativist group intended to legislate in favor of native-born (and usually Protestant) Americans and against Catholics and immigrants. It largely bungled the job, although the party did manage to adopt legislation in 1855 requiring the reading of the Bible in the "common English version" (the King James version) in public schools. This legislation was tested five years later, when a teacher was charged with assaulting an eleven-year-old student who for religious reasons refused to read from the King James Bible. The lower court hearing the case held that requiring one to read the King James Bible did not interfere with the Roman Catholic student's constitutional right to religious liberty. Indeed, the court declared that any decision to grant the student's request to read from the Catholic Douay Bible would constitute an impermissible discrimination in favor of a particular religion contrary to the Massachusetts Constitution. Therefore, the teacher had a right to discipline the child, and the charges were dismissed. Although Massachusetts was the only state to require Bible reading in public schools by statute during the nineteenth century, use of the Bible in public schools was commonplace throughout the United States.

The remaining Bible reading cases arose in the last third of the nineteenth century. Of the half-dozen or so cases concerning the constitutionality of reading the King James Bible in the common school during the last half of the nineteenth century, only one declared that the practice unconstitutional. In State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board (1890), the Supreme Court of Wisconsin declared reading the King James Bible "without restriction" constituted sectarian instruction. The court noted that although much of the Bible was not sectarian, the King James Bible contained numerous sectarian passages, and distinguished the decisions in other states on the ground that the Wisconsin Constitution barred a direct prohibition of sectarian instruction.

The Blaine amendment of 1876, offered by Republican James G. Blaine, proposed banning any state from, among other things, appropriating funds to any school "wherein the particular creed or tenets of any religious or anti-religious sect ... shall be taught." The amendment also declared that "[t]his article shall not be construed to prohibit the reading of the Bible in any school or institution." Although the Blaine amendment was overwhelmingly adopted in the House of Representatives, it failed to meet the necessary two-thirds vote in the Senate, whose members voted the party line. Between 1875 and the early 1900s, the amendment was offered in Congress more than twenty times, although it never received more votes than it did in 1876. Although the Blaine amendment failed in Congress, thirty-three states adopted a version of the amendment in their constitutions between 1877 and 1933.

MICHAEL S. ARIENS

References and Further Reading

- Ariens, Michael S., and Robert A. Destro. Religious Liberty in a Pluralistic Society. 2nd ed. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2002.
- Billington, Ray Allen. The Protestant Crusade, 1800–1860. New York: Rinehart [1938], 1952.
- Cremin, Lawrence A. American Education: The National Experience, 1783–1876. New York: Harper and Row, 1980.
- Lannie, Vincent P. Public Money and Parochial Education: Bishop Hughes, Governor Seward, and the New York School Controversy. Cleveland, OH: Press of Case Western Reserve University, 1968.
- McAfee, Ward. Religion, Race and Reconstruction: The Public School in the Politics of the 1870s. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1998.
- Ravitch, Diane. The Great School Wars. New York: Basic Books, 1974.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Donahoe v. Richards*, 38 Me. 379 (1854)
- State ex rel. Weiss v. District Board*, 76 Wis. 177 (1890)

RELIGION IN “PUBLIC SQUARE” DEBATE

In the United States, as in any vibrant democracy, the government is profoundly impacted by the public square—that forum in which the people discuss, debate, and evaluate public activities with the idea of persuading their compatriots and influencing the state in the development, enactment, and enforcement of public policy. It is a forum, by definition, available to all, whether citizens or not, including those who represent them (such as the media or organized groups). The state also participates in the public square in its efforts to explain or justify its policies or activities.

The place of religion in the public square has generated great controversy. In essence, the debate centers on one fundamental question: In a religiously pluralistic country with a policy of separation between religion and the state, what place should religion have in a forum in which state action is debated, shaped, and, to some extent, implemented? That is to say, if we accept that the state should not adopt or implement religious positions or policies, to what extent should religious language, concepts, or beliefs be used to publicly justify, support or opposed government actions or policies? How do we distinguish between religious advocacy in the public square and state implementation (if that occurs)?

Most people assume that this question raises First Amendment concerns. Citing the popular Supreme Court dicta in Everson v. Board of Education (1947) that the First Amendment erects a “wall of separation” between church and state, they assume that the law prohibits religion being invoked by a participant in the public square. However, simply reading the provisions of the First Amendment reveals this to be an error. The First Amendment provides that “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion [the establishment clause] or prohibiting the free exercise thereof [the free exercise clause].” Under the Fourteenth Amendment, this prohibition has been extended to cover the states as well.

Thus, the amendment targets state action, as evidenced by the vast litigation over establishment and free exercise cases. This jurisprudence carefully segregates the state from the public square (a domain also protected by the free speech clause of the First Amendment) in two ways. First, it shields the public square from undue governmental influence. The government cannot publicly endorse one religion over another, religion over nonreligion, nor nonreligion over religion. The state cannot justify a law solely on religious ground, nor can it use a law to repress the free exercise rights of a religion. Finally, the government cannot favor or disfavor religion within an open public forum that it creates. Second, the courts have protected the viability of the state and the public domain by assuming a clear distinction between the two and adopting a presumption that state actions are motivated by secular reason (absent clear proof to the contrary). The state is thereby protected against having every justification for public policy offered in the public domain imputed to it, with an obligation to refute or deny those justifications that suggest some form of religious freedom violation. At the same time, religious participants in the public square are freed from the fear that religiously grounded advocacy for a public policy might prove counterproductive simply because the courts could use the religious nature of the advocacy to defeat the state’s adoption of the policy.

The legal question with respect to individuals (or religious groups) is similarly clear. The state cannot prohibit an individual or groups representing that individual from participating in the public square, supporting or opposing public actions based on religious grounds, or using religious arguments to advance those positions. This is true, even in the case where the individual is a government official, so long as that official is speaking on his or her own behalf.

To say that the state cannot preclude people of faith from advancing their religious beliefs within the process of public policy formation does not address the wisdom or morality of doing so. Indeed, many critics argue that the unique characteristics of traditional religion are so disruptive of the public polity as to justify a moral prohibition against the participation of religion in the public square. Their arguments can be summarized as follows.

Violence

First, many secularists argue that the purpose of church and state separation was to avoid the violence of religiously inspired conflict. They cite the historic religious wars and their current manifestations in areas such as Afghanistan, the Middle East, Bosnia, and Northern Ireland. In this country, they cite the violence surrounding abortion and the radical right to life movement.

Authoritarianism

One critic of a governmental bioethics panel’s interaction with religious representatives complained that the sole task of religion is “theological hermeneutics—the interpretation of sacred texts.... [Religion] abolish[s] the hard ethical questions” because the answers are to be found in the texts of revelation. This cuts religious believers off from the public square because they neither contribute meaningfully to public discussion of public policy issues (other than to cite their religious proof text), nor can they learn from the public discourse because it stands apart from their grounding belief.

Accessibility

Related to the issue of authority, many critics argue that religious arguments are not accessible to non-believers. That is to say, they do not provide information sufficient for the nonreligious person to evaluate and understand the arguments being made by the person of faith. Insofar as governmental action should rest on arguments that are acceptable and understandable by those subject to them, then a justification based on religious faith would not satisfy this requirement.

Religious Argument Prevents Public Discussion

A more serious version of the accessibility critique is that the use of religious argument precludes public discussion and prevents political consensus. Michael Perry adopts a version of this argument when he argues that people of faith should be prepared to offer secular reasons for their judgments without imposing a similar requirement on people of non-faith. He argues that because people of nonfaith do not believe, they cannot be expected to offer religious reasons for their positions.

Religion Is Not Shared

One of the rationales supporting the demand for secular justification is that it is assumed that secular reasoning is neutral—that it is shared by all members of society. Religion, on the other hand, is distinctly idiosyncratic, unique to each separate believer and/or his or her tradition. Clearly, arguing from vastly different grounding perspectives (for example, an argument between a radical marxist and a radical capitalist) is unlikely to result in agreement in that neither side shares enough common understanding with the other to provide a basis for agreement. More significantly, the process of democratic governance requires a sense of community. Individuals must make sacrifices (for example, paying taxes) for the benefit of the common good. Discourse that emphasizes difference and the lack of commonality interferes with this necessary sense of community.

Religion Is Divisive

Many people believe that religion is uniquely divisive. It evokes passions and emotion as well as reason and judgment. As acknowledged by Michael McConnell, “in the current political climate, many of the most heated political controversies involve a clash between largely religious forces of cultural traditionalism and largely secular forces of cultural deconstruction. It would be difficult to say which side in these conflicts was more strident, more intolerant, or more absolutist.”

Factionalism

The founders of the American Republic feared political factionalism as one of the great threats to stable government. A “zeal for different opinions concerning religion” was Madison’s first example in Federalist No. 10 of the causes of this type of factionalism. This argument is, essentially, the political extension of the decisiveness argument. Religion is not only a potential source of passionate conflict, but also a unifying force giving that conflict political power. It is not just that religion has the power to divide individuals, one against the other, but that it may lead to political conflict between religious groups.

Religious advocates challenge that each of the foregoing arguments can be individually rebutted as resting on one of two major misconceptions about religion. First, many of the arguments present an incomplete or distorted understanding of religion and religious belief. For example, the fact that a person of faith uses religious scripture as a starting point for their moral or political reflections does not necessarily mean they will be any less reasonable or rational than a person starting from any other comprehensive philosophy. Both could be unreasonable or irrational, but neither must be. Second, and related to the first, separatist critics draw unwarranted distinctions between the religious and the secular, in large part by assuming that the secular is religiously neutral. However, as noted by thinkers such as McConnell, the secular is not neutral—it is competitive with religion, reflecting a particular worldview of a particular group of people. Indeed, in many instances secular worldviews function in religion-like ways, including serving as ideological goads toward violence and conflict (for example, Stalin's purges, the Chinese Cultural Revolution, the killing fields of Cambodia).

Some critics, such as Robert Audi, respond that the problem is not any one individual critique of religion, but rather the multiplicity of arguments arising around religious (particularly theistic) belief. While some may agree, it remains unclear how this, in fact, distinguishes religion from any other powerful worldview.

A much more persuasive reading of the situation suggests that separationists and religious advocates approach the public square with radically differing understandings of the public square and the nature of public discourse. Specifically, advocates for a secular public square favor the use of abstract reason and logical argument, while appearing suspicious of—if not hostile to—passion. Religion, as the ultimate expression of emotional commitment, represents a powerful threat to this vision of dispassionate discourse. This has led separationists to attempt to repress religion by finding a single, common (that is, secular) belief system that all citizens can share that is free from deep emotional commitments to particularist communities.

Religious advocates reject this approach, believing that it is impossible to separate out their deepest beliefs and commitments from their approach to the public square. They appear to stand on strong historical footing. Passionate disagreement is a part of American history and the political process. From the Revolutionary War and the conflict between Loyalists and the Revolutionaries, through the abolitionist movement, the Civil War, the early labor movement, the civil rights movement, and the antiwar movement, it has been a feature of American governance. While religion was present in some of these conflicts, it was not in others. Restricting religious participation will not end the reality that people of conviction bring their passion to the political arena.

Moreover, the effort to secularize the public sphere has alienated many people of faith creating a backlash feeding the emergence of the religious right. As argued by Stephen Carter, "Nothing creates political energy quite so well as insults, and nothing makes [members of the religious right] harder to slow than the ignorance of their critics."

Religionists, specifically the Christian right, appear prone to a historicist essentialism that is equally troubling. They tend to blur the traditional hegemony of Christianity in America with a normative reading of the First Amendment, ignoring the reality of religious evolution in the United States. They lose sight of the need not only for tolerance of difference, but of respect for those who are different.

In summary, individually the arguments of constitutional morality do not demonstrate that religion is disruptive of the public square—or at least no more so than competing secular worldviews. However, the vehemence of the arguments does suggest that significant problems exist within the public square itself. Current discourse appears intolerant of diversity, that is, unwilling to acknowledge the importance (or even the acceptability) of arguments reflecting the religious and nonreligious pluralism of the nation. Moreover, the sense of community, the fabric of civilization necessary to sustain public engagement and sacrifice for the common good, appears fragile and growing thinner. Arguments against religious participation in the public square reflect this deeper malaise.

DAVID E. GUINN

References and Further Reading

- Audi, Robert. Religious Commitment and Secular Reason. New York: Oxford University Press, 2000.
 Carter, Stephen. The Culture of Disbelief. New York: Basic Books, 1993.
 ———. God's Name in Vain. New York: Basic Books, 2000.
 McConnell, Michael, Five Reasons to Reject the Claim that Religious Arguments Should Be Excluded from Democratic Deliberation. Utah Law Review 1999 (1999): 619.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Public Forum Doctrines

RELIGION IN PUBLIC UNIVERSITIES

What do the First Amendment clauses, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof" mean in the context of religion in public universities? Accommodationists believe government may aid or support religion in a neutral or nonpreferential way. Separationists reject any special accommodation or direct support of religion since they may jeopardize the principle of a strict separation of church and state. These contradictory interpretations inspire debate over the extent to which religious activities merit government support or accommodation in public universities and schools.

The Supreme Court first ruled voluntary state-sponsored prayer in public schools unconstitutional in Engel v. Vitale (1962). According to Justice Hugo Black, writing for the eight-to-one majority, “the constitutional prohibition against laws respecting an establishment of religion must at least mean that in this country it is not part of the business of the government to compose official prayers for any group of the American people to recite as a part of a religious program carried on by the government.” Justice Potter Stewart disagreed and argued that the school prayer was voluntary, part of a long American tradition and, as he wrote in another dissent (Abington v. Schempp), a “compulsory state educational system so structures a child’s life that if religious exercises are held to be an impermissible activity in schools ... [this will be] seen, not as a realization of state neutrality, but rather as the establishment of a religion of secularism.”

The Court has consistently expressed special concern for impressionable students (K–12) who might be influenced by religious activities (prayers, state-funded bus trips for sectarian schools, and until the 1980s, provision of university or public school facilities for religious extracurricular groups) appearing to be sponsored or funded by the government. However, it has also ruled that protection of free exercise of religion should not subordinate to the nonestablishment clause. (See Mitchell v. Helms [2000], Mueller v. Allen [1983], and Zelman v. Simmons-Harris [2002], for example, for cases that allowed formerly excluded state provision of secular books, tuition coverage, and scholarships.)

Accommodation of religion at the university level reemerged with a few changes in Court personnel in the 1980s. In Widmar v. Vincent (1981), Justice Lewis Powell found protection of religious activity elsewhere in the First Amendment (in the free speech component). Powell, writing for the majority, held that “a state university, which makes its facilities generally available for the activities of registered student groups, may not close its facilities to student groups desiring to use the facilities for religious worship and discussion.” Powell concluded that enabling participation of university religious groups had a “secular purpose” (advancing education), did not have the “primary effect” of advancing religion, and did not excessively entangle government with religion. This result met the requirements of the Court’s 1971 Lemon test that attempted to clarify what constituted “establishment of religion.”

Finding the idea of protecting religion via the principles of free speech and equal participation compelling, the U.S. Congress passed the Equal Access Act (1984). According to the Act, “It shall be unlawful for any public secondary school which receives Federal financial assistance and which has a limited open forum to deny equal access [to] any students who wish to conduct a meeting within that limited public forum on the basis of religious, political, philosophical or other content of the speech at such meetings.”

Since the Supreme Court rules on the constitutionality of such legislation, school boards had to wait until 1990 (Board of Education v. Mergens [1990]) to understand the extent to which “equal access” applied. In Mergens the Court (eight to one) held that since the school board allowed “noncurriculum related student groups” to meet on campus, the high school must allow Christian student groups similar access. The Court found it permissible for public schools to accommodate religious activity in a neutral, nonendorsing, and noncoercive atmosphere. Equal access would only violate the establishment clause if it coerced students to participate in religious activity or gave benefits “directly” to a religion. Justice Sandra Day O’Connor, writing for the majority, stated, “We think secondary school students are ... likely to understand that a school does not endorse or support student speech that it merely permits on a nondiscriminatory basis.”

The Court thus edged away from the hyperseparationist Lemon test, which assumed that even incidental government benefit to religion advanced religion or entangled government and religion impermissibly, toward a neutrality or noncoercion test. This shift toward neutral accommodation of religion and protection of equal access manifested itself also at the university level in Rosenberger v. University of Virginia (1995). Here the Court ruled that government may not discriminate against religion in excessive zeal to isolate itself completely from religion. In this case, the University of Virginia had prohibited funding for a student newspaper with a “Christian perspective” because it “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belie[f] in or about a deity or ultimate reality.”

According to Justice Anthony Kennedy, writing for the five-to-four majority, to deny funding denied the religious group its “right of free speech” and equal access. Referring to Lamb’s Chapel (1993) and Widmar, Kennedy wrote, “The University may not discriminate based on the viewpoint of private persons whose speech it subsidizes.” The Court concluded:

A public university does not violate the establishment clause when it grants access to its facilities on a religion neutral basis to a wide spectrum of student groups, even if some of those groups would use the facilities for devotional exercises.... We have long held that the guarantee of neutrality is respected, not offended, when the government, following neutral criteria and evenhanded policies, extends benefits to recipients whose ideologies and viewpoints, including religious ones, are broad and diverse.... [W]e have rejected the position that the establishment clause even justifies, much less requires, a refusal to extend free speech rights to religious speakers who participate in broad-reaching government programs neutral in design.

Clarence Thomas reminded dissenters of “our Nation’s long tradition of allowing religious adherents to participate on equal terms in neutral government programs.”

The dissenters (Justices Souter, Stevens, Ginsburg, and Breyer) argued otherwise: “[T]he Court today, for the first time, approves direct funding of core religious activities by an arm of the state.... Using public funds for direct subsidization of preaching the word is categorically forbidden under the establishment clause.” The dissenters saw the university’s funding of the “frankly evangelistic” Christian-perspective newspaper as equivalent to support for its proselytizing mission and thus unconstitutional. Following this logic that prohibits almost any support of religious activity would, of necessity, lead the university to end support for campus religious clubs. However, the dissenters did not worry about this because they feared religious evangelism, while the equally proselytizing viewpoints of marxists, feminists, or any brand of secular group could not jeopardize the “no establishment” clause because they were not “church[es].”

Such arguments wash out the right of religious voices to be included in university conversations. Despite specific protection of the right to express and exercise one’s religion in the First Amendment, the dissenters would prohibit public university (government) support of a religious group’s expression, while other groups could express at will under government subsidy. Dismissing this unequal prohibition, the Court in Rosenberger ruled against viewpoint discrimination. While this round in the war between the religion clauses went to a neutral accommodation of religion by public universities, lack of clarity remains. At the time of this writing, simmering in the lower courts are cases regarding college student groups’ “right” to choose those who share their faith-based doctrine as leaders even while thus “discriminating” against those who do not share their view, “voluntary” prayer at Virginia Military Institute, and a college teacher’s “right” to identify his religious orientation in the classroom.

L. SUE HULETT

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert. The Constitution and Religion: Leading Supreme Court Cases on Church and State. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.
- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- McConnell, Michael, John H. Harvey, and Thomas C. Berg. Religion and the Constitution. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002.
- Witte, John Jr. Religion and the American Constitutional Experiment. Boulder, CO: Westview Press, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abington Township School District v. Schempp*, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
- Board of Education of Westside Community School District v. Mergens*, 495 U.S. 226 (1990)
- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Lamb’s Chapel v. Center Moriches Union Free School District*, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- Rosenberger v. Rectors of University of Virginia*, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Equal Access Act; Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; First Amendment and PACs; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Kennedy, Anthony McLeod; Lemon Test; O’Connor, Sandra Day; Powell, Lewis Franklin, Jr.; Rehnquist, William H.; Souter, David Hackett; Stewart, Potter; Thomas, Clarence; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

RELIGION IN THE WORKPLACE

Religion in the workplace is best understood through the case law that has interpreted the First Amendment of the Constitution and Title VII of the landmark Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The First Amendment famously begins as follows: “Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof.” An enormous body of case law has proliferated in the continuing endeavor to interpret and apply the First Amendment, whether the Jeffersonian “wall of separation” between church and state or whether accommodation of religion designed to bring religious values into the otherwise “naked public square.” The classic tension between the antiestablishment and the free exercise clauses of the First Amendment thus overarches the application and contour of religion in the workplace. Perhaps more immediately, Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964—which protects against, and prohibits, discrimination in employment on the basis of religion—gives the role and reality of religion in the workplace more tangible meaning. Title VII also has several exemptions for religious institutions, permitting them to discriminate in their internal employment in favor of those who are members in good standing of the particular religion. For example, Section 702a provides that Title VII's prohibition of discrimination on the basis of religion "shall not apply ... to a religious corporation, association, education institution, or society with respect to the employment of individuals of a particular religion to perform work connected with carrying on" such activities of the entity. The specific exemption within Title VII for such religious institutions from Title VII's protection against discrimination on the basis of religion makes membership in good standing of the religion of the particular religiously affiliated institutional employer a "bona fide occupational qualification" in order to obtain, and retain, the employment with the religiously affiliated institutional employer. Most classically, the "ministerial" exemption allows a synagogue, for example, to hire as rabbi an ordained rabbi in good standing, and to reject an academically superbly qualified, armed with several doctorates, who happens to be, for example, alternatively, an atheist, a believer but one who is not an ordained rabbi, or a believing Catholic or Muslim.

These classic First Amendment and Title VII precepts and themes can be best understood through elucidation of the salient case law from the Supreme Court over the course of the past several decades.

The U.S. Supreme Court has consistently demonstrated great judicial deference to institutional employers' interests, at the expense of employees' right to the free exercise of their religion in the workplace and of their right not to be discriminated against in employment on the basis of their religion. The Supreme Court dramatically subordinated employees' rights to the prerogatives of institutional employers in a series of important decisions beginning in 1977. As the tenure of Chief Justice Warren Burger evolved and matured, jurisprudence of the Court debilitated First Amendment and Title VII rights of individual employees—rights that theoretically were designed respectively to protect free exercise of religion and to protect against employment discrimination on the basis of religion. After a decade passed, and as Chief Justice William Rehnquist succeeded Warren Burger in 1986, the initially sharply polarized cases of the late 1970s were unproblematically accepted, largely without dissent, by virtually all members of the Court. Several cases that were decided between 1977 and 1987 powerfully exemplify these troubling jurisprudential diminutions of the free exercise and Title VII rights of employees.

Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison (1977) marked the beginning of this trend in the Court's debilitation of employees' Title VII protections against discrimination on the basis of an employee's religion. Justice Byron White wrote for the seven-member Court majority, with Justices William Brennan and Thurgood Marshall in dissent.

Trans World Airlines (TWA) hired Larry G. Hardison to work in TWA's Stores Department. The Stores Department was crucial to TWA's operations and therefore had to operate twenty-four hours a day, every day of the year. TWA employees had to be flexible. Hardison was subject to a seniority system designed through a collective bargaining agreement that TWA had negotiated with the union of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers. Under the agreement the most senior employees had first choice for job and shift assignments.

In spring 1968, Hardison joined the Worldwide Church of God, which forbade work on the Sabbath (Saturday) and proscribed work on specified religious holidays. Hardison told his supervisor of the problem, which was temporarily resolved by moving Hardison to a different shift. However, Hardison subsequently transferred to a different area, where he did not have enough seniority to avoid working on his Sabbath. Hardison was asked to work, and he refused to report. After a hearing, Hardison was discharged for insubordination for refusing to work his designated shift.

Hardison sued both TWA and the union. He claimed that his discharge constituted unlawful religious discrimination in violation of Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964. Hardison also claimed that the union discriminated against him by failing to represent him adequately in his dispute with TWA and by depriving him of his right to exercise his religious beliefs. Hardison's claim of religious discrimination was based on the 1967 guidelines of the federal Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC), which required employers "to make reasonable accommodations to the religious needs of employees whenever such accommodations do not constitute 'undue hardship.'"

The Supreme Court held that TWA's discharge of Hardison did not violate Title VII. The Court explained the requirements mandated by the EEOC guidelines. Under the guidelines an employer must make reasonable accommodations of employees' religious needs. The EEOC, however, did not suggest what sort of accommodations would be “unreasonable.”

The Court opined that TWA made reasonable efforts to accommodate the employee’s religious practices and Sabbath observance as required by Title VII and, in addition, that TWA had done all it reasonably could to accommodate the employee’s religious practices within the bounds of the seniority system in the collective bargaining agreement. Therefore, stated the Court, the duty to accommodate Hardison’s religious observance and refusal to work on Saturday did not require TWA to take steps inconsistent with the seniority system of the valid collective bargaining agreement.

The Court, placing great weight on the seniority system, agreed that religious observances are a reality. However, religiously observant employees cannot always get first choice of shifts. If there are not enough employees to work Saturdays, the seniority system made seniority the determinative factor. If not, then the senior person would be denied his or her rights under the collective bargaining agreement.

Title VII does not stand for the proposition that a company can deprive employees of labor contract rights in order to accommodate other employees’ religious preferences. Neither the employer nor the labor union was required by Title VII to make special exception to the labor contract’s seniority system in order to accommodate the employee’s religious obligations. The Court found that “to require TWA to bear more than a de minimis cost in order to give Hardison Saturdays off is an ‘undue hardship’ not required by Title VII.” The costs of giving certain employees days off to accommodate their religion—by abandoning the seniority system—would result in preferential treatment of employees on the basis of religion.

The dissent, written by Justice Marshall and joined by Justice Brennan, stated that the majority opinion was a fatal blow to the requirement to accommodate religious practices in the workplace. Notably, the dissent argued that accommodation should not be rejected simply because it involved unequal treatment. Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act required employers to grant privileges as part of the accommodation process, and a huge carrier like TWA could have borne the burden of the extra costs without undue hardship.

With the Hardison decision, however, the employer’s Title VII duty to reasonably accommodate the religious practices of the observant employee was utterly minimized by the Court. Any accommodation measure that resulted in more than a de minimis cost to the employer was an unreasonable “undue hardship” and thus was not required of the employer by Title VII. This effective judicial relief for the employer from its federal statutory duty to reasonably accommodate the employee’s religious observance, practice, and belief was made even more complete by the Supreme Court in 1986. Chief Justice Rehnquist wrote for the seven-member majority in Ansonia Board of Education v. Philbrook (1986), with only Justices Marshall and Stevens filing opinions concurring in part and dissenting in part.

Philbrook had been employed by the Ansonia School Board since 1962 to teach business classes. In 1968 he was baptized into the Worldwide Church of God. The church required its members to refrain from working during designated holy days, which caused Philbrook to miss six school days per year.

Pursuant to the collective bargaining agreement between the school board and the teacher’s union, teachers were granted three days of annual leave for observance of religious holidays, but they could not use any accumulated sick leave for religious observances. Philbrook used the three days granted for religious holidays each year. Since he needed three more days to observe his religion, he asked the school board either to adopt the policy of allowing use of three days for personal business or, in the alternative, to allow him to pay the cost of a substitute and to receive full pay for additional days off for religious observances. The school board rejected Philbrook’s request. Philbrook sued, alleging that the prohibition on the use of “necessary personal business” leave for religious observance violated sections 703(a)(1) and (2) of Title VII. He sought both damages and injunctive relief.

Although the Supreme Court remanded the case for further factual findings and thus did not issue a dispositive decision, it reiterated that the employer met statutory obligations by offering a reasonable accommodation for religious practices, observances, and beliefs to the employee. Significantly, the employer is not required to acquiesce to the employee’s most desired, most beneficial accommodation. As Chief Justice Rehnquist summarized:

Thus, where the employer has already reasonably accommodated the employee’s religious needs, the statutory inquiry is at an end. The employer need not further show that each of the employee’s alternative accommodations would result in undue hardship. As Hardison illustrates, the extent of undue hardship on the employer’s business is at issue only where the employer claims that it is unable to offer any reasonable accommodation without such hardship.

Through these two important decisions the Supreme Court essentially relieved the employer of its statutory duty to reasonably accommodate the religious employee; anything beyond de minimis cost caused by the accommodation will be an “undue hardship” to the employer, which is beyond the employer’s Title VII duty of reasonable accommodation of the observations, practices, and beliefs of the religious employee.

When the employer is a recognized, mainstream religious institution, the Supreme Court has been even more deferential to the employer—again at the expense of the rights of the employees. Indeed, those who advocate strict separation between church and state may see the Court’s accommodation of the religious institutional employer as a violation of the establishment clause of the First Amendment. That, obviously, is not a perspective shared by the Supreme Court, which instead prefers to accommodate the prerogatives of the religiously affiliated institutional employer.

In National Labor Relations Board v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago (1979), Chief Justice Burger, writing for a bare five-member majority of the Court, asserted that the federal National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) did not have jurisdiction to investigate unfair labor practice charges brought against the Catholic bishop of Chicago. The bishop was the employer of the complaining faculty members who were employed in the schools operated under the auspices of the Catholic Church.

Although the prerogatives of this powerful institutional employer could have been constrained if it had been subject to the federal National Labor Relations Act, the Court majority was extremely sensitive to the free exercise and establishment clauses of the First Amendment. Chief Justice Burger summarized:

Accordingly, in the absence of a clear expression of Congress’ intent to bring teachers in church-operated schools within the jurisdiction of the Board, we decline to construe the Act in a manner that could in turn call upon the Court to resolve difficult and sensitive questions arising out of the guarantees of the First Amendment Religion Clauses.

In 1974 and 1975, separate representation petitions were filed with the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) by the faculty union. The Catholic bishop challenged the board’s assertion of jurisdiction. The U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit agreed with the Catholic bishop. The free exercise and establishment clauses of the First Amendment of the Constitution precluded the NLRB from exercising jurisdiction over the schools of the Catholic Church and over the Catholic bishop as the institutional employer.

In his opinion for the majority of the Court, Chief Justice Burger pointed to the legislative history of the National Labor Relations Act, which revealed nothing to indicate that church-operated schools would be within the NLRB’s jurisdiction. The chief justice referred specifically to the debate behind an amendment to the Act, which reflected certain First Amendment guarantees, and argued, “the absence of an ‘affirmative intention of the Congress clearly expressed’ fortifies our conclusion that Congress did not contemplate that the Board would require church-operated schools to [recognize] unions as bargaining agents for their teachers.”

Within less than a decade, the increasingly accommodationist Court cavalierly sustained, without dissent, the religiously affiliated institutional employer’s prerogative to terminate—summarily—competent, long-service employees in Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos (1987).

Christine J. Amos was an employee of Beehive Clothing Mills, a profit-making company. Frank Mayson was a custodian at the Deseret Gymnasium, a nonprofit facility open to the public. Both enterprises were owned and operated by the Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints and by the Corporation of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints. Amos, three other Beehive Clothing Mills employees, and Mayson challenged their individual firings, which were based on their failure to obtain a temple recommend (a standard for determining members’ eligibility to attend a temple). The individuals failed to have the district court declare them to be a class.

The defendant church and presiding bishop argued that a temple recommend was a legitimate requirement for working in what was essentially a religious institution. The Supreme Court felt that there were insufficient findings of fact at the district court regarding the religious or nonreligious character of the activities at Beehive Clothing Mills, but it proceeded to judgment concerning the activities at the Deseret Gymnasium, where Mayson worked. Thus, despite the fact that the employment status of Amos was not at issue, the Court retained Amos’s name in the caption of the case.

Both the Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints and the Corporation of the President of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints were religious entities associated with an unincorporated religious association sometimes called the Mormon Church. Frank Mayson worked at the Deseret Gymnasium for approximately sixteen years, but he was discharged in 1981 because he failed to qualify for a temple recommend. Mayson then brought suit alleging unlawful discrimination on the basis of religion. The church moved to dismiss, maintaining that Section 702 of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964 shielded it from liability. Mayson argued that the Civil Rights Act should not be construed to permit religious employers to discriminate on religious grounds in employment of persons for obviously nonreligious, secular jobs. Mayson believed that such an interpretation of Section 702 of Title VII would violate the First Amendment, as an establishment of a religion.

Without dissent, the Supreme Court reversed the decision of the lower federal court, which had found in favor of former employee Mayson. The Court examined whether Section 702 of Title VII of the federal Civil Rights Act of 1964—which exempts religious organizations from Title VII’s prohibition of religious discrimination in employment—was unconstitutional in light of the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Specifically, did Section 702’s statutory exemption from Title VII have the primary effect of unconstitutionally advancing religion, in violation of the establishment clause? The Court resolved the question in the negative.

The Court measured the facts and the statute against the establishment clause, according to the classic multipart test set forth in the landmark case of Lemon v. Kurtzman (1971). The Lemon test comprises three parts, or prongs: (1) Does the law at issue serve a “secular legislative purpose”? (2) Does the law in question have a “principal or primary effect that neither advances nor inhibits religion”? (3) Does the law in question “impermissibly entangle Church and State”?

The Court concluded that, under the first prong of the Lemon test, it was permissible for the Congress to attempt to minimize governmental “interference with the decisionmaking process in religions.” Under the second prong, the Court stated that a law is not necessarily unconstitutional simply because it allows churches to advance religion. In order to violate this prong, the Court reasoned that it would be necessary to show that the government itself had advanced religion through its own activities and influence. Finally, under the third prong of the Lemon test, the Court concluded that there was no unconstitutional entanglement raised by Section 702 of Title VII.

Justice O’Connor suggested that a new approach be applied to the Lemon test: The inquiry should be “whether government’s purpose is to endorse religion and whether the Statute actually conveys a message of endorsement,” as judged by an objective observer. This accommodationist thinking has proved increasingly influential among additional members of the Court since the Amos decision in 1987, but has yet to lead to the Court’s repudiation of the Lemon test in its establishment clause jurisprudence.

For the most part, as a result of these salient cases the exercise and observance of religion in the workplace has been made very tenuous as a matter of law. The legal protections of religion, and the rights of religious observer employees in the workplace, are, at best, precarious. On both conceptual and practical levels, labor law doctrine, the First Amendment religion clauses, and Title VII protections against discrimination in employment because of religion have all been debilitated by the Court. The only consistent winners in these cases have been the institutional employers.

DAVID L. GREGORY

References and Further Reading

- Gregory, David L., Catholic Labor Theory and the Transformation of Work, Washington and Lee Law Review 45 (1988): 119.
 Laycock, Douglas, Towards a General Theory of the Religion Clauses: The Case of Church Labor Relations and the Right to Church Autonomy, Columbia Law Review 81 (1981): 1373.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Ansonia Board of Education v. Philbrook*, 479 U.S. 60 (1986).
Corporation of the Presiding Bishop of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. Amos, 483 U.S. 327 (1987).
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971).
National Labor Relations Board v. Catholic Bishop of Chicago, 440 U.S. 490 (1979).
Trans World Airlines, Inc. v. Hardison, 432 U.S. 63 (1977).
 Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, 42 USC 2000e et. seq.

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN THE MILITARY

The opening clause of the First Amendment (“Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof”) stands for the proposition that, with few restrictions, American citizens have the right to choose both their religion and the way they wish to observe it.

Supreme Court jurisprudence, however, is less clear concerning the extent to which military personnel are afforded the same constitutional rights. Although Chappel v. Wallace (1983) recognized that “citizens in uniform cannot be stripped of basic rights simply because they have doffed their civilian clothes,” Article I of the Constitution gives plenary power to Congress “to make rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces.”

The Court has traditionally deferred to professional military judgment regarding such regulations.

The doctrine of military necessity supersedes a soldier's right to freely practice his or her religion. In both Johnson v. Robison (1974) and Gillette v. United States (1988), the Supreme Court found that military necessity is such a fundamental goal that the government need show only that the policy implemented is designed to further a substantial government interest. Therefore, the government need not meet the higher standard promulgated in Sherbert v. Verner (1963), which requires it to demonstrate that restrictions on religious practices are in furtherance of a compelling state interest, whose purpose cannot be achieved by means of less restrictive methods. In Employment Division, Oregon Department of Human Resources v. Smith (1990), however, the Court ruled that the federal government has the power to limit religious practices when the regulation is a "valid neutral law of general applicability."

In Goldman v. Weinberger (1986), a military clinical psychologist, an Orthodox Jew, brought an action in federal court seeking an against that would allow him to wear a yarmulke (skullcap) while on duty. Deferring to military judgment, the Supreme Court ruled (five to four) against Goldman. It held that the regulation was being enforced in order to achieve a legitimate end, taking into consideration the individual's religious needs: The "Air Force's interest in uniformity renders the strict enforcement of its regulation permissible." Shortly after the Goldman decision, however, Congress ordered the secretary of defense "to minimize the potential conflict between the interests of members of the armed forces in abiding by their religious tenets and the military interest in maintaining discipline." Subsequently, the secretary relaxed the restrictions so long as the apparel is neat and conservative and would not interfere with the performance of military duties.

Currently, the military's religious accommodation policy is outlined in a Department of Defense directive, which allows for free exercise that "will not have an adverse impact on military readiness, unit cohesion, standards, or discipline." This standard places a high value on the right of military personnel to practice their religion, and prohibits discrimination in the form of jokes, compulsory services, religious exclusion, and purposeful failure to make arrangements for alternative religious services. So long as the practice does not interfere with a military objective, it is generally permitted.

Thus, for example, Jewish military personnel are now generally permitted to wear yarmulkes with their uniforms. Other variations in the uniform dress code, such as the wearing of rings that display religious symbols and necklaces containing crosses, are likewise currently permitted.

The free exercise clause of the First Amendment has been held to compel Congress to ensure that chaplains are available to military personnel wherever they are deployed. The Department of Defense also requires that accommodations be made for the various faiths' religious services and holidays. In the absence of a general policy it considers individual requests, using a five-part test to determine (1) the importance of military requirements in terms of individual and unit readiness, (2) the religious importance of the accommodation to the individual, (3) the cumulative impact of repeated accommodations of a similar nature, (4) alternative means available to meet the requested accommodation, and (5) previous treatment of the same or similar requests. During wartime, religious accommodation is much harder to provide, and often religious worship is sacrificed for the good of the mission.

Service people whose religion has dietary restrictions are similarly accommodated. With the aid of military chaplains (who are ordained in one faith but often must minister to others), troops stationed around the world are able to request certain prepackaged meals that would allow them to observe the dietary rules mandated by their religions.

Military personnel may not refuse medical treatment during wartime, especially routine inoculations, even if their sincere religious beliefs do not allow it. In peacetime, exceptions are permitted on a case-by-case basis.

Exemptions from military service are granted, however, to American citizens who can demonstrate a sincere objection to warfare—the so-called conscientious objection rule. This exemption was first recognized during World War I and allowed people whose faith forbids them from participating in war to avoid combat service. During the 1960s, many draftees sought exemptions because they objected specifically to the war in Vietnam. In Gillette, the Supreme Court held that the free exercise clause in the First Amendment does not require exemption from military service of those conscientiously opposed to participation in particular wars; it is sufficient that the government's interests relate directly to the burdens its regulations imposed on free exercise rights. In Robison, the Court upheld a statute that denied education benefits to conscientious objectors who performed alternative service.

KENNETH LASSON

References and Further Reading

- 10 USC 774 (1987).
- Department of Defense Directive Number 1300.17 (Accommodation of Religious Practices Within the Military Services), issued February 3, 1988; certified as current, November 21, 2003. <http://www.dtic.mil/whs/directives>.

 Lasson, Kenneth, Religious Liberty in the Military: The First Amendment Under "Friendly Fire," Journal of Law & Religion 9 (1992): 471, 493.
 O'Neal, Robert M., The Tenth Charles L. Decker Lecture in Administrative and Civil Law: Civil Liberty and Military Necessity—Some Preliminary Thoughts on Goldman v. Weinberger, Military Law Review 113 (1986): 31.
 Rabinowitz, Stephen Lewis, Goldman v. Secretary of Defense: Restricting the Religious Rights of Military Servicemembers, American University Law Review 34 (1985): 881.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Chappel v. Wallace, 462 U.S. 296 (1983)
Employment Division, Oregon Department of Human Resources v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Gillette v. United States, 484 U.S. 1011 (1988)
Goldman v. Weinberger, 106 S. Ct. 1310 (1986)
Johnson v. Robison, 415 U.S. 361 (1974)
Sherbert v. Verner, 372 U.S. 398 (1963)

See also Chaplain: Military

RELIGIOUS FREEDOM RESTORATION ACT

The Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA) was the most expansive federal law aiding religious entities in U.S. history. The RFRA imposed strict scrutiny, including the compelling-interest test and the least restrictive means test, on every law in the country that substantially burdened religious conduct. It was held unconstitutional in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997).

The RFRA was passed in response to the Supreme Court's decision in Employment Division v. Smith (1990). The Court held that generally applicable, neutral laws may be applied to religious entities, even if they result in an incidental burden on religion. The case involved the application of unemployment compensation laws and narcotics laws to state-employed drug counselors and Native American church members who used peyote, an illegal narcotic, during church services. The Court held that the drug counselors could be denied unemployment compensation benefits where the law prohibited compensation when an employee broke a state law, and the men had broken a generally applicable and neutral narcotics law by using the peyote.

The principle that generally applicable, neutral laws may be applied to religious entities was drawn from the "vast majority" of the Court's previous free exercise cases, and from the seminal free exercise case, Reynolds v. United States (1879), which declared that holding that religious believers were not subject to generally applicable laws would be "in effect to permit every citizen to become a law unto himself." Yet, Smith sparked an outcry from civil liberties and religious groups, who argued that the Supreme Court had provided more expansive protection for religious groups against all laws in Sherbert v. Verner (1963). Sherbert held that a state unemployment compensation law could not be applied to a sabbatarian, and introduced the compelling interest test to free exercise jurisprudence. Even though the test in Sherbert was not applied in many later cases, popular wisdom believed that the compelling interest test was to be applied in every free exercise case. That understanding of the free exercise clause informed those who rebelled against Smith and pushed for the RFRA.

Congress, at the urging of the coalition of civil liberties and religious organizations, passed the RFRA in direct response to Smith. First proposed in 1990, the law was passed in 1993. The purpose was plainly to overrule or displace Smith. The legislative record contains page after page of denunciations of the Supreme Court's decision.

The RFRA was employed in a variety of cases, with the largest number of cases in its short history involving claims brought by prison inmates. The leap in the level of review was most pronounced in the prison context, where the Court had been explicit in prior cases that prison regulations were subject to very low-level scrutiny (O'Lone v. State of Shabazz [1987], or, in some circumstances, intermediate scrutiny (Turner v. Safley [1987])). Because of the RFRA's fee-shifting provision, many law firms were willing to take such cases, resulting in the large number filed.

In 1997, the Supreme Court decided Boerne v. Flores, and held that the RFRA was beyond the power of Congress under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment. In a historic states rights decision, the Court clarified the standards for congressional law-making pursuant to Section 5, which states, "The Congress shall have the power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article." First, Congress was not permitted to regulate the states pursuant to Section 5 unless the states had engaged in widespread and persisting constitutional violations. This predicate for Section 5 could be proved by common knowledge or a record created in Congress. The Court found the brief, anecdotal record created in support of RFRA to fall far short of showing widespread free exercise violations in the states. Second, the law Congress passed pursuant to Section 5 was to be "congruent and proportional" to the constitutional harm engendered by the states. In the words of the Court, "RFRA cannot be considered remedial, preventive legislation, if those terms are to have any meaning. The RFRA is so out of proportion to a supposed remedial or preventive object that it cannot be understood as responsive to, or designed to prevent, unconstitutional behavior.”

The Boerne decision further held that the RFRA violated the separation of powers pursuant to Marbury v. Madison (1803), and that it infringed the amendment procedures required in Article V by effecting a change in the Constitution through simple majority vote. These elements of the opinion bring into question the validity of the RFRA against federal law, but no court has yet held it unconstitutional as applied to federal law, and the Supreme Court has not ruled on the issue.

Following the RFRA's invalidation, proponents lobbied the state legislatures to pass similar legislation. As of 2004, thirteen states have enacted state religious liberty laws, including Alabama, Arizona, Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Missouri, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Texas. Additionally, the Religious Liberty Protection Act (RLPA) was introduced in the U.S. Congress in three successive years, 1998, 1999, and 2000. It would have predicated the RFRA's strict scrutiny standard on Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the commerce clause, and the spending clause. The RLPA was never passed, but in 2000, Congress passed and President Clinton signed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, which applies strict scrutiny to land use laws and prison regulations that substantially burden religious individuals and institutions.

MARCI A. HAMILTON

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C., What Hath Congress Wrought? An Interpretive Guide to the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Villanova Law Review 39 (1994): 1.
- Bybee, Jay, Taking Liberties With the First Amendment: Congress, Section 5, and the Religious Freedom Restoration Act, Vanderbilt Law Review 48 (1995): 1539.
- Eisgruber, Christopher V., and Lawrence G. Sager, Why the Religious Freedom Restoration Act Is Unconstitutional, New York University Law Review 69 (1994): 437.
- Hamilton, Marci A., The Religious Freedom Restoration Act Is Unconstitutional, Period, University of Pennsylvania Law Journal 1. (1998).
- , City of Boerne v. Flores: A Landmark for Structural Analysis, William and Mary Law Review 39 (1998): 699.
- , The Religious Freedom Restoration Act: Letting the Fox into the Henhouse Under Cover of Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, Cardoso Law Review 16 (1994): 357.
- Laycock, Douglas, Conceptual Gulfs in City of Boerne v. Flores, William and Mary Law Review 39 (1998): 743.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- O'Lone v. Estate of Shabazz*, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
- Marbury v. Madison*, 1 Cranch 137 (1803)
- Reynolds v. United States*, 98 U.S. 145 (1879)
- Sherbert v. Verner*, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)
- Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C. section 2000bb et. seq.
- Religious Liberty Protection of 1998 (Introduced in Senate), S. 2148, 105th Congress, 2d Session. <http://thomas.loc.gov/cgi-bin/query/D?c105:2:/temp/~c105Wb2Ov1> (see House version, H.R. 4019, same website; subsequent versions, found at <http://thomas.loc.gov>)
- U.S. Constitution, Amendment 14, Section 5

RELIGIOUS GARB IN COURTROOMS AND CLASSROOMS

In a nation that guarantees and values civil liberties reflecting a wide variety of religious traditions, beliefs, and practice, American courts have decided many complex cases relating to the public display of religion, including cases involving challenges to restrictions on religious garb in public courtrooms and classrooms. Courts have generally protected the rights of parties to a case to wear religious garb in the courtroom, but have largely been less protective of the rights of attorneys to appear in court while dressed in religious clothing. In the public school context, although courts have expressed a range of approaches to dress codes that prohibit religious garb, they have often provided greater protection for the rights of students than for those of teachers.

In the courtroom setting, most published decisions have held that the rights of a party to wear religious garb outweigh any potential concern of security, decorum, or juror prejudice. For example, within a two-month period in 1978, courts in Rhode Island (In re Palmer) and New York (Close-It Enterprises, Inc. v. Weinberger) held that trial courts had improperly ordered the removal of religious head covering by parties who identified themselves, respectively, as a Sunni Muslim and a devout adherent to the Jewish faith. The courts emphasized both the free exercise rights of the parties and the absence of a sufficiently counterbalancing threat to decorum, security, or fairness. These and other courts have also endorsed the use of jury instructions to prevent any prejudice that may result from a party's wearing religious garb in the courtroom. In Joseph v. State (1994), a Florida court broadly interpreted constitutional protections to extend to dress requirements based on religious beliefs that were clearly not mainstream. Nevertheless, in Spanks-El v. Finley (1988), Illinois federal courts held that the compelling interest in courtroom security outweighed a party's religious objection to temporarily removing a fez from his head at a security checkpoint. In addition, in State v. Hodges (1985), the Tennessee Supreme Court suggested that a party's desire to dress "like a chicken" may be so bizarre as to exceed the bounds of free exercise protections.

A more complex issue relates to the rights of attorneys to wear religious garb in the courtroom, often in the context of priests who wish to appear in clerical collars. This issue is most notably illustrated in the saga of Vincent LaRocca, a Roman Catholic priest and a lawyer in New York, whose repeated attempts to wear his clerical collar when serving as an attorney spawned years of litigation before numerous New York State and federal courts. Ultimately, in LaRocca v. Lane (1975), the New York Court of Appeals upheld the lower court order that prohibited LaRocca from wearing his collar when representing a criminal defendant. The court found that the lower court's decision protected the rights of both the defendant and the government, preventing the potential danger of jury bias that could have resulted from LaRocca's clerical status as a priest. In contrast, however, the court acknowledged that this reasoning might not preclude an attorney from appearing in court while donning nonclerical religious garb. Moreover, as O'Reilly v. New York Times Co. (1982), a New York federal appeals case, and Ryslik v. Krass (1995), a New Jersey state case, suggest, courts are more likely to permit priests to wear their collars when appearing in court pro se, consistent with the protection generally afforded parties who wish to wear religious garb. Both of these courts accepted the utility of jury instructions to address and prevent any jury prejudice.

Finally, courts appear to vary in their approach to restrictions on religious garb in public schools. In Cooper v. Eugene School District (1986), the Oregon Supreme Court upheld statutes pursuant to which a special education teacher in Oregon public schools, who identified herself as a Sikh, was suspended for wearing religious garb in performance of her duties as a teacher. The court engaged in a historical survey of wide-ranging attitudes of courts addressing the issue of religious symbolism in public schools. The Oregon court concluded that although courts generally found that a teacher's religious garb alone does not demonstrate improper sectarian influence in the classroom, at the same time, rules against such dress were generally permitted to avoid the appearance of sectarian endorsement. Thus, the court held that the Oregon statute served the legitimate concern that the teacher's regular or frequent appearance in religious garb may be perceived to signal the school's endorsement of the teacher's religious commitment. In a more recent case, however, Nichol v. Arin Intermediate Unit 28 (2003), a federal court granted injunctive relief in favor of an instructional assistant who wore a cross on a necklace and was therefore suspended pursuant to a Pennsylvania School Code prohibiting teachers and certain other public school employees from wearing religious garb or symbols. The court found that the school policy improperly discriminated against the free exercise and expression of religion, without counterbalancing justification, such as a demonstration of resulting disruption, controversy, or disturbance, or any evidence of perceived government endorsement of the teacher's religion. As concerns of endorsement are less likely in the context of the religious garb of students, several courts have held that that school dress codes may not unduly burden the sincerely held religious beliefs of student. Thus, in Chalifoux v. New Caney Independent School District (1997) and Alabama and Coushatta Tribes of Texas v. Trustees of Big Sandy Independent School District (1993), Texas federal courts have found unconstitutional school dress regulations that did not exempt students who wore rosaries or long hair as a form of religious expression.

SAMUEL J. LEVINE

References and Further Reading

Levine, Samuel J., Religious Symbols and Religious Garb in the Courtroom: Personal Values and Public Judgments, Fordham Law Review 66 (1998): 1505.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Alabama and Coushatta Tribes of Texas v. Trustees of Big Sandy Independent School Dist.*, 817 F. Supp. 1319 (E.D. Tex. 1993)
Chalifoux v. New Caney Independent School Dist., 976 F. Supp. 659 (S.D. Tex. 1997)
Close-It Enterprises, Inc. v. Weinberger, 407 N.Y.S.2d 587 (App. Div. 1978)
Cooper v. Eugene School District, No. 4J, 723 P.2d 298 (Or. 1986)
In re Palmer, 386 A.2d 1112 (R.I. 1978)
Joseph v. State, 642 So. 2d 613 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1994)
LaRocca v. Lane, 338 N.E.2d 606 (N.Y. 1975)
Nichol v. Arin Intermediate Unit 28, 268 F. Supp.2d 536 (W.D. Pa. 2003)
O'Reilly v. New York Times Co., 692 F.2d 863 (2d Cir. 1982)
Ryslik v. Krass, 652 A.2d 767 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1995)
Spanks-El v. Finley, No. 85-C9259, 1987 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3374 (N.D. Ill. Apr. 23, 1987), aff'd, 845 F.2d 1023 (7th Cir. 1988)
State v. Hodges, 695 S.W.2d 171 (Tenn. 1985)
 24 Pa. Stat. Ann s. 11-1112
 ORS 342.650 and 342.655

RELIGIOUS LAND USE AND INSTITUTIONALIZED PERSONS ACT OF 2000

The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000 (RLUIPA) was passed for the purpose of aiding religious landowners and prisoners in bringing challenges to laws that substantially burden their religious conduct. RLUIPA is the successor statute to the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA), which mandated strict scrutiny against every law in the United States that substantially burdened religious entities. RFRA was held unconstitutional in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), on states rights, separation of powers, and Article V grounds.

RLUIPA creates a cause of action for religious landowners to challenge land use laws and for prisoners to challenge prison regulations, and requires the application of strict scrutiny to those laws. It was intended to circumvent the constitutional defects of RFRA, and it provided the same incentive to lawyers to bring lawsuits for religious institutions, a fee-shifting provision, which accounts in part for the relatively large number of cases filed under it.

RLUIPA is an odd pairing of interests, to be sure. It was the result of religious organizations that were disappointed when RFRA was held unconstitutional, but incapable of persuading Congress to mount another law with the same scope. Concerns about RFRA's impact on children and other issues made the broad-based approach of RFRA untenable. The religious organizations then focused on two particular arenas: land use and prisons, and succeeded in getting that combination passed. President Clinton signed the bill into law in September 2000.

The land use provisions were premised on Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment, the commerce clause, and the spending clause. The spending clause is rarely invoked, because little federal funds go toward local land use planning. With respect to Section 5, RLUIPA's sponsors relied on hearings held on the never-enacted Religious Liberty Protection Act (RLPA), at which religious entities testified regarding difficulties faced by religious institutions in the land use process. The commerce clause is invoked through a "jurisdictional element," which states the law applies to "any case in which ... the substantial burden affects, or removal of that substantial burden would affect, commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with Indian tribes, even if the burden results from a rule of general applicability."

The primary impediment for religious entities seeking relief under RLUIPA's land use provisions has been the burden of proving that the application of the particular land use law imposed a "substantial burden." In Civil Liberties for Urban Believers v. Chicago (2003), the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit explained the standard as follows:

[I]n the context of RLUIPA's broad definition of religious exercise, a land-use regulation that imposes a substantial burden on religious exercise is one that necessarily bears direct, primary, and fundamental responsibility for rendering religious exercise—including the use of real property for the purpose thereof within the regulated jurisdiction generally—effectively impracticable.

Constitutional challenges to the land use provisions are working their way through the courts, with no decisions in the federal courts of appeals as of early 2004. The challenges argue that RLUIPA is an unconstitutional exercise of Congress's power under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment and the commerce clause, and violates states rights, the establishment clause, and the equal protection clause.

The prison provisions were premised on the commerce clause and the spending clause. It prohibits the imposition of a substantial burden on the religious exercise of a prisoner in any case which, "the substantial burden is imposed in a program or activity that receives Federal financial assistance; or the substantial burden affects, or removal of that substantial burden would affect, commerce with foreign nations, among the several States, or with Indian tribes."

Judicial decisions in response to constitutional challenges to date have focused on whether RLUIPA's prison provisions violate the First Amendment's establishment clause. To date, at least four circuits have addressed the question, with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit holding it is unconstitutional (Cutter v. Wilkinson [2003]), while the Fourth Circuit in Madison v. Riter (2003), the Seventh Circuit in Charles v. Verhagen (2002), and the Ninth Circuit in Mayweathers v. Newland (2002) have upheld RLUIPA's constitutionality. The Supreme Court is likely to take up the issue in the near future.

There were virtually no hearings on prisons during the hearings on RLPA, making a defense of the law under Section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment virtually impossible.

MARCI A. HAMILTON

References and Further Reading

- Geller, Joshua R., The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000: An Unconstitutional Exercise of Congress's Power Under Section Five of the Fourteenth Amendment, New York University Journal of Legislation and Public Policy 6 (2003): 561.
- Hamilton, Marci A., Federalism and the Public Good: The True Story Behind the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, Indiana Law Journal 78 (2003): 311.

———, How Congress Undermined the American Dream: The Effect of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act on Residential Neighborhoods, Findlaw's Writ: Commentary, <http://writ.news.findlaw.com/hamilton/20030424.html>.

Hook, Diane K., The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000: Congress' New Twist on "Speak Softly and Carry a Big Stick", Urban Law 34 (2002): 829.

Storzer, Roman P., and Anthony R. Picarello, Jr., The Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000: A Constitutional Response to Unconstitutional Zoning Practices, George Mason Law Review 9 (2001): 929.

Zucco, David B., Note: Super-Sized with Fries: Regulating Religious Land Use in the Era of Megachurches, Minnesota Law Review 88 (2003): 416.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Charles v. Verhagen, 220 F.Supp.2d 937 (W.D. Wis. 2002)
City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)

Civil Liberties for Urban Believers v. City of Chicago, 342 F.3d 752 (7th Cir. 2003)

Cutter v. Wilkinson, 349 F.3d 257 (6th Cir. 2003)

Madison v. Riter, 2003 U.S. App. LEXIS 24629 (4th Cir. 2003)

Mayweathers v. Newland, 314 F.3d 1062 (9th Cir. 2002)

Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act, 42 U.S.C. Section 2000cc et. seq.

See also City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)

RELIGIOUS LIBERTY UNDER EIGHTEENTH-CENTURY STATE CONSTITUTIONS

The religion clauses of the eighteenth-century state constitutions reveal a ferment of activity lying barely beneath the surface of the U.S. Constitution's First Amendment. Although most of these constitutions progressed far along the path toward disestablishment, some still enshrined protections for the Protestant religion, allowed taxes to be levied in support of clergy, or imposed religious tests upon those assuming office. At the same time, many included provisions ensuring the equality of free exercise and requiring that individuals' privileges and immunities not be enlarged or contracted on the basis of religion. During the dormancy of the First Amendment's free exercise and establishment clauses, which were not substantially litigated until the nineteenth century, and not applied to the states until the twentieth century, the state constitutions thus supplied a basis for claims of religious equality and the freedom of religious practice while only gradually leading toward the separation of church and state.

Disestablishment and Separation

Despite Thomas Jefferson's renowned reference to the First Amendment as "building a wall of separation between church and state" (Letter to the Danbury Baptist Association), legal historians have emphasized that the state constitutions ratified around the time of the founding effected a measured disestablishment rather than a complete separation. Indeed, according to Philip Hamburger's Separation of Church and State, the twentieth-century focus on separation distorted the nature of eighteenth-century religious liberty debates, in which separation "first appeared ... not as a demand but as an accusation." The employment of one metaphor rather than the other may not be determinative; Kent Greenawalt contends, for instance, that Hamburger overemphasized the difference between disestablishment and separation, and, likewise, maintains that each idea is sufficiently broad in its historical development to encompass the vast majority of the concepts that the other comprehends.

At the same time, however, the notion of disestablishment better suits the nature of the trajectories from colonial contexts to state constitutions. Rhode Island's refusal of an official state religion under the influence of founder Roger Williams, who maintained that the purity of the true church would be tainted through association with civil government, remained the exception rather than the rule. In several states, inhabitants were obliged to support religious ministers, although usually of their own denomination, even after ratification of the U.S. Constitution, and some constitutions required office holders to take oaths attesting to specific religious beliefs. The Maryland Constitution of 1776, for example, allowed the legislature to levy "a general and equal tax for the support of the Christian religion" but left "to each individual the power of appointing the payment over of the money, collected from him, to the support of any particular place or worship or minister" (Maryland Constitution, Article 33). Delaware abandoned its religious test for entry into office soon after the constitution was ratified; the 1792 constitution abolished an earlier requirement that members of either house of the legislature, as a condition of entering into office, swear or affirm that "I, A.B., do profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, and in the Holy Ghost, one God, blessed for evermore; and I do acknowledge the holy scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by divine inspiration" (Delaware Constitution of 1776, Article 22).

The expansion of religious liberty in South Carolina, described in detail by James Lowell Underwood's article “The Dawn of Religious Freedom in South Carolina,” furnishes a particularly apt example of the path away from establishment. While the seeds of freedom had been sown by the Carolina Charters and the Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina, composed in part by John Locke, it was not until the Constitution of 1790 that disestablishment was officially completed. During the colonial period, the Church of England, the favored denomination, received funds out of the public fisc; likewise, religious tests were, at various points, imposed upon candidates for office and even upon voters, and laws were enacted requiring Sunday worship. The Constitution of 1778 equalized the treatment of all Protestant sects, but refrained from entirely abandoning establishment (South Carolina Constitution of 1778, Article 38). Instead, it specified criteria by which any Protestant group commanding fifteen or more adherents could achieve official recognition and support, and it announced that “all denominations of Christian Protestants in this State, demeaning themselves peaceably and faithfully, shall enjoy equal religious and civil privileges” (South Carolina Constitution of 1778, Article 38). Under this schema, non-Protestants, including Catholics and Jews, remained marginalized. The Constitution of 1790, adopted shortly after the federal First Amendment, rectified the situation by eliminating the Protestant establishment (South Carolina Constitution of 1790). Even this constitution did not, however, result in the complete separation of the political sphere from the Christian church.

Statutory relics of establishment remained in several states into the nineteenth century. These included laws criminalizing blasphemy and prohibiting commerce on Sundays. Scattered judicial opinions also invoked the notion that Christianity remained part of the common law, but, as Stuart Banner has shown, this mantra lacked substantive underpinnings.

Free Exercise, Equal Protection, and Equal Privileges and Immunities

On the side of the individual believer, Locke’s seventeenth-century Letter Concerning Toleration had distinguished between the liberty of conscience he espoused and freedom of religious practice by depicting religious belief as “an inward persuasion of the Mind,” placed under the sole jurisdiction of sacred authority, in peaceful coexistence with the proper sphere of the civil magistrate. Although a few of the eighteenth-century state constitutions partially revisited this division by assuring the rather limited right of all to “worship ... God according to the dictates of their own consciences” (North Carolina Constitution of 1776, Article 19), most, including the 1776 Virginia Declaration of Rights and the Georgia Constitution of 1777, provided more expansively for religious practice through ensuring the free exercise of religion. Many likewise insisted that each person’s religious liberty should be equally protected and that no citizen’s civil rights or privileges and immunities should be enlarged or reduced on account of religion. According to one differentiation between the respective meanings of “equal protection” and equal civil rights or privileges and immunities in the eighteenth century, according to Hamburger, “equal protection of the laws was a lesser degree of equality—an equality only of the protection provided by civil law for natural liberty,” whereas “equal civil rights was a standard so rigorous it prevented civil laws from allocating either protection or privileges on the basis of religious differences.” Both degrees of equality were, however, available—with certain important limitations—under the state constitutions.

The Virginia Declaration of Rights announced that “all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience” (Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776, Article 16). Employing the rhetoric of equal protection, the Maryland Constitution insisted that, “as it is the duty of every man to worship God in such manner as he thinks most acceptable to him; all persons, professing the Christian religion, are equally entitled to protection in their religious liberty; wherefore no person ought by any law to be molested in his person or estate on account of his religious persuasion or profession, or for his religious practice....” (Maryland Constitution of 1776, Article 33). Focusing instead on civil rights and privileges and immunities, the Pennsylvania Constitution forbade “any man, who acknowledges the being of a God” from being “deprived or abridged of any civil right as a citizen, on account of his religious sentiments or peculiar mode of religious worship” (Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, Declaration of Rights, Article 2); the New Jersey Constitution likewise stated that “no Protestant inhabitant of this Colony shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right, merely on account of his religious principles, [and all members of Protestant sects] shall fully and freely enjoy every privilege and immunity, enjoyed by their fellow subjects” (New Jersey Constitution of 1776, Article 19). New Jersey and Maryland were not alone in restricting their protection to all Protestants, or all Christians, rather than extending them to worshippers of all faiths. Such limitations were, indeed, far from infrequent.

Questions involving the equal protection of religious liberty were adjudicated less often than those concerning the privileges and immunities and civil rights of religious adherents. This latter issue arose most frequently in the context of assessing witnesses' qualifications to testify; under the common law, only Christians had been permitted to serve as sworn witnesses, but some judicial decisions under the state constitutions insisted that this requirement impermissibly reduced individuals' civil capacities on the basis of religion. A decision of the Virginia General Court, construing the 1776 Bill of Rights, which the first article of the Virginia Constitution of 1830 incorporated, explained that even an individual who refused to acknowledge a future state of rewards and punishments should be considered competent as a witness; to refuse to allow him to testify would diminish his civil capacity on the basis of religion (Perry v. Commonwealth [1846]).

Scholars have also debated whether the state constitutions' vision of religious equality was formal or substantive—that is, whether they deemed any unequal burden placed upon different religious denominations discriminatory or considered unequal only those laws specifically aimed at discouraging a particular religious practice. According to one interpretation, comprehensively articulated by Michael McConnell in his article, “The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion,” the state constitutions allowed religious adherents exemptions from general laws. These included not only religiously based exceptions to oath requirements for, among others, Quakers, Mennonites, and Jews, but also exemptions from military service and, in states with an established church, from religious assessments.

It was not, however, unheard of, for state courts to deem the legislature's promulgation of a religiously based exemption for one group a violation of the state constitutional provision for equality among religious denominations. A later Louisiana case, adjudicated under the 1868 Bill of Rights, which was adopted during reconstruction, provides a dramatic example of such reasoning. In City of Shreveport v. Levy (1874), the Louisiana Supreme Court invalidated a Sunday law providing an exemption for Saturday Sabbatarians, insisting that “[b]efore the constitution Jews and Gentiles are equal; by the law they must be treated alike, and the ordinance of a City Council which gives to one sect a privilege which it denies to another, violates both the constitution and the law, and is therefore null and void.”

The liberty of religious practice that the state constitutions protected was not, in any case, unlimited.

Rather, each placed certain restrictions on free exercise. The most common included prohibitions against infringing on the rights of others (Maryland Constitution of 1776, Article 33), disturbing the peace of the State (Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, part I, Article 2), or pursuing treason and sedition (North Carolina Constitution of 1776, Article 34). A few incorporated more expansive language, maintaining that freedom of conscience could not “excuse acts of licentiousness” (New York Constitution of 1777, Article 28). Contemporary controversy has focused on whether the notion of disturbing the state's peace was isomorphic with that of violating general laws, and therefore supports a formal rather than substantive interpretation of religious equality under the state constitutions. Whereas some commentators, including McConnell—and Justices of the Supreme Court—contend that the clauses referring to the state's peace “support[] the view that impositions on religious conscience may be enforced only if they serve the fundamental interests of the state,” others insist, and Justice Scalia did in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997), that they signify only that “religious exercise shall be permitted so long as it does not violate general laws governing conduct.” Several of the cases discussing these limitations, like Lindenmuller v. People (1861) in New York and Commonwealth v. Kneeland (1838) in Massachusetts, suggest that protecting the peace and the equal rights of others constituted something different than simply requiring that religious adherents follow the law, although what the “equal rights of others” consisted in remained subject to debate in the early republic.

BERNADETTE MEYLER

References and Further Reading

- Antieau, Chester James, Arthur T. Downey, and Edward C. Roberts. Freedom From Federal Establishment: Formation and Early History of the First Amendment Religion Clauses. Milwaukee: Bruce Publishing Co., 1963.
- Banner, Stuart, When Christianity Was Part of the Common Law, Law and History Review 16 (1998): 1:27–62.
- Borden, Morton, Jews, Turks, and Infidels. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1984.
- Esbeck, Carl, Dissent and Disestablishment: The Church-State Settlement in the Early American Republic, Brigham Young University Law Review 2004 (2004): 4:1385–592.
- Greenawalt, Kent, History as Ideology: Philip Hamburger's Separation of Church and State, California Law Review 93 (2005): 1: 367.
- Hall, Timothy, Separating Church and State: Roger Williams and Religious Liberty. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1998.

- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- , Equality and Diversity: The Eighteenth-Century Debate about Equal Protection and Equal Civil Rights, Supreme Court Review 1992 (1992): 295–393.
- , A Constitutional Right of Religious Exemption: An Historical Perspective, George Washington Law Review 60 (1992): 4:915–48.
- Hamilton, Marci A., Religious Institutions, the No-Harm Doctrine, and the Public Good, Brigham Young University Law Review 2004 (2004): 4:1099–216.
- Jefferson, Thomas. Letter to the Danbury Baptist Association (1802).
- King, Andrew J., Sunday Law in the Nineteenth Century, Albany Law Review 64 (2000): 2:675–772.
- Laycock, Douglas, The Many Meanings of Separation, University of Chicago Law Review 70 (2003): 2:1667.
- Levy, Leonard, ed. Blasphemy in Massachusetts: Freedom of Conscience and the Abner Kneeland Case. New York: Da Capo Press, 1973.
- Locke, John. A Letter Concerning Toleration. Trans. William Popple. Indianapolis: Hackett Press, 1983.
- McConnell, Michael W., Freedom from Persecution or Protection of the Rights of Conscience? A Critique of Justice Scalia's Historical Arguments in City of Boerne v. Flores, William and Mary Law Review 39 (1998): 3:819–48.
- , The Origins and Historical Understanding of Free Exercise of Religion, Harvard Law Review 103 (1990): 7:1409–517.
- Meyler, Bernadette, The Equal Protection of Free Exercise: Two Approaches and Their History, Boston College Law Review 47 (forthcoming 2006).
- Underwood, James Lowell, The Dawn of Religious Freedom in South Carolina: The Journey from Limited Tolerance to Constitutional Right, South Carolina Law Review 54 (2002): 1:111–80.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507, 550 (1997)
- City of Shreveport v. Levy*, 26 La. Ann. 671, 1874 WL 7860 (1874)
- Commonwealth v. Kneeland*, 37 Mass. (20 Pick.) 206, 220, 1838 WL 2655 (1838)
- Lindenmuller v. People*, 21 How. Pr. 156 (1861)
- Perry v. Commonwealth*, 44 Va. (3 Gratt.) 632, 1846 WL 2406 (Va. Gen. Ct. 1846)
- Delaware Constitution of 1776, Article 22
- Delaware Constitution of 1792, Article 1, sect. 2
- Fundamental Constitutions of Carolina (1669)
- Georgia Constitution of 1777, Article 66
- Maryland Constitution of 1776, Article 33
- Massachusetts Constitution of 1780, Part I, Article 2
- New Jersey Constitution of 1776, Article 19
- New York Constitution of 1777, Article 38
- North Carolina Constitution of 1776, Article 34
- Pennsylvania Constitution of 1776, Declaration of Rights, Article 2
- South Carolina Constitution of 1778, Article 38
- South Carolina Constitution of 1790
- Virginia Declaration of Rights of 1776, Article 16
- Virginia Constitution of 1830, Article 1

RELIGIOUS SYMBOLS ON PUBLIC PROPERTY

Disputes involving the display of religious symbols on public property are resolved under the establishment clause of the First Amendment: does the government's display of a religious symbol, like a crèche, constitute an establishment of religion? The justices of the U.S. Supreme Court have not settled upon any one standard for resolving these disputes, but rather have articulated and applied a variety of tests. Partly because of the unsettled nature of the legal doctrine, the results in these cases have been unpredictable.

In Lemon v. Kurtzman, a 1971 decision, the Court articulated a three-part test to determine whether a governmental action, such as a statute, violates the establishment clause. The Lemon test provided as follows: “First, the statute must have a secular legislative purpose; second, its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion; finally, the statute must not foster ‘an excessive government entanglement with religion.’” For approximately a decade, the Lemon test remained the standard for resolving establishment clause issues, but it has since been subject to severe criticisms. Regardless, the Court still occasionally applies this test and has never expressly or fully repudiated it. The uncertainty surrounding Lemon has provided the doctrinal context for the Court's decisions regarding religious symbols.

Religious Symbol Cases

The seminal religious-symbol case is Lynch v. Donnelly, decided in 1984. The city of Pawtucket, Rhode Island, constructed a Christmas display in a public park. The display was “essentially like those to be found in hundreds of towns or cities across the Nation—often on public grounds—during the Christmas season,” the Court explained. It consisted of “many of the figures and decorations traditionally associated with Christmas, including, among other things, a Santa Claus house, reindeer pulling Santa's sleigh, candy-striped poles, a Christmas tree, carolers, cutout figures representing such characters as a clown, an elephant, and a teddy bear, hundreds of colored lights, a large banner [reading] ‘SEASONS GREETINGS,’ and the crèche.” The Court focused solely on whether the governmental display of the crèche violated the establishment clause.

The Court's opinion in Lynch revealed the justices' ambivalence regarding the appropriate doctrine for adjudicating an establishment clause issue. The Court began with a review of American history showing that government and religion have often been entwined despite the establishment clause: "There is an unbroken history of official acknowledgment by all three branches of government of the role of religion in American life from at least 1789." The Court, however, did not rely solely on that history to uphold the governmental action. Instead, the Court presented the Lemon test, noting that it has often been "useful" in establishment clause cases. "But," the Court added, "we have repeatedly emphasized our unwillingness to be confined to any single test or criterion in this sensitive area."

The Court then applied the Lemon test to the facts. Yet, when applying the first Lemon prong, the purpose prong, the Court again stressed history. In reasoning that the display of the crèche had a secular purpose, the Court cast Christmas as a historical event rather than a Christian holiday: "[Pawtucket], like the Congresses and Presidents ... has principally taken note of a significant historical religious event long celebrated in the Western World. The crèche in the display depicts the historical origins of this traditional event long recognized as a National Holiday." Then, in analyzing the second prong—whether the primary effect of the crèche was to advance religion—the Court yet again adverted to history. If the governmental display of the crèche were to fail the effects prong, the Court reasoned, then many other traditional forms of governmental support for religion would have to be deemed unconstitutional. Finally, the Court concluded that the display of the crèche did not amount to excessive governmental entanglement with religion, the third prong of Lemon. Administrative entanglement did not exist because governmental officials were not involved in religious affairs. Moreover, the crèche display did not generate political divisiveness among the Pawtucket citizens, the Court explained, because nobody had previously complained about the display, even though it had been erected for forty years. Of course, despite the Court's reasoning, non-Christian religious outsiders might have previously remained silent not because they happily accepted the Christmas display but because they feared the reprisals that might follow from protest. In fact, when the Lynch lawsuit was initiated, many Pawtucket citizens and officials reacted angrily. The mayor denounced the suit as "a petty attack aimed at taking Christ out of Christmas," and the Pawtucket Evening Times labeled the suit "absurd." The Court, in any event, held that the governmental display of the crèche satisfied all three prongs of the Lemon test and therefore was constitutional.

Because of dissatisfaction with Lemon, Justice O'Connor wrote a concurrence in Lynch that recommended the adoption of an alternative approach: an endorsement test. O'Connor's new test had two prongs: first, does the state action create excessive governmental entanglement with religion, and second, does the state action amount to governmental endorsement or disapproval of religion. The endorsement test can be read in at least two different ways. Under one reading, the endorsement test merely reformulates the Lemon test. Under a second reading, the endorsement test stresses that the establishment clause should protect an individual's connection to or standing within the political community. At least as applied by O'Connor, however, the endorsement test tends to produce the same results as Lemon. For instance, in Lynch, O'Connor, concurring in the majority's conclusion, reasoned that the crèche "cannot fairly be understood to convey a message of government endorsement of religion."

Over the next several years, the Court continued to apply the Lemon test to resolve most establishment clause issues, but simultaneously, the endorsement test gathered greater support among the justices. In County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union, decided in 1989, the constitutional question of governmental displays of religious symbols once again was explicitly raised. Two separate displays were challenged. The first was a crèche that stood alone on a staircase in a county courthouse. The second was a Jewish Chanukah menorah placed with a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty just outside a governmental building. A majority of justices was unable to agree on any one test for determining the constitutionality of these displays. The Court's opinion articulated both the Lemon and the endorsement tests while suggesting that the latter refined the former. Yet, a plurality opinion in the same case not only fully accepted the endorsement test but also argued that a majority of justices previously had accepted it, though never in one majority opinion. Finally, Justice Kennedy, concurring and dissenting, advocated that the Court adopt yet a different approach to establishment clause issues. Kennedy's so-called coercion test had two parts: "[G]overnment may not coerce anyone to support or participate in any religion or its exercise; and it may not, in the guise of avoiding hostility or callous indifference, give direct benefits to religion in such a degree that it in fact 'establishes a [state] religion or religious faith, or tends to do so.'"

Allegheny County suggested that the constitutionality of governmental displays of religious symbols would be determined in an ad hoc fashion, with the result depending upon the specific facts of each case. The Court held that the display of the crèche was unconstitutional because it stood alone, unlike the crèche in Lynch which had been part of a larger “Christmas display.” Since the Allegheny County crèche stood apart, “nothing in the context of the display detracts from the crèche’s religious message.” Using similar reasoning, the Court then held that the display of the menorah was constitutional because it was accompanied by a Christmas tree and a sign saluting liberty. The religious message of the menorah, the Court reasoned, was dissipated since the menorah stood within the larger holiday display.

Special Situations

Two special situations bear mentioning. First, the Court has acquiesced when nongovernmental actors place religious symbols on governmental property. In Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette (1995), the Court held that a private actor, the Ku Klux Klan, could constitutionally display a large Latin (Christian) cross on public property. Second, the Court has been especially wary of any religious activities or symbols in public elementary and secondary schools. In Stone v. Graham (1980), the Court considered the constitutionality of a state statute that required the biblical Ten Commandments to be posted on public classroom walls. The Court applied the Lemon test. But whereas the Lynch Court insisted that a governmental action failed the purpose prong of Lemon only if the government was “motivated wholly by religious considerations,” the Stone Court reasoned otherwise. The legislature in Stone had explicitly articulated a secular purpose for the Ten-Commandments statute, yet the Court nonetheless held the statute unconstitutional. The government’s purpose, the Court reasoned, was predominantly to promote religion despite any possible secular justifications.

STEPHEN M. FELDMAN

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law & Business, 2002.
- Feldman, Stephen M. Please Don’t Wish Me a Merry Christmas: A Critical History of the Separation of Church and State. New York: New York University Press, 1997.
- Sullivan, Winnifred Fallers. Paying the Words Extra: Religious Discourse in the Supreme Court of the United States. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1994.
- Swanson, Wayne R. The Christ Child Goes to Court. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
- Karst, Kenneth. The First Amendment, the Politics of Religion and the Symbols of Government, Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 27 (1992): 503–30.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Capitol Square Review and Advisory Board v. Pinette*, 515 U.S. 753 (1995)
- County of Allegheny v. American Civil Liberties Union*, 492 U.S. 573 (1989)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Lynch v. Donnelly*, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
- Stone v. Graham*, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)

RELIGIOUS TESTS FOR OFFICE-HOLDING (ARTICLE 6, CL. 3)

Article VI, Clause 3, of the U.S. Constitution says that “no religious Test shall ever be required as a Qualification to any Office or public Trust under the United States.” At the Constitutional Convention of 1787, this provision, proposed by Charles Pinckney of South Carolina, had been overwhelmingly approved. Only North Carolina voted no, and the Maryland delegation was divided. Only one delegate, Roger Sherman of Connecticut, objected to it, not because he favored religious tests but because he thought “it unnecessary, the prevailing liberality being a sufficient security against such tests.” In retrospect, Sherman’s assessment of the situation seems too optimistic, for religious tests were then used by most of the states, and the Article VI ban on their use by the federal government turned out to be one of the more controversial provisions in the new Constitution.

Religious tests for holding office had long been part of the Anglo-American tradition. In England they had been used to support the established Anglican Church by prohibiting non-Anglicans from holding office. In American, even after gaining their independence from England, eleven of the thirteen states prescribed such tests. Seven states required most public officials to be Protestants. Three required them to be Christians. Only New York and Virginia had no religious test for holding public office. Catholics and atheists were prohibited from holding office for the same reasons that John Locke had given a century earlier in his “A Letter Concerning Toleration.” The loyalty of Catholics to the American polity was in doubt because they were committed to obeying the Pope, the head of a foreign state. Atheists were suspect because, not believing in God, they had no incentive, it was thought, to keep their word or live virtuous lives. Although during the 1780s some religious groups—Quakers, Moravians, Baptists, Jews, and Catholics—protested religious tests as violations of liberty of conscience, their complaints usually fell on deaf ears.

Given the longstanding and widespread use of religious tests in America, the ban on them in Article VI of the Constitution was historically unprecedented and truly radical. Not surprisingly, several Anti-Federalist opponents of the Constitution, and even some Federalist defenders, condemned the ban on the grounds that it would allow Catholics, Jews, Muslims, pagans, and/or atheists to hold office. Although the objectors, for the most part, were not political leaders, their objections were expressed so often and widely that a number of leading Federalists, including Oliver Ellsworth of Connecticut, Isaac Backus of Massachusetts, Edmund Randolph of Virginia, and James Iredell of North Carolina, defended the test ban, either in published writings or speeches at state conventions convened to ratify the Constitution. They gave both principled and practical reasons for the ban. The main principle that they emphasized was religious equality. Iredell, for example, said, "This article is calculated to secure universal religious liberty, by putting all sects on a level." Backus emphasized that the ban would prevent any one religion from being established at the national level. Randolph agreed that it "puts all sects on the same footing." The defenders of the ban also argued that as a practical matter a religious test could not prevent a wicked person from holding office, because he would not hesitate to affirm falsely any required religious belief, and, on the other hand, that it would often serve to prevent persons of ability and character from holding office.

In short, the presence of the religious test ban in Article VI engendered a vigorous and thoughtful debate over the meaning of religious liberty, but the debate was decisively won by those who favored the ban. The Constitution, including the ban, was ratified. Although a number of the ratifying conventions proposed amendments to the Constitution, none of them proposed that the ban be removed. After the debate, moreover, between 1789 and 1793, four states abandoned their religious tests for office-holding, and one modified its test to exclude only atheists. By 1798, of the then fifteen states only seven required such tests, and early in the nineteenth century most of them dropped or failed to enforce the tests. Not surprisingly, therefore, a few years after the Constitution was ratified, Mercy Warren, a leading Anti-Federalist, wrote that Americans generally favored "liberty of conscience without religious tests."

In spite of the emerging consensus against religious tests, one issue remained unresolved—whether the Article VI ban was meant to prohibit belief in God as a condition for holding office. Those scholars who believe that early Americans understood religious liberty to mean only no establishment or preference of one religion over others emphasize that the ban in Article VI is immediately preceded by a clause that says that all government officials "shall be bound by Oath or Affirmation, to support this Constitution...." Moreover, as James Iredell, a defender of the test ban, explained, an oath was universally understood at that time as a "solemn appeal to the Supreme Being, for the truth of what is said, by a person who believes in the existence of a Supreme Being and in a future state of rewards and punishments...." Affirmations were also considered to be religious in nature, for they were authorized to accommodate not atheists but Quakers, Moravians, and Mennonites who believed that the Bible forbids "swearing," but not "affirming," before God. In short, as James Madison admitted, a religious test is implicitly involved in an oath. For this reason, the South Carolina Ratifying Convention proposed, albeit unsuccessfully, that Article VI should be amended to read "no other religious test shall ever be required..."

Even if the Article VI ban on religious test was not intended to eliminate laws requiring belief in God as a condition for holding office in the federal government, in 1961 in Torcaso v. Watkins the Supreme Court held that such laws violated the freedom of religion guaranteed by the First Amendment.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Bradley, Gerard V., The No Religious Test Clause and the Constitution of Religious Liberty: A Machine That Has Gone of Itself, Case Western Reserve Law Review 37 (1987): 674–747.
- Dreisbach, Daniel, The Constitution's Forgotten Religion Clauses: Reflections on the Article VI Religious Test Ban, Journal of Church and State 38 (Spring 1996): 261–95.
- Kramnick, Isaac, and R. Laurence Moore. The Godless Constitution: The Case Against Religious Correctness. New York: W.W. Norton, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961)

See also Baptists in Early America; Non-preferentialism; Quakers and Religious Liberty; Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in; Religious Liberty under Eighteenth-Century State Constitutions

REMOVAL TO FEDERAL COURT

"Removal" is a federal statutory procedure that allows the defendant to transfer a case from state court to federal district court against the plaintiff's wishes, even if she is a civil rights claimant who prefers to remain in state court. Certain specialized kinds of cases cannot be removed (28 U.S.C., Section 1445); nor is removal available if jurisdiction is based solely on diversity of citizenship and at least one defendant is a citizen of the forum state (Section 1441[b]). The defendant (or all co-defendants) in any other state civil action “of which the district courts of the United States have original jurisdiction” can, within thirty days of receiving the complaint, file a “notice of removal” with the federal district court embracing the place where the action was filed (Section 1441[a]). The notice automatically effects removal and deprives the state court of jurisdiction over the case. The plaintiff can move to “remand” to state court under Section 1447(c) if the notice of removal was untimely (Section 1446) or if the case lies beyond the district court’s jurisdiction. Federal officials sued or prosecuted in state court for acts committed under color of office are also allowed to remove (Section 1442); otherwise, the presence of federal defenses to state law claims or prosecutions is insufficient for removal. Finally, defendants sued or prosecuted in state court without being able to enforce their rights under federal laws providing for racial equality can remove, as can those who are sued or prosecuted in state court for enforcing or following such laws (Section 1443).

LOUIS E. WOLCHER

References and Further Reading

- Fallon, Richard H., Daniel J. Meltzer, and David Shapiro. Hart and Wechsler’s The Federal Courts and the Federal System. 5th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2003.
- Irmas, Sydney, and Erwin Chemerinsky. Federal Jurisdiction. 4th ed. Boulder, CO: Aspen Publishing, 2003.
- Wright, Charles A., and Mary Kay Kane. Law of Federal Courts. 6th ed. St. Paul, MN: West Group, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

28 U.S.C. Sections 1441, 1442, 1443, 1445, 1446, 1447.

See also Due Process; Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts; State Courts

RENO v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997)

In Reno v. ACLU, the Supreme Court struck down two provisions of the 1996 Communication Decency Act (CDA) as violating the First Amendment. The CDA, which was intended to protect children from exposure to harmful material on the Internet, made it a crime punishable by up to two years in prison per offense to knowingly transmit “obscene or indecent” messages to anyone under eighteen years old or to display “patently offensive” materials that depict or describe “sexual or excretory activities or organs” in a manner that is accessible to anyone under eighteen years old. The CDA exempted from prosecution those who took “good faith, reasonable, effective, and appropriate actions” to restrict minors’ access to prohibited communications and those who required proof of age before allowing access to those communications.

Two lawsuits challenging the constitutionality of the CDA were consolidated before a three-judge panel of the District Court for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania. The court granted the plaintiffs’ motion for a preliminary injunction against the law’s enforcement—except for those provisions prohibiting obscenity and child pornography. The court reasoned that the CDA violated the First Amendment because it was overbroad and violated the Fifth Amendment because it was vague. The government appealed the lower court’s decision directly to the Supreme Court as provided in the CDA’s review provisions.

The Supreme Court’s nine-to-zero decision, authored by Justice John Paul Stevens, affirmed the district court’s judgment on First Amendment grounds, but did not reach the Fifth Amendment question. The Court first distinguished the CDA’s regulation of the Internet from government regulation of other broadcast media. In contrast to the New York statute prohibiting the sale of obscene magazines to minors under seventeen years old that the Court upheld in Ginsberg v. New York (1968), the CDA swept too broadly. The CDA interfered with parental authority by restricting a parent’s ability to permit his or her child access to prohibited communications; was not limited to commercial transactions; was not restricted to prohibiting communications that were “utterly without redeeming social importance for minors;” and it applied to minors who were a year closer to the age of majority. In contrast to the Federal Communication Commission’s order sanctioning the radio broadcast of George Carlin’s “Filthy Words” monologue that the Court upheld in FCC v. Pacifica Foundation (1978), the CDA applied to a medium that had no history of limited First Amendment protection and imposed criminal sanctions, not civil ones. In contrast to the zoning ordinance restricting adult movie theatres in residential neighborhoods that the Court upheld in City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc. (1986), the CDA was not a “time, place, and manner” regulation because it applied to the entire Internet. Indeed, the Court concluded that those precedents “provide no basis for qualifying the level of First Amendment scrutiny that should be applied to [the internet].” Moreover, the Court held that the Internet was sufficiently different from traditional broadcast media that extensive government regulation was unwarranted—the Internet has never been subject to government supervision, as have other media; communications over the Internet must be solicited and so are not as invasive as are radio and television transmissions; and the Internet is not a scarce commodity as is the broadcast spectrum.

Having determined that Internet communications are deserving of full First Amendment protection, the Court explained that the two provisions of the CDA were unconstitutional because they were ambiguous and overbroad. The Court declined to consider the plaintiffs' Fifth Amendment challenge to the statute, but concluded that Congress's failure to define the terms "indecent" and "patently offensive" in the CDA raised First Amendment concerns. Indeed, the language of the CDA swept more broadly than the definition of obscenity that the Court adopted in Miller v. California (1973). The CDA required neither that patently offensive material be "specifically defined by the applicable state law" nor that indecent materials "lack serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." The Court found that the CDA's vagueness was problematic because ambiguous content-based restrictions have a chilling effect on constitutionally protected speech. The fact that the statute carried strict criminal penalties only increased that likelihood. The Court concluded that the "burden [the CDA places] on adult speech is unacceptable if less restrictive alternatives would be at least as effective in achieving the legitimate purpose that the statute was enacted to serve."

Even allowing that government has a legitimate interest in protecting children from harmful materials, the Court found that the CDA was not sufficiently narrowly tailored to that purpose. Given the size of the audience for messages and postings on the Internet, a sender of an indecent or offensive message could be charged with knowing that at least one minor is likely to view their communication. Moreover, since there is currently no technology to allow a sender to prevent minors from accessing communications or to accurately check the age of a message recipient, the only way a sender could be sure to evade the CDA would be to refrain from sending any messages that are arguably indecent or offensive—even to other adults. The Court was not convinced that Congress tried hard enough to find less restrictive alternatives to the "wholly unprecedented" coverage of the CDA.

The Court held that the CDA could not be saved by the fact that it left open alternative channels for communicating indecent or offensive messages, by the fact that the statutory language could be read narrowly by enforcers, or by the government's contention that the communications prohibited by the CDA would almost always be lacking in scientific, educational, or other redeeming social value. Moreover, the statute's exemption from prosecution for those who attempted to comply with its provisions did not reduce its scope sufficiently to redeem the otherwise unconstitutional law. Finally, the Court held that the CDA's severability clause could only be applied to save its prohibition of obscene speech on the Internet, not to the rest of the statute.

Justices O'Connor and Rehnquist concurred in the judgment and dissented in part. Those justices argued that the Court was right to strike down the CDA as applied to Internet communications between adults, but that the law should have been sustained to the extent that it prohibited indecent communications between an adult and one or more minors.

DENISE C. MORGAN

References and Further Reading

- Heins, Marjorie. Not in Front of the Children: "Indecency," Censorship, and the Innocence of Youth. New York: Hill and Wang, 2001.
- The Supreme Court 1996 Term*, Harvard Law Review 111 (1997): 1:329–39.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc.*, 475 U.S. 41 (1986)
- FCC v. Pacifica Foundation*, 438 U.S. 726 (1978)
- Ginsberg v. New York*, 390 U.S. 629 (1968)

RENO, JANET (1938–)

Janet Reno became the first female attorney general of the United States with her appointment to the post in 1993 by newly elected president William Clinton. Having attended Cornell for her undergraduate degree, she later earned a law degree at Harvard—one of sixteen women in a class of over five hundred students—and at the age of thirty-nine, in 1977, she became the first female state attorney of Florida.

Reno took office at the Department of Justice during the third week of vigil by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) at Waco, Texas. On April 17, 1993, Reno approved an FBI assault on the seventy-acre compound where cult messianic leader David Koresh (also known as Vernon Howell) had been barricaded with around one hundred followers by his side, including several children, for several weeks. When the attack took place on April 19, a fire of controversial origin broke out, and in the aftermath, only nine cult members, all adults, fled the inferno. The FBI later recovered seventy-five charred bodies, including twenty-five children.

Under FBI Director J. Edgar Hoover's tenure, the bureau had expressly forbid homosexual agents from being hired. While the ban was supposedly dropped in 1979, the institutional bias against gay men and lesbians continued to linger. The FBI policy for screening employees permitted homosexuality to be a determining factor in hiring, retaining, and promoting a federal agent. According to the policy, the bureau argued an agent's hidden homosexuality could invite blackmail, although they did not address the fact that had the Bureau allowed agents to openly acknowledge their homosexuality, they could not have been subjected to potential blackmail. In 1990, agent Frank Buttino, working in San Diego, sued the FBI for firing him. The bureau closed his security clearance when he lied when presented with a copy of a letter sent anonymously to his boss that he had written in response to an advertisement in a gay publication in 1988. His lawsuit expanded into a class action suit on behalf of all gay agents forced to deny or hide their homosexuality because of the bureau's practices. As the trial opened in December 1993, Reno announced the sexual orientation would not longer receive special scrutiny during FBI and Justice Department security checks.

In her first year at Justice, Reno spoke to a Senate Commerce Committee about pending bills to regulate violent programming on network television. Reno testified that the bills were constitutional, and she threatened networks with crackdowns if they did not begin to police themselves. She called television violence a central theme in young people's lives.

In 1996, the U.S. Congress passed the Telecommunications Act of 1996, Title V of which became known as the Communications Decency Act (CDA). Title V made it a federal crime to knowingly transmit by personal computer obscene or indecent communication to anyone under eighteen. Thus, it became a federal crime to send anyone under eighteen years of age any communication in context, in depiction, or in description which could be construed as "patently offensive" by community standards of sexual or excretory activities or organs. The American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) filed a suit citing the CDA as a violation of the First Amendment. In the 1997 case Janet Reno, Attorney General of the United States, et al. v. American Civil Liberties Union et al., major sections of the CDA were struck down in a seven-to-two decision by the U.S. Supreme Court. One justice likened the regulations imposed by the CDA to burning down a house in order to roast a pig. The Court ruled that government regulation of speech was more likely to interfere with the free exchange of ideas than encourage it and that, in a democracy, the interest of encouraging the freedom of expression must outweigh any unproven benefits of censorship. Later, the ACLU fought in court to declare the Child Online Protection Act (COPA) illegal. The law banned sending minors web material construed as "harmful to minors." COPA intended to replace the more broadly worded CDA which had been declared unconstitutional in 1998. While COPA did allow websites to distribute pornography, it required websites distributing material "harmful to minors" to verify the adult status of its users in an approved manner. The ACLU argued that COPA violated the free speech clause of the First Amendment.

Reno remained attorney general through President Bill Clinton's second term, stepping down in January 2001 when Republican George Bush assumed the presidency.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Anderson, Paul. Janet Reno: Doing the Right Thing. New York: J. Wiley, 1994.
Wright, Stuart, ed. Armageddon in Waco: Critical Perspectives on the Branch Davidian Conflict. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Janet Reno, Attorney General of the United States, et al. v. American Civil Liberties Union et al., 117 S. Ct. 2329 (1997)

See also American Civil Liberties Union; Reno v. ACLU, 521 U.S. 844 (1997); Strossen, Nadine

CITY OF RENTON v. PLAYTIME THEATRES, INC., 475 U.S. 41 (1986)

The City of Renton, Washington, using its zoning authority, prohibited adult motion picture theaters from locating within 1,000 feet of any residential zone, church, park, or school. When the ordinance was challenged by Playtime Theatres, the federal district court upheld the constitutionality of the ordinance, relying on Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc (1976) and on United States v. O'Brien (1968). The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the lower court based on a different interpretation of the four-part test in O'Brien. The appellate court concluded Renton improperly relied on studies of other cities to establish the secondary-effects of adult motion picture theaters and thus also failed to establish the substantial government interest required to justify the ordinance. Finally, Renton's interest appeared to be related to the suppression of protected activity.

The Supreme Court reversed the Court of Appeal by a vote of seven to two with Rehnquist writing the majority opinion, which Burger, White, Powell, Stevens, and O'Connor joined. Blackmun concurred in the result but did not write separately. Brennan's dissent was joined by Marshall.

"In our view," Rehnquist states, "the resolution of this case is largely dictated by our decision in Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc." As in this earlier case, the Renton ordinance was a content neutral time, place, and manner regulation that served a substantial government interest, preventing the secondary effects of adult motion picture theatres in the city's neighborhoods. The ordinance was not aimed at suppressing free expression but merely the location of the theatres and minimizing their secondary effects. Because the ordinance is content-neutral, only intermediate scrutiny rather than strict scrutiny is required. Moreover, because the ordinance is "narrowly tailored" to affect only specific categories of theaters "shown to produce the unwanted secondary effects," it avoids the flaw of other regulations that were found to be overbroad in Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim (1981) and Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville (1975).

As for the empirical determination of these effects, which would establish the government's interest in controlling them, Rehnquist declared that Renton's reliance on studies from other cities was appropriate. "The First Amendment does not require a city, before enacting such an ordinance, to conduct new studies ... so long as whatever evidence the city relies upon is reasonably believed to be relevant to the problem the city addresses." In 2002, O'Connor, writing for a plurality in City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc., specifically reaffirmed Rehnquist's view while deploying more generally the same analytical framework as Renton v. Playtime Theatres.

In his dissent, Brennan complained that the Court incorrectly analyzed this case. In particular, the Court sidestepped the issue that Renton's ordinance rests on the content of the expression being regulated by claiming it addresses only the secondary effects of particular kinds of theaters. While secondary effects may provide a compelling reason to regulate the establishments producing them, it does not follow that Renton's regulations are content neutral. For instance, the ordinance does not cover other forms of "adult entertainment," such as bars, massage parlors, or adult bookstores, which indicates Renton's ordinance is "under-inclusive," one of the problems the Court noted in Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville (1975), but also "cogent evidence" that the ordinance was aimed at the content of films in adult movie theaters.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: 4/21/2006, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Los Angeles v. Alameda Books, Inc.*, 535 U.S. 425 (2002)
- Erznoznik v. City of Jacksonville*, 422 U.S. 205 (1975)
- Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim*, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
- Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc.*, 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

REPORTER'S PRIVILEGE

The reporter's privilege, also known as the journalist shield privilege or the newspaperman's privilege, protects a member of the media from being forced to testify as to the identity of, or information provided by, a confidential source.

Absent a statute or rule to the contrary, a reporter—like any other subpoenaed person—has a legal duty to provide truthful and complete testimony before a court, grand jury, or other governmental entity, notwithstanding an agreement with a third-party to the contrary. In Branzburg v. Hayes (1972), a plurality of the Supreme Court held that the First Amendment does not protect a member of the media who has been subpoenaed, in good faith, by a grand jury. The fractured nature of the Branzburg opinion has led to uncertainty about the scope of First Amendment protection for reporters with respect to their confidential sources.

Some states have elected, as a matter of public policy, to create a qualified privilege to protect reporters from compelled disclosure as to the identity of, or information provided by, an informer. Statutes are typically limited to information that the reporter received in confidence in his or her professional capacity. Most statutes require disclosure when the information is necessary for a criminal defendant to present his or her case. States with a reporter's privilege include California and New York.

REPORTER'S PRIVILEGE

The reporter's privilege demonstrates the tension between the truth-seeking function of a court or other governmental body and the competing interests of protecting whistleblowers and enabling the media to investigate public and private wrongdoing.

LARRY CUNNINGHAM

References and Further Reading

- "Witnesses." In American Jurisprudence. Vol. 81, 2nd ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.
- Black's Law Dictionary*. 8th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004 (s.v. "privilege," "shield law").
- Eclavea, Romualdo P. "Privilege of Newsgatherer Against Disclosure of Confidential Sources or Information." In American Law Reports, 3rd ser. vol. 99, 37–114. St. Paul, MN Thomson/West, 1980.
- Marcus, Paul, The Reporter's Privilege: An Analysis of the Common Law, Branzburg v. Hayes, and Recent Statutory Developments, Arizona Law Review 25 (1984): 4:815–67.
- New York Consolidated Laws Service, Civil Rights Law*, vol. 40, section 79-h. Matthew Bender 2001 and 2005 supp.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

California Evidence Code, Section 1070

See also Free Press/Fair Trial; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period, (1917–Present); Media Access to Information; Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period; Subpoenas to Reporters

REPRODUCTIVE FREEDOM

Sterilization and Contraception

The Supreme Court's constitutional treatment of reproduction has addressed rights to have children as well as rights not to. State-sponsored involuntary sterilization in the early 1900s received constitutional approval in Buck v. Bell (1927), in which the Supreme Court sustained Virginia's sterilization of Carrie Buck who, like her mother and grandmother, had been officially deemed "feeble minded." Justice Holmes notoriously quipped in his opinion that "three generations of imbeciles are enough." In Skinner v. Oklahoma (1942), however, the Court invalidated involuntary sterilization of "habitual criminals" because the law arbitrarily exempted certain white-collar crimes. Without expressly overruling Buck, the Skinner Court recognized the "right to have offspring" as "a sensitive and important area of human rights," and described marriage and procreation as "basic civil rights of man."

Contraceptive devices have been legally available in most of the United States since the 1930s, and by the time the Supreme Court decided Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), Connecticut and Massachusetts were the only states with criminal bans on contraceptives. Connecticut prosecuted Planned Parenthood staff for providing contraceptives to married couples, and the defendants in Griswold successfully challenged the ban. The Court recognized a "right of privacy older than the bill of rights" protecting married couples' use of contraceptives. Griswold located the privacy right in various constitutional provisions, including the First, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Ninth Amendments, which it held created "zones of privacy" in their "penumbras, formed by emanations from those guarantees that help give them life and substance." In Eisenstadt v. Baird (1972), the Court extended contraceptive rights to unmarried persons, recasting the analysis in terms of women's fundamental autonomy rights: "If the right of privacy means anything, it is the right of the individual, married or single, to be free from unwarranted governmental intrusion into matters so fundamentally affecting a person as the decision whether to bear or beget a child."

The Key Abortion Cases: Roe, Webster, Casey, and Stenberg

The Supreme Court first recognized a fundamental constitutional right to an abortion in Roe v. Wade (1973). Justice Blackmun, writing for a seven-member majority, struck down an 1854 Texas law that prohibited abortion except when it was necessary to save the mother's life. In the companion case, Doe v. Bolton (1973), the same majority invalidated Georgia's abortion reform law, modeled on the American Law Institute's Model Penal Code, which provided exceptions for cases of rape or incest, serious fetal deformity, or to protect the mother's health or life. The Court held that a privacy right "founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty and restrictions upon state action ... is broad enough to encompass a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy." The Court noted the broad medical, philosophical and theological disagreement on the "difficult question of when life begins," and so declined to resolve it in any categorical manner. Laws prohibiting abortion infringe a woman's fundamental rights, the Court explained, in part because "[m]aternity, or additional offspring, may force upon the woman a distressful life and future. Psychological harm may be imminent. Mental and physical health may be taxed by child care. There is also the distress, for all concerned, associated with the unwanted child."

Roe's abortion right, however, was "not unqualified" and the Court held that it "must be considered against important state interests in regulations." As a pregnancy progresses, the Court held, two state interests become sufficiently compelling to justify narrowly drawn regulations: (1) protecting the life and health of the mother, and (2) protecting potential life. The Court explained the impact of those interests on the abortion right in terms of the medically current "trimester" framework. Under Roe, a State's interest in the woman's health and life could support regulation of abortion after the first trimester (approximately twelve weeks), and by the third trimester (starting at approximately twenty-four to twenty-eight weeks) a state could regulate to protect fetal life, provided that, if fetal and maternal interests conflict, the woman's freedom to choose to protect her own health and life remained paramount. The two dissenters in Roe would have left the issue to be resolved by state legislation, subject only to highly deferential judicial review.

Even though Roe recognized a fundamental constitutional right to abortion protected by strict constitutional scrutiny, the right has never been made fully effective for poor women. The Court in several cases, including Maher v. Roe (1977) and Harris v. McRae (1980), has consistently upheld governmental health care funding schemes that pay poor women's childbirth expenses while denying funding for even medically necessary abortions. The Court reasoned that it is women's own indigence, as opposed to limits on government funding, which makes abortion inaccessible to poor women. Critics of the funding decisions contend that abortion generally is less costly than childbirth, and that it is inconsistent with women's reproductive rights to use government funds with the purpose and effect of pressuring women where the Constitution ostensibly protects their freedom to decide.

Government remains free to use its resources to discourage the exercise of the abortion right first announced in Roe, yet generations of women have come to rely on that right as a cornerstone of our ability to plan and control the most important aspects of our lives, and to participate fully in public as well as family life. Roe has, however, been the subject of prolonged and heated debate, and has become a defining and polarizing issue in national politics.

Opponents criticize Roe as lacking adequate bases in the Constitution's text or history, as illegitimately displacing the legislative authority of the States, and even as countenancing murder. At their most extreme, antiabortion activists have hindered abortions through harassment, obstruction, and assault of providers and patients, and even bombings of abortion clinics and murders of abortion providers. Roe's supporters contend that the Court has uncontroversially protected many individual rights not spelled out in the Constitution, and that Roe followed logically from previous cases recognizing a right to privacy in reproductive autonomy. They also emphasize that reproductive choice is key to women's liberty and equality, and that such a basic right must not be left to the vagaries of majoritarian politics. Even supporters of abortion rights, however, have not been entirely uncritical of Roe, viewing it, for example, as overly solicitous of the judgments of medical doctors as opposed to pregnant women themselves, and faulting its failure adequately to ground the right in equality as well as autonomy, or for taking the wind out of the sails of a broad-based political mobilization in support of abortion rights that some claim would have made the right available to women across the country in due time.

As the abortion debate continued, the composition of the Court was changing. With three new justices on the Court, President Ronald Reagan's lawyers joined the State of Missouri in Webster v. Reproductive Health Services (1989), to urge the Supreme Court to overrule Roe. In a set of fractured opinions, the Court upheld Missouri's law declaring that life begins at conception, restricting public funding for abortions, and requiring viability testing. Four justices expressed their willingness to overturn Roe. Justice O'Connor provided the fifth vote, but read Missouri's restrictions narrowly so as to comport with Roe, and concluded that "there is no necessity to accept the state's invitation to reexamine the constitutional validity of Roe." The four dissenters noted that the abortion right remained intact "for today," but expressed "fear for the future," and warned that "the signs are evident and very ominous, and a chill wind blows."

By the early 1990s, with two new justices appointed by the first President Bush, commentators speculated that there might be a fifth vote to overturn Roe. In Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey (1992), the Bush administration urged the Court to overrule Roe. In an unusual move, however, three justices—O'Connor, Kennedy, and Souter—jointly authored an opinion (also joined by Justices Blackmun and Stevens) that reaffirmed Roe's pre-viability abortion right, albeit with a less stringent level of constitutional protection. The Court held that “the essential holding of Roe v. Wade should be retained and once again reaffirmed.” The majority emphasized the importance of stare decisis, declaring at the outset that “liberty finds no refuge in a jurisprudence of doubt,” and decrying the fact that “19 years after our holding [in Roe] that the Constitution protects a woman’s right to terminate her pregnancy in its early stages ... that definition of liberty is still questioned.”

While preserving Roe’s core, however, Casey reformulated and narrowed the abortion right. The plurality scrapped the trimester framework and no longer applied traditional fundamental-rights analysis. It instead focused on the viability line, and replaced strict scrutiny with an “undue burden” standard that gave states more leeway to regulate. A state regulation that “has the purpose or effect of placing a substantial obstacle in the path of a woman seeking an abortion of a nonviable fetus” would, under the Court’s definition, pose an undue burden. Justices Blackmun and Stevens, concurring in the judgment, would have reaffirmed Roe’s trimester framework and fundamental right approach.

The decrease in constitutional protection for abortion rights under the undue burden standard was immediately apparent. The Court under Roe had consistently invalidated mandatory waiting periods on the ground that they render abortions more costly and delay them for women who must arrange time off from school or work, who must travel, or who face harassment or opposition. It had also consistently struck down laws requiring that specific, abortion-discouraging information be provided as part of “informed consent.” Casey, however, upheld a biased counseling provision and a mandatory twenty-four-hour delay.

At the same time the Court in Casey, as it had under Roe, struck down a requirement that women notify their husbands prior to getting an abortion, even while it upheld a parental-consent requirement. The plurality noted that the vast majority of married women voluntarily tell their husbands when they become pregnant, but also acknowledged that domestic violence is widespread and is often triggered by news of an unplanned pregnancy, such that the subgroup of women affected by the notice requirement (that is, those who would not otherwise tell their husbands) is unduly burdened by it. The Court continued to recognize, as it had under Roe, that when spousal preferences conflict, women must be permitted to make their own choices about their bodies. The Court upheld the parental consent requirement, however, because the statute excepted cases of medical emergency, and provided for a “judicial bypass”—a procedure by which a court may authorize an abortion for a pregnant minor when it finds her mature enough to make the decision, or that an abortion would be in her best interests. The Court’s decision to sustain a requirement of parental involvement even while it invalidated a spousal-involvement provision recognized that states validly may reinforce parents’ authority over children, but may not “give a man dominion over his wife.”

Chief Justice Rehnquist, and Justices Scalia, White, and Thomas concurred in the judgment in Casey to the extent that it sustained the abortion regulations, and dissented from invalidation of the spousal notice rule. These four justices would have applied rational-basis review. They would have distinguished abortion from the constitutionally fundamental rights of marriage, procreation and contraception on the basis that abortion involves termination of a potential life.

The “undue burden” standard has been criticized as unclear. Indeed, while the majority saw itself as embracing Roe’s “essential holding,” Chief Justice Rehnquist characterized the plurality as having retained only “the outer shell” of Roe while “beat[ing] a wholesale retreat from the substance of that case.” Some Roe supporters agreed. The following decade yielded little Supreme Court guidance on Casey’s application, with President Clinton appointing two Justices to replace Justices Blackmun and White, and the Court deciding only one additional abortion case.

Stenberg v. Carhart (2000), invalidated Nebraska’s effort to criminalize an abortion method except where the procedure was necessary to save a woman’s life. The so-called “partial birth abortion” law barred “deliberately and intentionally delivering into the vagina a living unborn child, or a substantial portion thereof, for the purpose of performing a procedure that the person performing such procedure knows will kill the unborn child and does kill the unborn child.” As Justice Ginsburg saw it, Nebraska’s law, which neither protects women’s health nor saves any fetus from destruction, was enacted “because the State legislators wish to chip away at the private choice shielded in Roe v. Wade.” The Court struck it down for want of a health exception, which rendered it an undue burden on women’s reproductive rights. The Court also held that the law was unconstitutional because its prohibition was written so broadly that it would have prohibited abortions using the most common method of previability second-trimester abortions, used as early as twelve weeks of pregnancy, called the dilation and evacuation (D&E) method, in addition to a variation of the D&E sometimes referred to as intact D&E, or dilation and extraction (D&X).

Whereas Casey was a six-to-three decision, Stenberg was five to four, and the difference between the opinions of Justice O'Connor, concurring, and Justice Kennedy, dissenting, may illuminate the degree to which abortion rights jurisprudence stands to shift in light of Justice O'Connor's resignation. Justice O'Connor in Stenberg focused on women's right to a health exception and doctors' need for clear statutory guidance. Justice Kennedy, in contrast, rejected the lower courts' factual findings that intact D&E is sometimes necessary to protect a woman's health. Eschewing what he viewed as too neutral clinical language, Justice Kennedy took pains to describe in vivid detail both the D&E and intact D&E procedures, apparently viewing both procedures as morally reprehensible even if, in the case of D&E, constitutionally protected under the Court's precedents. The other three dissenting justices persisted in their conviction that Roe should be overruled and abortion regulation broadly permitted.

Current Law and Future Directions

The states have continued to enact abortion regulations, many of which are subject to constitutional challenge. Common types of laws impose mandatory delay and biased counseling laws, parental involvement requirements, record-keeping and reporting mandates, special medical procedure regulations, public funding restrictions, and bans (including a federal ban) on procedures, like that at issue in Stenberg. These various types of abortion restrictions have simultaneously discouraged doctors from providing abortions and intensified the burdens on women seeking them. Those burdens are especially acute for women who are young or poor, or who face domestic abuse. For many women, the need for repeated trips to clinics or hospitals that are fewer and farther between, and whose services are more costly and elaborate, delays and hampers abortions and may even make them unavailable as a practical matter. Some states have only one doctor willing to perform abortions. Meanwhile, bills in Congress propose to restrict underage women's ability to obtain abortions outside their home states.

Legal restrictions on reproductive choice reach beyond the abortion procedure itself. In many states, women have been criminally prosecuted for neglect or even manslaughter if they consumed alcohol or controlled substances while pregnant; South Carolina is, however, the only state whose high court has thus far upheld such a prosecution. The federal Unborn Victims of Violence Act treats crimes against pregnant women as crimes against two people—the woman and the fetus—thereby expressly conferring personhood on a fetus. Laws in several states now grant “conscience rights” to pharmacists and health care providers to refuse to facilitate abortions or even to fill prescriptions for contraceptives if they personally are opposed to such practices. Other states have responded by enacting laws to protect women's access to prescription medication notwithstanding the beliefs of individual personnel within the health care system.

Meanwhile, women have lobbied for state laws and brought federal sex discrimination lawsuits seeking “contraceptive equity,” that is, to require that health insurers cover prescription contraception (which thus far has only been developed for women) in otherwise comprehensive plans that typically pay for male-only medications such as Viagra. Medical development of emergency contraception, or “Plan B,” which a woman can take in the privacy of her own home, has the potential to facilitate reproductive choice for women. The Food and Drug Administration (FDA), however, under political pressure from the religious right, has denied approval for over-the-counter sales of emergency contraception. Another drug that has facilitated reproductive choice, the early-abortion pill, mifepristone, or RU-486, was approved by the FDA in 2000 for prescription use.

Accurate health education can help to make abortion less necessary by teaching teens about reproduction and birth control; such education has, however, been vigorously opposed by the religious right, leaving some states requiring uninformative, “abstinence only” programs. Social support for parenting also can make childbirth a tenable choice, even for women with unplanned pregnancies, by ameliorating the conflicts between women's autonomy and well-being and the demands of caring for children. Fathers' willingness to share equally in childrearing; government child-support enforcement, family leave entitlements, and parental tax benefits; employers offering flex-time, flex-place, and part-time jobs with benefits; and programs providing affordable childcare and extended-day school programs, all have potential to ease parenting burdens. Federal, state, and private sector support for such measures remains equivocal.

As of this writing, the second President Bush has appointed two additional justices, one of them replacing the moderately pro-choice Justice O'Connor, speculation about the fate of women's reproductive choice has again intensified. Most commentators agree that, whether the Court overrules Roe altogether or continues to cut it back incrementally, the Supreme Court will limit abortion rights increasingly in the years to come. One issue of fundamental importance will be whether the Court leaves reproductive rights up to Congress and to the states, under their own constitutions and laws, or whether, alternatively, the Court will announce a fundamental fetal right to life, which could foreclose recognition of abortion rights even by the states or the political process.

NINA PILLARD

References and Further Reading

- Balkin, Jack M., ed. What Roe Should Have Said. New York: New York University Press, 2005.
- Bradford, C. Steven, What Happens If Roe Is Overruled? Extraterritorial Regulation of Abortion by the States, Arizona Law Review 35 (1993): 87.
- Cherry, April L., Roe's Legacy: The Nonconsensual Medical Treatment of Pregnant Women and Implications for Citizenship, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 6 (2004): 723.
- Ely, John Hart, The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade, Yale Law Journal 82 (1973): 920.
- Ginsburg, Ruth Bader, Some Thoughts on Autonomy and Equality in Relation to Roe v. Wade, North Carolina Law Review 63 (1985): 375.
- McDonagh, Eileen, Breaking the Abortion Deadlock: From Choice to Consent. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.
- Noonan, John, Jr., The Root and Branch of Roe v. Wade, Nebraska Law Review 63 (1984): 668.
- Olsen, Frances, Unraveling Compromise, Harvard Law Review 103 (1989): 105.
- Siegel, Reva B., Reasoning from the Body: A Historical Perspective on Abortion Regulation and Questions of Equal Protection, Stanford Law Review 44 (1992): 261.
- Thompson, Judith Jarvis. "A Defense of Abortion." Philosophy and Public Affairs 1 (1971): 47.
- Tribe, Laurence H. Abortion: The Clash of Absolutes. New York: Norton, 1990.
- Williams, Joan C., and Shauna L. Shames, Mothers' Dreams: Abortion and the High Price of Motherhood, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 6 (2004): 818.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Buck v. Bell*, 274 U.S. 200 (1927)
- Doe v. Bolton*, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Maier v. Roe*, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
- Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Skinner v. Oklahoma*, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
- Webster v. Reproductive Health Services*, 452 U.S. 450 (1989)

See also Buck v. Bell, 274 U.S. 200 (1927); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479

(1965); Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Maier v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977); Privacy; Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942); Stenberg v. Carhart, 530 U.S. 914 (2000); Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

RESTRICTING ACTIONS OF LEGAL SERVICES LAWYERS

In 1974, Congress created the Legal Services Corporation (LSC) through the Legal Services Corporation Act. The LSC's purpose is to fund nonprofit organizations allowing them to serve indigent people in legal matters.

Since its creation, the LSC prevented grantees from providing certain legal services. These initial restrictions included the prohibition of legal assistance in fee-generating cases, criminal cases, certain abortion matters, desegregation of elementary or secondary schools, and proceedings involving violations of the Selective Service Act.

In 1996, Congress included new restrictions preventing LSC grantees from providing service to several populations. The 1996 prohibitions included class action lawsuits, attorney's fees collection, representation of certain immigrants, representation of incarcerated persons, representation of people evicted from public housing because of drug-related activity, and challenges to laws related to welfare reform.

The LSC would allow restricted services only if non-LSC funds were used and activities were conducted in separate facilities with separate leadership and separate staff using separate equipment.

LSC grantees challenged the 1996 restrictions on First Amendment grounds. In 2001, the U.S. Supreme Court affirmed a circuit court ruling that upheld most of the restrictions. A provision that precluded lawyers from challenging welfare laws during representation in a denial of benefits case was ruled as impermissible viewpoint discrimination.

In 2004, the U.S. District Court, Eastern District of New York, ordered a preliminary injunction preventing the LSC from requiring grantees using non-LSC funds to maintain separate offices for restricted activities. The injunction was granted because the separation requirement was an undue burden on free speech.

CHRISTOPHER HILL

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Velazquez v. Legal Services Corporation*, 164 F.3d 757 (2d Cir. 1998)

Velazquez v. Legal Services Corporation, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)

Velazquez v. Legal Services Corporation, 349 F.Supp. 2d 566 (E.D.N.Y. 2004)

Legal Services Corporation Act, 42 U.S.C., Section 2996 et seq.

Regulations Governing the Legal Services Corporation, 45 C.F.R. Part 1600 to 1644

Restrictions on LSC Grantees, 42 U.S.C., Section 2996f

See also Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

RESTRICTIVE COVENANTS

The term “covenant” has various meanings, but for purposes of this entry the term refers to a promise to do or not to do something with regard to real property. The covenant might at a later point be seen as infringing upon one’s constitutionally protected rights and liberties. A covenant requiring that a property be used only for residential purposes, for example, could be seen as a limitation on the religious freedom of somebody hoping to operate a church on the premises. A covenant prohibiting signage might seem an interference with freedom of speech and expression. In general, courts have been unreceptive to these arguments if the parties knowingly and willingly entered into the covenant or knew of the covenant when purchasing the property.

At present, only restrictive covenants barring the sale or rental of property to members of a given race routinely meet with judicial disapproval. After courts ruled in the late nineteenth century that the states could not by law prevent members of a race from living in one area or another, private racially restrictive covenants of this sort became the most common variety of real property covenant in America. African Americans were the most likely to be excluded as renters and buyers from certain neighborhoods and even whole towns, but in California and elsewhere covenants were also directed against Jews, Mexicans, Puerto Ricans, Hawaiians, Chinese, Japanese, and Filipinos. The Supreme Court found such covenants unconstitutional in Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), stating that the enforcement of such covenants by courts would be a denial of the equal protection of the law guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. Subsequent litigants argued that, even though courts could not enforce a covenant, private parties could sue one another for damages derived from breach of a restrictive covenant. The Supreme Court rejected this argument in Barrows v. Jackson (1953). Since then, restrictive covenants have ceased to be used, but their earlier use played a major role in keeping minorities out of certain communities and enabling those communities to remain entirely white.

RETAINED RIGHTS (NINTH AMENDMENT)

DAVID RAY PAPKE

References and Further Reading

Allen, Francis A., Remembering Shelley v. Kraemer, Washington University Law Quarterly 67 (1989): 709–35.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Barrows v. Jackson, 346 U.S. 249 (1953)

Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)

See also Buchanan v. Warley, 245 U.S. 60 (1917); Vinson Court

RETAINED RIGHTS (NINTH AMENDMENT)

The term “retained” rights appears once in the Constitution in the Ninth Amendment, which reads: “The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.” The historical evidence shows that the term referred to natural or inherent rights—what today might be called “human rights”—and that, in this context, natural rights were “liberty rights,” as opposed to positive claims on government. The Ninth Amendment mandates that these liberty rights not be disparaged or denied, thereby strongly suggesting they be treated in the same manner as those rights that were enumerated.

Retained Rights Equals Natural Rights

When explaining to the House of Representatives the nature of the various rights contained in the amendments he proposed be made to the text, Representative James Madison stated that “[i]n [some] instances, they specify rights which are retained when particular powers are given up to be exercised by the Legislature.” Madison’s notes for this part of his speech read: “Contents of Bill of Rhts.... 3. Natural rights retained as speach [sic].” For Madison, then, even some of the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights, such as the freedom of speech, were “retained” or natural rights. Additional evidence that the term “retained” rights referred to natural rights can be found in the deliberations of the select committee that the House of Representatives appointed to draft amendments to the Constitution. A draft bill of rights authored by Madison's fellow committee member Roger Sherman began as follows: "The people have certain natural rights which are retained by them when they enter into Society...." Understanding exactly why the Ninth Amendment was included in the Constitution will further help to establish what was meant by the natural rights "retained by the people."

Natural Rights Equals Liberty Rights

When Anti-Federalist opponents of the proposed constitution objected that it lacked a bill of rights, its Federalist defenders argued vociferously that any effort to enumerate rights would be dangerous because the rights of the people were literally boundless. James Wilson, a member of the constitutional convention and the first professor of law at the University of Pennsylvania, was an ardent adherent to natural rights. Nevertheless, when defending the Constitution against those who complained about the absence of a bill of rights, Wilson explained, "[T]here are very few who understand the whole of these rights." None of the classical natural rights theorists, he said, claim to provide "a complete enumeration of rights appertaining to the people as men and as citizens.... Enumerate all the rights of men! I am sure, sir, that no gentleman in the late Convention would have attempted such a thing." And before the Pennsylvania ratification convention, Wilson observed:

In all societies, there are many powers and rights, which cannot be particularly enumerated. A bill of rights annexed to a constitution is an enumeration of the powers reserved. If we attempt an enumeration, everything that is not enumerated is presumed to be given. The consequence is, that an imperfect enumeration would throw all implied power into the scale of the government; and the rights of the people would be rendered incomplete.

The same argument was made by Charles Pinckney in the South Carolina House of Representatives:

[W]e had no bill of rights inserted in our Constitution: for, as we might perhaps have omitted the enumeration of some of our rights, it might hereafter be said we had delegated to the general government a power to take away such of our rights as we had not enumerated.

Future Supreme Court Justice James Iredell told the North Carolina ratification convention: "Let any one make what collection or enumeration of rights he pleases, I will immediately mention twenty or thirty more rights not contained in it."

What conception of rights explains all these statements? The claim that natural rights are unenumerable and dangerous to enumerate makes complete sense if the terms "inherent rights" or "natural rights" are used as a kind of synonym for "liberties." The term "retained" rights itself supports the view that natural rights are liberty rights. For these are rights that people have against each other before they form a government; they are not the "positive" rights created by government. That "natural rights" was synonymous with "liberties" is exemplified in the official letter to Congress by the members of the Constitutional Convention who wrote that "[i]ndividuals entering into society must give up a share of liberty to preserve the rest.... It is at all times difficult to draw with precision the line between those rights which must be surrendered, and those which may be reserved." Others also used the terms interchangeably. In a speech to the Connecticut ratification convention, Oliver Wolcott observed: "What is government itself but a restraint upon the natural rights of the people? What constitution was ever devised that did not operate as a restraint on their original liberties?" (all emphases added).

Understanding natural rights as liberty rights explains their unbounded nature. For the founders, natural rights define a private domain within which persons may do as they please, provided their conduct does not encroach upon the rightful domain of others. As long as their actions remain within this domain, other persons—including government officials—should not interfere without a compelling justification. Because people have a right to do whatever they please within the boundaries defined by natural rights, the rights retained by the people are limited only by their imagination and could never be completely specified or enumerated.

To be clear, not all constitutional rights are liberty rights. Without question, the Constitution creates positive rights and imposes on the government enforceable duties to respect these rights. But the "rights ... retained by the people" to which the Ninth Amendment refers are liberty rights.

The Ninth Amendment's Protection of Retained Rights

When Anti-Federalists objected to the absence of a bill of rights, Federalists responded, not only that enumerating certain rights would be dangerous because the rights or liberties of the people were unenumerable and any rights that would be omitted would be rendered insecure, but also that a bill of rights was unnecessary because the Congress was had only limited powers. "Why, for instance," asked Hamilton, "should it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed?" Nevertheless, the Federalists were forced to promise a bill of rights to obtain enough support for ratification.

When James Madison sought to honor this commitment in the first Congress, he needed to solve the difficulty that Federalists had asserted just two years earlier. Here is how Madison stated the problem when he introduced his proposed amendments to the House:

It has been objected also against a bill of rights, that, by enumerating particular exceptions to the grant of power, it would disparage those rights which were not placed in that enumeration; and it might follow, by implication, that those rights which were not singled out, were intended to be assigned into the hands of the General Government, and were consequently insecure. This is one of the most plausible arguments I have ever heard urged against the admission of a bill of rights into this system; but I conceive, that it may be guarded against.

Madison then referred his colleagues to the portion of his proposal that read:

The exceptions here or elsewhere in the constitution, made in favor of particular rights, shall not be so construed as to diminish the just importance of other rights retained by the people, or as to enlarge the powers delegated by the constitution; but either as actual limitations of such powers, or as inserted merely for greater caution.

Madison's placement of this provision is revealing. He proposed putting it at the end of the list of specific individual rights which he proposed be inserted in Article 1, Section 9 immediately after the two individual rights already listed there—the rights of habeas corpus and the rights against bills of attainder and ex post facto laws—but before the other prohibitions of government power listed in Section 9 that are not easily conceived as individual rights, such as the prohibition on granting titles of nobility. This placement suggests that “retained” rights refers to the same sorts of individual liberty rights that were explicitly enumerated in the constitution and this injunction was on a par with the other provisions in that section.

The wording of the original proposal also conveys information about the nature of both enumerated and unenumerated rights. Due to his tendency to run parallel ideas together in a single sentence, Madison's original proposal is a bit difficult to follow. When disentangled, it shows that the rights enumerated in the Bill of Rights were of at least two kinds. First were those rights that provided additional or “actual limitations” on the delegated powers beyond those that already existed. For example, prior to its amendment, the Constitution did not require jury trials in civil cases. In his speech to the House, Madison categorized these actual limitations as “positive rights” and gave the example of trial by jury. Second were those rights that were enumerated “merely for greater caution.” As Madison explained, these refer to “those rights which are retained when particular powers are given up to be exercised by the Legislature.”

Therefore, from how Madison used the term “retained” rights, we know that the “other” unenumerated rights “retained by the people” mentioned in the Ninth Amendment fall into the second category of his original proposal. They are the natural rights “which are retained when particular powers are given up to be exercised by the Legislature.” A very few of these rights were included in the Bill of Rights “for greater caution” but most were left unenumerated.

Madison's speech to the House also clarifies that constitutional rights, whether enumerated or unenumerated, can limit both the ends of government and also the means by which the legitimate ends of government are executed. As Madison explained (in another sentence combining parallel ideas), “the great object in view is to limit and qualify the powers of Government, by excepting out of the grant of power those cases in which the Government ought not to act, or to act only in a particular mode.” Disentangling this passage, we find that ends constraints “limit ... the powers of Government” by specifying when “the Government ought not to act.” Means constraints “qualify the powers of Government” by specifying when “Government ought ... to act only in a particular mode.”

In addition to placing “actual” or additional limits on the means by which government can accomplish its legitimate ends, constitutional rights provide a “redundant” or cautionary safeguard in the event that delegated powers of government are given an overly expansive interpretation. Constitutional rights help hold government to its legitimate enumerated ends in two ways. Rights can prevent the adoption of an expansive interpretation of enumerated powers in the first instance. Failing this, once a power has been expansively interpreted, the direct judicial protection of enumerated and unenumerated rights hold government within some limits.

Madison's Use of the Ninth Amendment

Madison himself used the Ninth Amendment to check an expansive construction of necessary and proper clause during the debate over the constitutionality of the national bank. Near the end of his speech he observed: “The latitude of interpretation required by the bill is condemned by the rule furnished by the Constitution itself.” As one authority for this “rule” of interpretation, Madison cited the Ninth Amendment (then pending ratification as the Eleventh Amendment):

The explanatory amendments proposed by Congress themselves, at least, would be good authority with them; all these renunciations of power proceeded on a rule of construction, excluding the latitude now contended for.... He read several of the articles proposed, remarking particularly on the 11th [the Ninth Amendment] and 12th [the Tenth Amendment], the former, as guarding against a latitude of interpretation; the latter, as excluding every source or power not within the Constitution itself. (Emphasis added)

Thus, for Madison, the Ninth and Tenth Amendments each played distinct roles. The Tenth Amendment is authority for the claim that Congress could only exercise a delegated power. The exercise of a power not there, he said, “involves the guilt of usurpation.” In contrast, Madison viewed the Ninth Amendment as preventing providing a loose construction of these powers when legislation affected the rights retained by the people. Even “if the power were in the Constitution, the immediate exercise of it cannot be essential.”

Three years later, in 1794, Madison would again argue in Congress that the unenumerated rights retained by the people directly constrained congressional power. When Congress sought to censure the activities of certain self-created societies for their participation in the Whiskey Rebellion earlier that year, Madison contended that: “When the people have formed a Constitution, they retain those rights which they have not expressly delegated.” Here Madison was asserting that the unenumerated retained right to hold opinions constrained the power of Congress to issue a censure, in the same manner as “the liberty of speech, and of the press.” Indeed, “the censorial power is in the people over the Government, and not in the Government over the people.” Strong words on behalf of supporters of insurrection.

The uses of the Ninth Amendment by its author, James Madison, show that, like the few natural rights that were enumerated, the unenumerated rights retained by the people provide a twofold check on government power. Their existence argues against a latitudinarian interpretation of enumerated powers when those powers are used to restrict the liberties of the people; and the direct protection of the liberties of the people also reinforces limits on both the ends of government and the means by which these ends can legitimately be pursued.

The Equal Treatment of Retained Rights

The Ninth Amendment does not merely refer to these “retained” unenumerated natural rights and affirm their existence; it also mandates how they are to be treated: they are not to be “denied or disparaged.” On its face, this wording compels the conclusion that enumerated and unenumerated liberties are to be treated equally. To the degree that enumerated rights receive protection from Congress, so too should those that were left unenumerated. In contrast, today the Supreme Court employs a “presumption of constitutionality” toward all legislation except that which infringes upon some, but not all, of the enumerated rights and a few unenumerated rights the Court has deemed to be “fundamental.” Unless a fundamental liberty is violated, the benefit of the doubt goes to the government. This approach violates the Ninth Amendment’s mandate to equally protect of all liberties, whether enumerated or unenumerated.

It must be remembered that, like the rest of the Bill of Rights, the Ninth Amendment originally applied only to the federal government. For many reasons, including the existence of slavery, Congress and the federal courts were given only very limited powers in the Constitution to protect the liberties of citizens from infringement by their own state governments. The Fourteenth Amendment changed all this. In the privileges or immunities clause we find the jurisdiction of the federal government expanded to protect from infringement by states the very same natural liberty rights referred to in the Ninth Amendment as well as other positive rights created by the Constitution itself.

Both of these now ignored protections of retained rights could be implemented by adopting a presumption of liberty that would afford the benefit of the doubt to any rightful exercise of liberty by an individual and place the burden on the government to show its restriction is both necessary and proper. How such a doctrine might work is suggested by the Supreme Court’s decision in Lawrence v. Texas (2003), striking down a state statute criminalizing homosexual “sodomy” under the Fourteenth Amendment. Texas’s sole justification for its prohibition was that the conduct in question was “immoral.” The Court in Lawrence found this justification inadequate because the actions banned neither harmed others, nor took place in the public sphere where government must balance competing uses by different citizens. Justice Kennedy’s opinion in Lawrence is especially noteworthy because it protected liberty, rather than privacy, without any discussion of whether that liberty was “fundamental.” Having identified the conduct as “liberty,” it then placed the burden on the government to justify its restriction. Because, it was unable to do so, the statute was stricken and the retained rights of same-sex couples was protected.

RANDY E. BARNETT

References and Further Reading

- Barnett, Randy E., ed. The Rights Retained by the People: The History and Meaning of the Ninth Amendment. Fairfax, VA: George Mason University Press, 1989 (vol. 1), 1993 (vol. 2).
- . Restoring the Lost Constitution: The Presumption of Liberty. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2004.
- Massey, Calvin R. Silent Rights: The Ninth Amendment and the Constitution's Unenumerated Rights. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1995.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)

RETRIBUTION

Retribution—literally “pay back”—persists as punishment’s essential measure, justification, and limit. Naturally grateful, we reward those who bring us pleasure. Instinctively resentful, we punish those who cause us pain. Retributively, society intentionally inflicts pain and suffering on criminals because and to the extent they deserve it. But only to the extent they deserve it.

The basic retributive measure—like for like—“as he has done, so shall it be done to him” (Leviticus 24); “giving a person a taste of her own medicine”; “fighting fire with fire”—primally satisfies. Critics have commonly equated retribution with revenge—disparaging “an eye for an eye” as barbaric. But retribution is not simply revenge. Revenge may be limitless and misdirected at the undeserving, as with collective punishment. Retribution, however, must be limited and in its more mature measurement, proportional—no more (or less) than what’s deserved. The Biblical “eye for an eye,” originally understood as no more than an eye for an eye, exemplifies retribution as a restriction as much as justification of punishment.

Retributivists disagree among themselves about the calculus of desert. Immanuel Kant would count only the actor’s intent. Most retributivists, however, also factor in the actual harm willingly caused. Accordingly, all other things equal, murder is worse than attempted murder, and thus deserves greater punishment. In common, retributivists disregard punishment’s future costs or benefits, resting justice—limited, proportional punishment—exclusively on a criminal’s past moral culpability. Thus retributivists reject Hobbes’s classic utilitarian claim that “the aim of punishment is not revenge but terror.” They dismiss contemporary utilitarians who declare it “irrational” to cry over spilt blood, and rebut the challenge that certain punishments are pointless—“what good will it do to inflict more pain”—as itself beside the point. Justice, a moral imperative in itself, requires deserved punishment.

According to Kant’s classic retributivism, we impose punishment as an abstract duty without any emotion. By punishing, we dignify the transgressor, acknowledging the free will that produced the crime. The murderer must die, Kant insists, but “his death must be kept free from all maltreatment.” Kant rejects giving the condemned the option to submit to dangerous medical experiments on condition that his life be spared if he survived, insisting that we always treat human beings as ends in themselves, and never as a means to our ends. Following Kant’s lead, contemporary retributivists reject general deterrence as a sufficient justification for punishment—for then we would be making an example of a person, in order to change others’ future behavior.

More persistent and popular than Kant’s abstract retributivism, emotive/intuitive retributivism has deeper roots. “The voice of your brother’s blood cries out to me from the ground,” Genesis proclaims. In other words, “Blood pollutes the land.” Like the ancient Greeks and ancient Hebrews, contemporary emotive retributivists feel polluted if vicious murderers walk free, or fail to get their just deserts.

Retributivists’ urge to punish stems from a projected empathy with the victim’s suffering. “Our heart adopts and beats time to his grief,” declared Adam Smith in A Theory of Moral Sentiments (1759). “So is it likewise animated with that spirit ... to drive away and destroy the cause of it.” Retributive death penalty supporters, haunted by the victim’s suffering, cannot forget or forgive: “We feel that resentment which we imagine he ought to feel and which he would feel, if in his cold and lifeless body there remained any consciousness of what passes upon earth,” Smith explained in the first great work of modern retributive psychology. “His blood, we think, calls aloud for vengeance.”

Unlike Kantian retributivists, emotive retributivists insist that every moral question is ultimately an emotional one. The humane capacity to punish justly, this great moral faculty, requires us to apply our informed emotions, sympathy, pity, righteous indignation. Fitzjames Stephen, the nineteenth-century English judge and great historian of the criminal law detested heinous criminals and declared it “highly desirable” to design punishments “to give expression to that hatred.”

Embracing human dignity as their primary value, emotive retributivists like Adam Smith emphasize “a humanity that is more generous and comprehensive,” “oppos[ing] to the emotions of compassion which they feel for a particular person, a more enlarged compassion which they feel for mankind.” Thus, unwarranted “mercy to the guilty is cruelty to the innocent.”

While U.S. Supreme Court justices have personally rejected retribution, especially emotive retributivism as an affirmative justification for punishment, a majority has consistently acknowledged each state’s right to punish retributively. And often without labeling it, Justices have embraced retribution as the essential constitutional limit to punishment. Thus, U.S. Supreme Court majorities categorically outlawed the death penalty as “morally” disproportionate to “culpability” of rapists (of adult women) (Coker [1977]); getaway car drivers who had no intention or expectation that their robbery victims would be killed (Enmund [1982]) (Ford [1986]); mentally retarded killers (Atkins [2002]); all killers under eighteen (Roper [2005]).

Long scorned by the scholars but embraced by the people, retribution has made a twenty-first-century comeback. The proposed new Model Penal Code now explicitly incorporates retribution as punishment’s primary justification: “Under the new scheme, no utilitarian or restorative purpose of sentencing may justify a punishment more or less severe than that deserved by an offender in light of the gravity of the offense, the harm to the crime victim, and the blameworthiness of the offender” (emphasis added). Legislatures are to “consult their own moral judgment” and apply their own “intuitions of desert” to design punishments within “the retributive range.”

Ideally satisfying, popular and persistent, retribution fundamentally fails in the actual administration of punishment. Every department of corrections in the United States officially rejects retribution, declaring public safety and rehabilitation as their primary missions. Typically, prison guards proclaim that “what a man did out there is none of my business. How he acts inside determines how he’ll be treated here.” And while the more heinous crimes generally do carry longer prison sentences, in fact the most vicious criminals serving life sentences often have the best jobs, best hustles, and easiest lifestyles, while they prey on the younger, weaker, less vicious offenders. In short, largely unnoted even by retributivists themselves, inside prisons, daily life mocks retribution: Those who deserve it most suffer least. Thus, prison administration today across the United States largely severs the connection between crime and punishment on which retribution essentially rests.

ROBERT BLECKER

References and Further Reading

- Acker, James R., ed. America’s Experiment with Capital Punishment. Durham, NC: Carolina Academic Press, 2003.
- Beccaria, C. An Essay on Crimes and Punishments. Boston: [1769] 1992.
- Blecker, R., Haven or Hell? Inside Lorton Prison: Experiences of Punishment Justified, Stanford Law Review, 49 (1990): 1149.
- Hegel, G.F. Philosophy of Right. Trans. T.M. Knox. New York: Oxford University Press, 1967.
- Henberg, M. Retribution: Evil for Evil in Ethics, Law, and Literature. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1990.
- Kant, I. Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals. Trans. Paton. New York: 1964.
- . The Metaphysical Elements of Justice. Trans. J. Ladd. Indianapolis: 1965.
- Smith, Adam. The Theory of Moral Sentiments. New York: Oxford University Press.
- Mackie, J.L., Morality and the Retributive Emotions, Criminal Justice Ethics 1 (1982): 310.
- Pillsbury, Samuel H., Emotional Justice: Moralizing the Passions of Criminal Punishment, Cornell Law Review 74 (1989): 655.
- Stephen, Fitzjames, II. A History of the Criminal Law of England. 1883.
- Westermarck, E. Ethical Relativity. Paterson: [1932] 1960.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Atkins v. Virginia*, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
- Coker v. Georgia*, 433 U.S. 584 (1977)
- Enmund v. Florida*, 458 U.S. 782 (1982)
- Ford v. Wainwright*, 477 U.S. 399 (1986)
- Roper v. Simmons*, 543 U.S. 551 (2005)

REYNOLDS v. UNITED STATES, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)

Reynolds v. United States (1878) was a test case put forward by the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (the Mormons) in an attempt to prove that the Morrill Act of 1862 was a violation of the First Amendment’s guarantee of the free exercise of religion. It was the first of a series of cases in which the U.S. Supreme Court rejected the Mormons’ First Amendment claims. The Morrill Act, which made the Mormons’ religiously based polygamy a crime throughout the United States and the Territories, was the first in a series of laws enacted by Congress attacking the Mormon’s practice of polygamy.

These laws were enacted, and these cases tried, in an atmosphere of anti-Mormon hysteria that gripped the nation from the time that Brigham Young, who as successor to founder Joseph Smith, had led the Mormons to what is now Utah, publicly announced the church’s advocacy of polygamy in 1852 to at least 1890 when the church ostensibly banned the practice.

The cases suggest that the Court was also in the grip of this hysteria.

The plaintiff, Reynolds, the private secretary of Brigham Young, pleaded not guilty to polygamy. In the subsequent trial, obviously polygamous jurors were struck for cause, and jurors with fairly obvious antipolygamous opinions were allowed to remain on the jury. The judge's jury instructions bear repetition:

I think it not improper, in the discharge of your duties in this case, that you should consider what are to be the consequences to the innocent victims of this delusion. As this contest goes on, they multiply, and there are pure-minded women and there are innocent children, innocent in a sense even beyond the degree of the innocence of childhood itself. These are to be the sufferers; and as the jurors fail to do their duty, and as these cases come up in the Territory, just so do these victims multiply and spread themselves over the land.

Following these instructions, a jury verdict of guilty was inevitable, and Reynolds was sentenced to two years of hard labor and a $500 fine. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court, rejecting a variety of procedural appeals, concluded that Reynolds had been tried by an impartial jury.

In its examination of Reynolds's free exercise clause argument, the Court first noted that "religion" had not been defined in the Constitution, suggesting that the Mormon practice of polygamy might not enjoy free exercise clause protection because Mormonism was not a religion. But the Court did not pursue this line of argument.

The Court instead focused on free exercise as the right to believe in any religion as opposed to the right to act in any way as part of the practice of religion. The Court found the origin of this "thought-action dichotomy" in Thomas Jefferson's 1784 Virginia "Bill for Establishing Religious Freedom," which later was embodied in the First Amendment. Thus, the Court reasoned, "Congress was deprived of all legislative power over mere opinion, but was left free to reach actions which were in violation of social duties or subversive of good order."

The Court noted that polygamy had always been a crime, punishable by death, in England and that Virginia, after passage of the above-mentioned Religious Freedom Act, adopted the English statute making it a capital felony.

The Court next applied the "slippery slope" argument, outlining the horrors that would result if the exercise of religiously based polygamy were allowed. Human sacrifice and Suttee, the Hindu practice, banned by the British in colonial India, of a widow throwing herself upon the burning funeral pyre of her dead husband, were cited.

Perhaps the Court's biases are further exposed by the statement that "[p]olygamy has always been odious among the northern and western nations of Europe," but was "exclusively a feature of the life of Asiatic and of African people."

Of small solace to Reynolds and the Mormons, reacting to a petition for rehearing, the Court concluded that Reynolds's imprisonment should not be "at hard labor" because the Morrill Act called for imprisonment only.

KEITH E. SEALING

References and Further Reading

- Sealing, Keith, Polygamists Out of the Closet: Statutory and State Constitutional Prohibitions against Polygamy Are Unconstitutional under the Free Exercise Clause, Georgia State University Law Review 17 (2001): 691.
- Ostling, Richard, and Joan Ostling. Mormon America: The Power and the Promise. San Francisco: HarperSan Francisco, 1999.
- Van Wagoner, Richard. Mormon Polygamy: A History. 2nd ed. Salt Lake City, Utah: Signature Books, 1989.

RHODE ISLAND v. INNIS, 446 U.S. 291 (1980)

Innis clarified "interrogation" under Miranda v. Arizona (1966), which required police to apprise a suspect of the Fifth Amendment right to silence during custodial interrogation. Police officers arrested Innis for the murder of a taxi driver. They repeatedly read Innis his rights, and he requested an attorney. Two officers later conversed in Innis's presence about the missing murder weapon. One officer mentioned a school for disabled children in the area, stating "God forbid one of them might find a weapon with shells and ... hurt themselves." This conversation continued until Innis disclosed the firearm's location. A conviction resulted from this evidence.

On appeal, Innis argued that introduction of his statements was error. Given that Miranda's custody component was met, the issue was whether the conversation constituted interrogation. The Supreme Court defined interrogation as "not only express questioning, but also ... any words or actions ... police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response...." Although this test is objective, the suspect's subjective susceptibilities are also relevant.

The Court (six to three) construed the police comments as offhand remarks that were not particularly evocative. Thus, they were not the "functional equivalent" of interrogation since a reasonable person would not have been moved to forgo the right of silence. Justices Marshall and Brennan dissented, agreeing with the formulation of the interrogation rule, but disagreeing that the conversation was not interrogation. Justice Stevens vociferously dissented, asserting that the interrogation definition should be far broader.

LOUIS N. SCHULZE, JR.

References and Further Reading

- Helderman, Alexander S., Revisiting Rhode Island v. Innis: Offering a New Interpretation of the Interrogation Test, Creighton Law Review 33 (2000): 729.
- Jenning, Janice L., Note: Conversation between Police Officers Eliciting Admission by Suspect Not a Miranda Interrogation Unless the Officers Should Have Known Their Words or Actions Were Reasonably Likely to Elicit and Incriminating Response, St. Mary's Law Journal 12 (1980): 544.
- Leo, Richard A., Questioning the Relevance of Miranda in the Twenty-First Century, Michigan Law Review 99 (2001): 1000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brewer v. Williams*, 430 U.S. 387 (1977).
- Massiah v. United States*, 377 U.S. 201 (1964).
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Marshall, Thurgood; Miranda Warning; Rights of the Accused; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background

RICE v. PALADIN PRESS ("HIT MAN" CASE), 940 F.SUPP. 836 (D.Md. 1996)

In Rice v. Paladin Enterprises, Inc., often called the "Hit Man case," the core of the plaintiffs' claim was that the publisher of a murder manual entitled Hit Man: A Technical Manual for Independent Contractors had aided and abetted murder when the instructions in that manual were used by a contract murderer as the blueprint for three murders. The plaintiffs claimed that the publisher had marketed the manual to attract and assist criminals, and that it knew and intended that the manual would be used, upon receipt, by real murderers to plan and execute killings.

The U.S. Court of Appeals Fourth Circuit held that a viable cause of action in tort for aiding and abetting murder existed against the publisher, and that if the allegations of the plaintiffs were true, the First Amendment did not insulate the publisher from liability. Following the Court of Appeals ruling, the publisher settled the case rather than go through a jury trial, agreeing to cease marketing the book, and paying the plaintiffs an undisclosed sum in money damages.

For the purposes of testing the First Amendment issue, the publisher had stipulated in a motion for summary judgment that it marketed the manual to attract and assist criminals, and that it knew and intended that the manual would be used, upon receipt, by real murderers to plan and execute killings. The murder manual was originally published in 1983, but the murders at issue did not take place until 1993. The alleged murderer apparently purchased the murder manual in 1992, several months before the killings. The Court of Appeals held that in these circumstances the First Amendment did preclude the imposition of liability.

In the course of its ruling, the court engaged in an extended discussion of the "incitement" standard set forth Brandenburg v. Ohio (1969) and whether that standard could or should be applied to the fact pattern presented, engaging in a close examination of the alleged role that the murder manual played in the killings. On the night of March 3, 1993, readied by the instructions in Hit Man and steeled by its "seductive adjurations," the Court noted, the "hit man," James Perry, brutally murdered Mildred Horn, her eight-year-old quadriplegic son Trevor, and Trevor's nurse, Janice Saunders, by shooting Mildred Horn and Saunders through the eyes and by strangling Trevor Horn. Perry was a contract killer, a "hit man," hired by Mildred Horn's ex-husband, Lawrence Horn, to murder Horn's family so that Horn would receive the $2 million that his eight-year-old son had received in settlement for injuries that had previously left him paralyzed for life. At the time of the murders, this money was held in trust for the benefit of Trevor, and, under the terms of the trust instrument, the trust money was to be distributed tax-free to Lawrence in the event of Mildred's and Trevor's deaths. The court stated that in "soliciting, preparing for, and committing these murders, Perry meticulously followed countless of Hit Man's 130 pages of detailed factual instructions on how to murder and to become a professional killer."

Throughout the Hit Man litigation, both sides expended considerable energy over the motivations of the publisher. On one level, the publisher's motivation was simply to sell as many books as possible and make as much money as possible. The plaintiff's readily conceded this point, stipulating that in order to increase revenues, the murder manual was marketed to many readers who were not planning to use it to kill people. The plaintiffs argued, however, that one of the publisher's motivations was to market and sell the book to criminals and would-be criminals like James Perry who would indeed use it to commit murder, and that this was enough to defeat any First Amendment defense. The court agreed, observing that “every court that has addressed the issue, including this court, has held that the First Amendment does not necessarily pose a bar to liability for aiding and abetting a crime, even when such aiding and abetting takes the form of the spoken or written word.”

The Court thus accepted the argument of the plaintiffs that the Brandenburg requirement of “imminence” need not be satisfied in those instances in which the speaker provides substantial detailed assistance in the commission of a crime with the intent that the information will be used to commit the crime, holding that Paladin’s astonishing stipulations, coupled with the extraordinary comprehensiveness, detail, and clarity of Hit Man’s instructions for criminal activity and murder in particular, the boldness of its palpable exhortation to murder, the alarming power and effectiveness of its peculiar form of instruction, the notable absence from its text of the kind of ideas for the protection of which the First Amendment exists, and the book’s evident lack of any even arguably legitimate purpose beyond the promotion and teaching of murder, render this case unique in the law. In at least these circumstances, we are confident that the First Amendment does not erect the absolute bar to the imposition of civil liability for which Paladin Press and amici contend.

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

Smolla, Rodney. Deliberate Intent: A Lawyer Tells the True Story of Murder by the Book. New York: Crown Publishers, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969)

RICHARDS v. WISCONSIN, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)

The Fourth Amendment protects individuals against unreasonable searches and seizures. Courts have struggled, however, to determine what makes searches and seizures “unreasonable”. An important case addressing this issue is Richards v. Wisconsin, where the Court rejected Wisconsin’s blanket exception in drug searches to the requirement that police officers knock and announce their presence before forcibly entering a home.

Two years before Richards, the Court decided in Wilson v. Arkansas (1995) that the Fourth Amendment requires police to knock and identify themselves before executing search warrants. However, the Court added that “no-knock” entries may be justified by factual circumstances in some cases, leaving it to lower courts to determine when such entries were justified. Wisconsin responded by mandating blanket approvals of “no-knock” entries in drug cases.

In Richards, officers executing a search warrant forcibly entered Richards’ hotel room without knocking and announcing their presence. Richards was arrested when officers found cocaine in the bathroom. The trial court denied Richards’ motion to suppress the evidence because of the “no-knock” entry and the Wisconsin Supreme Court affirmed.

The Supreme Court held, however, that no-knock entries must be justified on a case-by-case basis. Only when police believe announcing their presence may be dangerous, futile, or result in the destruction of evidence, are “no-knock” entries justified. Although the Court rejected Wisconsin’s blanket exception to the knock and announce rule, it upheld Richards’ conviction, stating that particular “no-knock” entry did not violate the Fourth Amendment.

LEE R. REMINGTON

References and Further Reading

Biskupic, Joan. “High Court Limits Brutality Liability.” Washington Post, April 29, 1997, p. A1.
Greenhouse, Linda. “Court Rejects Special Rules for Drug Searches.” New York Times, April 29, 1997, p. A14.
Memorandum for M. Edward Whelan III, Acting Assistant Attorney General, Office of Legal Counsel, from Cynthia R. Ryan, Chief Counsel, Drug Enforcement Administration. Re: Authority of Federal Judges to Issue “No-Knock.” Warrants, October 26, 2001.
“Opinions of the U.S. Supreme Court.” Criminal Law Reporter 61, no. 5 (April 30, 1997).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Wilson v. Arkansas, 514 U.S. 927 (1995)

See also Privacy; Search (General Definition)

RICHMOND NEWSPAPERS, INC. v. VIRGINIA, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

In this case a criminal defendant had been tried unsuccessfully three times for murder. He was convicted at his first trial but the conviction was overturned by an appellate court; the subsequent two trials ended in mistrials. At his fourth trial, the defendant’s attorney made a motion to close the trial to the public and the prosecutor did not object. Consequently, the judge closed the trial and denied the Richmond Newspapers, Inc.’s motion that the trial be open.

The issue for the U.S. Supreme Court to decide in this case was whether the public and the press have a constitutional right to attend criminal trials. By a seven-to-one majority (Justice Lewis Powell did not participate), the Court held that there was a First Amendment right of the public and the press to attend a criminal trial “absent an overriding interest articulated in findings.” Although six of the seven justices in the majority wrote opinions, all agreed that the U.S. Constitution guaranteed the right of the public and the press to attend a criminal trial and that this right may be restricted only if the interest in closing a trial is a compelling one. Not only were open proceedings long “recognized as an indispensable attribute of an Anglo-American trial,” they were also necessary in order to ensure the integrity of the judicial process. All seven justices additionally agreed that there was no overriding interest that justified closing the trial in this case.

The Richmond Newspapers case has become a significant precedent in subsequent cases in which legislatures or judges attempted to close portions of trial and pretrial proceedings.

MICHAEL W. BOWERS

References and Further Reading

Cohen, William, and David J. Danelski. Constitutional Law: Civil Liberty and Individual Rights. 5th ed. New York: Foundation, 2002.

Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 14th ed. New York: Foundation, 2001.

See also Cameras in the Courtroom; Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Free Press/Fair Trial; Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period; Rights of the Accused

RICKETTS v. ADAMSON, 483 U.S. 1 (1987)

At the beginning of his trial for first-degree murder, Adamson and the prosecutor reached a plea agreement whereby he would plead guilty to second-degree murder and testify against others involved in the murder. Adamson understood that if he refused to testify the original charge would be automatically reinstated. Adamson testified and his accomplices were convicted of first-degree murder. The Arizona Supreme Court threw out their convictions, however, and ordered a new trial. Adamson believed his obligation to testify terminated when he was sentenced and refused to testify at the second trial.

The trial court did not compel him to testify and the government filed new information reinstating the initial charge of first-degree murder. He tried to quash the information on double jeopardy grounds. Adamson then offered to testify at his accomplices’ retrial, but this offer was denied and he was convicted of first-degree murder and sentenced to death. Adamson sought federal habeas relief, asserting that the reinstatement of first-degree murder charges after his conviction on second-degree murder was a violation of double jeopardy.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed and held that Adamson’s prosecution for first-degree murder did not violate double jeopardy principles, since his breach of the plea agreement removed the double jeopardy bar that otherwise would prevail.

MARILYN MCAULEY

Cases and Statutes Cited

Blackledge v. Allison, 431 U.S. 63, 75 (1977)

Boykin v. Alabama, 395 U.S. 238, 242 (1969)

United States v. Scott, 437 U.S. 82 (1978)

See also Double Jeopardy: Modern History; Guilty Plea; Plea Bargaining

RICO

The Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act (RICO), passed in 1970 as part of omnibus anti-crime legislation, was enacted to combat organized crime. As the title suggests, its goal was to prevent organized crime from influencing an organization, and to pursue then-existing corrupt organizations, usually unions. Although hardly a concern today, when RICO was passed, members of organized criminal gangs, known as the Mafia, had used threats and violence to infiltrate and seize control of legitimate businesses. Members of these criminal organizations would then use these formerly legitimate businesses to forward unlawful ends. Union dues would often serve as capital for mobsters to run loan-sharking operations.

RICO was drafted much more broadly, however, and many of its provisions were vague. Civil libertarians feared that RICO’s application would soon expand beyond organized crime. Ira Glasser of the American Civil Liberties Union called RICO “the most comprehensive assault on civil liberties principles of any statute I’ve seen in many years.” In Sedima, S.P. R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc. (1985), these fears were soon realized: the Supreme Court held that RICO could be applied against legitimate businesses.

RICO also provides civil remedies, and as Professor Pamela Bucy has correctly observed, “RICO can be a prosecutor’s powerhouse and a civil plaintiff’s dream” since RICO’s language is extremely broad. The Supreme Court said in Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc., that RICO must be “read broadly.” Almost the only thing limiting RICO’s expansion into new areas of law is lawyerly and prosecutorial creativity.

RICO prohibits any person or organization from (1) using or investing proceeds from a pattern of racketeering activity; (2) acquiring or maintaining control of an organization through a pattern of racketeering activity; (3) conducting affairs through a pattern of racketeering activity; or (4) conspiring to do (1) to (3). “Racketeering activity”—referred to usually as predicate acts—includes over fifty-five felonies, ranging from traditional conduct associated with racketing, such as murder, arson, and loan sharking, to the extremely broad mail and wire fraud statutes. What constitutes a pattern of racketeering activity is not specifically defined, but courts have generally held that two predicate acts are required over at least a seven-month period. Thus, a “pattern” of racketeering activity is generally understood to be two racketeering acts over a seven-month to ten-year period.

RICO also requires there to be an enterprise affecting interstate commerce, although the commerce requirement is de minimus. A RICO enterprise includes any person or other legal entity. Any formal business and almost any informal network of individuals will fall under this requirement. In sum, RICO prevents someone from using a business to commit a crime, or to commit a crime to take control of a business.

RICO provides stiff criminal and civil penalties. A person convicted under RICO can face twenty years in prison, substantial fines, and forfeiture of any property obtained from illegally obtained proceeds. A defendant also faces having his assets seized pre-trial, thus preventing him from mounting a successful defense. A person found civilly liable under RICO is responsible for treble damages and attorney’s fees.

There are several civil liberties-related concerns with RICO. One criticism of RICO is that a RICO defendant faces greater punishment than if he or she had been convicted only of the underlying predicate acts. That is, a RICO defendant who is alleged to have committed two counts of wire fraud faces greater punishment than if he or she had been prosecuted under the wire fraud statutes. Moreover, RICO allows the government to turn a garden variety mail and wire fraud case into a RICO case, even though RICO was directed at organized crime. Given that courts have, as Judge Newman of the Second Circuit noted, “tolerated an extraordinary expansive of mail and wire fraud statutes,” RICO thus allows “federal prosecution for conduct that some thought was subject only to state criminal and civil law.”

A RICO prosecution also allows the government to avoid the double jeopardy clause, which prohibits successive prosecutions for acquitted or convicted conduct. Thus, courts generally treat the elements of underlying predicate acts as separate elements from the underlying elements of a RICO claim. The government can also bring both a civil and criminal RICO case against the same actor for the same conduct.

Finally, RICO allows private parties to become de facto prosecutors. Justice Thurgood Marshall potentially noted in Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc.: “[T]wo fraudulent mailings or used of the wires occurring within 10 years of each other might ... lead[] to civil RICO liability.” In other words, RICO allows a litigant to bring a private enforcement action, that is, to enforce federal laws. Indeed, private litigants have sought to use RICO to chill protected expression. In Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, Inc. (2003), abortion protestors were sued under the theory was that by blocking abortion clinic entrances, they deprived the clinic of property within the meaning of the Hobbs Act. Since the Hobbs Act was a predicate act under RICO, the clinics sought to hold the protestors liable for money damages, and they sought to enjoin them from further protests.

Had the plaintiffs’ interpretation been accepted, many protests would be at danger. During oral argument the solicitor general, arguing as amicus for this expansive interpretation, conceded that many of the civil rights sit-ins of the 1960s would fall under RICO. That Martin Luther King and others could have been prosecuted or sued for sitting at lunch counters amply demonstrates RICO’s problems. Thus, Rachel King, legislative counsel at the American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), testified before Congress that the ACLU “has had a long-standing concern about the RICO statute” since its sweeping conspiracy provision allows for prosecution under a theory of ‘guilty by association.’”

Moreover, RICO provides the prosecution a way around to turn a state case into a federal case. During the first RICO prosecution of mobster John Gotti, the federal government used acquitted state court conduct as a predicate act under RICO. Although John Gotti is hardly a sympathetic example, his prosecution illustrates how easily a state offense can become federal, and how creative lawyers and prosecutors can stifle free speech and find exceptions to constitutional restrictions on government conduct.

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

References and Further Reading

Bucy, Pamela H., and Steven T. Marshall, An Overview of RICO, Alabama Lawyer 51 (1990): 238–9.

Giventer, Lorrie. Crime and Punishment in Business: A Conference, Civil Justice Memo No. 17. Washington, D.C.: Manhattan Institute, October 1989.

King, Rachel. Testimony by Legislative Counsel Rachel King before the House Judiciary Committee on the Anti-Terrorism Act of 2001. Washington, D.C., September 24, 2001.

Lynch, Gerald. RICO: The Crime of Being a Criminal, Parts I and II. Columbia Law Review 87 (1987): 661.

———, RICO: The Crime of Being a Criminal, Parts III and IV. Columbia Law Review 87 (1987): 920.

United States v. Weiss, 752 F.2d 777, 791 (2d Cir. 1985) (Newman, J., dissenting).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Scheidler v. National Organization for Women, Inc., 537 U.S. 393 (2003)

Sedima, S.P.R.L. v. Imrex Co., Inc. 473 U.S. 479, 479–98 (1985) (Marshall, J., dissenting)

Racketeer Influenced and Corrupt Organizations Act, 18 U.S.C., Section 1961 et seq.

See also Criminalization of Civil Wrongs; Federalization of Criminal Law

RIGGINS v. NEVADA, 504 U.S. 127 (1992)

For some time many courts barred trial of mentally ill defendants who were found competent to stand trial solely because they were taking antipsychotic medication. Then, from the late 1960s to the 1990s, most courts held that forcible medication of criminal defendants is permissible if the medication is necessary to restore the individual to competency, given the state's interest in prosecuting those charged with crime. In Riggins v. Nevada, the U.S. Supreme Court took a more cautious stance, holding that when the state wants to medicate a defendant to restore competence, it must establish that the medication is medically appropriate, the least restrictive means of restoring competency, and appropriately titrated so that it does not diminish the defendant's ability to consult with his attorney, follow the trial process, or testify. Because the trial judge had not been sensitive to these issues during Riggins's capital murder trial (despite the fact that Riggins had received heavy doses of antipsychotic medication prior to and during the trial), the Supreme Court remanded the case, and strongly suggested the conviction should be reversed. Riggins is an important protection against the state's misuse or overuse of powerful antipsychotic medication, which can often have sedative effects and also can have other very serious side effects. In a later decision, Sell v. United States (2003), the Court further restricted use of these medications for purposes of competency restoration, holding that forcible medication is permissible only when the defendant is dangerous to self or others or when the state's interest in prosecution is "compelling." The latter situation, the Court indicated, "may be rare."

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

Klein, Dora W., Trial Rights and Psychotropic Drugs: The Case against Administering Involuntary Medications to a Defendant during Trial, Vanderbilt Law Review 55 (2002): 165–218.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Sell v. United States, 123 S.Ct. 274 (2003)

See also Dusky v. U.S., 362 U.S. 402 (1960); Insanity Defense

RIGHT OF ACCESS TO CRIMINAL TRIALS

A public right of access to criminal trials is rooted in history, in the Sixth Amendment right to a "public trial," and, since the Supreme Court's 1980 ruling in Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, in the First Amendment. Without the freedom to attend criminal trials, the Court said, "important aspects of freedom of speech and of the press could be eviscerated." The Court's plurality opinion based the right on the long tradition of open trials and on the important functional role public access plays in the judicial process.

The right is not absolute and may be outweighed by countervailing interests such as national security, privacy concerns, or a defendant's Sixth Amendment right to a fair trial. The Court ruled in 1982 in Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court that trial closure must be decided on a case-by-case basis and must be based on a finding that a compelling governmental interest requires closure, alternatives to closure fail to adequately protect the interest, and the scope of closure is no broader than necessary.

The Richmond Newspapers ruling applied only to criminal trials, although the Court later extended the access right to pretrial proceedings (preliminary hearings and jury selection) associated with criminal trials. Some lower courts have since extended the Court's reasoning to other types of judicial proceedings, and in 1999, the California Supreme Court used Richmond Newspapers to find a general First Amendment right of access to civil proceedings, based on a history of openness and the functional role access can play.

KATHLEEN K. OLSON

References and Further Reading

- Bunker, Matthew D. Justice and the Media: Reconciling Fair Trials and a Free Press. Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum Associates, 1997.
- Cerruti, Eugene, "Dancing in the Courthouse": The First Amendment Right of Access Opens a New Round, University of Richmond Law Review 29 (1995): 237–325.
- Liotti, Thomas F., The Second Circuit Review: 1996–97 Term: First and Sixth Amendments: Closing the Courtroom to the Public: Whose Rights Are Violated? Brooklyn Law Review 63 (1997): 501–50.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Globe Newspaper Co. v. Superior Court*, 457 U.S. 596 (1982)
- Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia*, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)
- See also Media Access to Judicial Proceedings; Richmond Newspapers, Inc. v. Virginia, 448 U.S. 555 (1980)

RIGHT OF PRIVACY

In 1965, in the landmark case, Griswold v. Connecticut, the U.S. Supreme Court, for the first time in the nation's history, firmly established the right of privacy as a fundamental constitutional right. Although a majority of justices could agree that the Constitution protected this right as fundamental (six to three), a majority could not agree on exactly where the Constitution did so guarantee. Thus, one justice argued a "penumbra" of the Bill of Rights as a source; three would cite the Ninth Amendment as affording such protection, while two others would cite to the Due Process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The fact that the Court could agree that there was such a right, but could not agree on where it came from, underscores the continuing controversy surrounding the decision and the right of privacy. Should the Supreme Court create "unarticulated" constitutional rights?

The Court appeared to resolve the issue as to the constitutional source in another landmark decision, Roe v. Wade (1973), by concluding that the right of privacy was "founded in the Fourteenth Amendment's concept of personal liberty," or "substantive due process." The Roe decision protecting a woman's right of choice in regard to abortion, raised another and just as controversial issue. What privacy interests are so significant as to be deemed fundamental, and how should the Court go about making such a determination?

Unarticulated Constitutional Rights

The right of privacy rests at the root of a constitutional debate as to how a nonelected Supreme Court, enforcing the supremacy of the Constitution as fundamental law, should interpret the document in light of the framers intent and contemporary needs in a democratic society. Although most citizens today are well aware of the moral controversy extending from the abortion debate, very few are likely aware that among those who study the Court and the Constitution it is the issue of judicially created unarticulated constitutional rights that affords the greatest controversy. This has been emphasized in the contemporary Senate confirmation process of Supreme Court nominees, where candidates views on the right of privacy have been center stage.

Offhand it might seem that the creation of unarticulated rights could only be beneficial in affording protection of individual rights via a living and contemporary Constitution. To support the framers' intent in this regard, we can cite to the Constitution's broad clauses: "due process," "liberty," "equal protection," or the Ninth Amendment's guarantee that the rights created were not exhaustive. Justice Douglas's assertion in Griswold that a reading of the documents as a whole leaves one with an inescapable feeling that the framers intended that the sanctity and privacy of the individual should be protected from unjustified intrusion by the state, seems to relate a legitimate truth.

To this view, Justice Learned Hand would respond that it would be "most irksome to be ruled by a bevy of Platonic Guardians," fearing such power in a nonelected body with life tenure. Those asserting a more clause-bound basis for judicial interpretation, limited to the original intent of the framers themselves, cite to the repudiation of the Court's creation of the "liberty to contract" as an unarticulated right in Lochner v. New York in 1905. The creation of this unarticulated right by the Court's substantive application of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment has been often criticized as an example of the danger in allowing the creation of such rights. The activism generated during the "Lochner era," where the Court read "laissez-faire" capitalism as if it were a constitutional mandate, is the traditional armor for those who stand against the Griswold and/or Roe decisions. The application of "substantive due process" to create unarticulated rights that a Court might find "implicit in our concept of ordered liberty," are the controversial tools of this trade.

The reader should recognize that this never-ending debate stirs the juice that flows beneath the right of privacy.

Which Privacy Interests Are Fundamental?

The decision in Roe brings us to the next issue. Of a milieu of individual privacy interests, which interests should be deemed fundamental and protected as constitutional rights, and how should the Court go about so deciding? Of interest is the fact that this activist expansion of the right of privacy has taken place under the tenure of a Supreme Court that has fashioned itself, quite to the contrary, as an advocate of judicial restraint. This somewhat conservative posture has nonetheless offered us the best insight into what interests would be deemed fundamental. Here the Court has tended to apply “substantive due process” to conserve traditional social values, or to deem privacy interests as fundamental based upon a “respect for the teachings of history [and] solid recognition of the basic values that underlie our society” (Moore [1977]). Family, for example, is deemed a fundamental privacy interest “precisely because the institution of the family is deeply rooted in this Nation’s history and tradition” (Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey [1992]). Ultimately, based upon these themes, the Court has extended fundamental right protection “to personal decisions relating to marriage, procreation, contraception, family relationships, child rearing, and education” (Planned Parenthood [1992]).

This never-ending constitutional debate will perhaps be resolved by the evolving nature of constitutional law that is dependent upon just who is appointed to the Court. Of interest, in this regard, was the Court’s opinion in Lawrence v. Texas (2003), finding a Texas statute that criminalized only homosexual acts as “sodomy” unconstitutional based on the fundamental right of privacy because,

When sexuality finds overt expression in intimate conduct with another person, the conduct can be but one element in a personal bond that is more enduring. The liberty protected by the Constitution allows homosexual persons the right to make this choice.

To this Justice Scalia dissented and argued “that homosexual sodomy is not a right deeply rooted in our Nation’s history and tradition,” and that to conclude that it was “implicit in the concept of ordered liberty is, at best, facetious.” Here the majority’s more generalized view of the nature of the right provided a much more expansive view of protected rights than did Scalia’s more specific inquiry. With Griswold opinion well settled within the confines of stare decisis, the resolution of the more general versus specific distinction is perhaps where the answers in the future may lay.

Yet, the narrow five-to-four majority in Lawrence certainly emphasizes the continuing controversy and debate surrounding the right of privacy and judicial protection of “unarticulated constitutional rights.”

MARTIN L. LEVY

References and Further Reading

- Bork, Robert, Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, Indiana Law Journal 47 (1971).
 Ely, John Hart, Democracy and Distrust. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1980.
 Ely, John Hart, The Wages of Crying Wolf: A Comment on Roe v. Wade, Yale Law Journal 82 (1973): 920.
 Grey, Thomas C., Do We Have an Unwritten Constitution?, Stanford Law Review 27 (1975): 703.
 Hand, Learned B. The Bill of Rights. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1958.
 Strauss, David A., Abortion, Toleration, and Moral Uncertainty, Supreme Court Review 1993 (1993): 1.
 Tribe, Laurence, Forward: Toward a Model of Roles in the Due Process of Life and Law, Harvard Law Review 87 (1973): 1.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, 2003 (2003)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Moore v. City of East Cleveland, 431 U.S. 494 (1977)
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pa. v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS (II)

The words that compose the Second Amendment trace a lineage back through early American governance. The issues raised in the amendment were discussed not only in the First Congress, but in the Constitutional Convention of 1787, and in state governments, as they arose in colonial society, and from the British heritage.

The British Heritage

The British Parliament enacted the British Bill of Rights, also known as the Declaration of Rights, in 1689, in which various grievances against King James II were listed, including that he “did endeavor to subvert and extirpate the Protestant Religion and the Laws and Liberties of this Kingdom.... By causing several good Subjects, being Protestants, to be disarmed at the same Time when Papists [Catholics] were both armed and employed contrary to Law.” The right defined in Article VII of this document was “That the subjects which are protestants, may have arms for their defence suitable to their conditions, and as allowed by law.” This provision from the British Bill of Rights is that cited as the forerunner of America’s Second Amendment, although there is no direct evidence that America’s founders treated it as the source of what became the Second Amendment.

The Colonial Experience

The mistrust of standing armies, partly inherited from bitter European experiences, was a common sentiment in America during the colonial period, and was directly related to the bearing of arms by citizens in militias, a practice that took on greater significance as the colonies approached the Revolution when citizen-soldiers became synonymous with the revolutionary spirit. The Virginia Declaration of Rights, for example, written in 1776, said that “standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided, as dangerous to liberty.”

Militias were defined as adult males of fighting age (roughly between eighteen and forty-five) who were obligated to enroll with the government for military service. They received limited training, served for a few months out of the year, were only covered partially by military law, and were generally under state command. By comparison, professional soldiers were usually volunteers who enlisted for several years, received extensive military training and pay, served even in peacetime, were under federal control and full military discipline.

From colonial times on, militia forces were composed of two parts: the general or unorganized militias, and the organized or select militias. The first was defined as the entire body of eligible males that participated in the minimum required service. The select militias were volunteer units that organized and trained more rigorously, often with their own equipment, uniforms, and unit loyalty. These more professionalized militias were subject to periodic criticism from those who feared that they bore too close a resemblance to a professional army.

American mistrust of standing armies was magnified by the behavior of British troops on American soil. American outrage over the excesses of British troops was expressed in the Declaration of Independence of 1776 where Thomas Jefferson complained that “He [the King] has kept among us, in Times of Peace, Standing Armies, without the consent of our Legislatures. He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil Power.” The Declaration also complained that the British were “quartering large Bodies of Armed Troops among us” and “protecting them, by a mock Trial, from Punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States.” Not surprisingly, the British also took any and every opportunity to seize American weapons and ammunition.

As a consequence, America fought the Revolutionary War with a combination of the Continental Army, which served as the core fighting unit, and state militias. While the reliance on militias was politically satisfying, it proved to be an administrative and military nightmare. State detachments could not be easily combined into larger fighting units; soldiers could not be relied on to serve for extended periods, and desertions were common; militia detachments would often enter the army encampment, consume food and supplies, and then leave before battle; officers were elected, based on popularity rather than experience or training; discipline and uniformity were almost nonexistent. Owing to the militias’ popularity, Commander-in-Chief George Washington defended the militia in public, but made his real sentiments brutally clear in correspondence with Congress, in which he complained bitterly about the militias’ lack of discipline and skill, unwillingness to fight, and general unreliability.

Despite the militia handicap, America won its independence, owing to the size of its force (over 400,000 men participated during the course of the war), the protracted nature of the conflict, the adoption of tactics appropriate to American terrain and the army’s irregular nature, the assistance of the French, British difficulties related to distance and supply, and the American “home court advantage.” This latter fact was particularly important to the militias, which generally fought best when they were fighting near their homes.

The Constitution

The first constitution, the Articles of Confederation (1777–1789), reflected suspicion of standing armies, and of a strong national government. The articles gave most power to the states, including the primary burden of national defense. The articles stipulated that “every state shall always keep up a well regulated and disciplined militia, sufficiently armed and accoutred” (Article VI) and that Congress’s military powers could only be exercised by a vote of nine of thirteen states (Article IX). No specific provision was made for a national standing army.

These and other shortcomings of the articles eventually led to the Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787, and the adoption of the modern Constitution.

The military issue was resolved in the new Constitution by recognition of both the militia and a standing army. In Article I, Section 8, Congress was given the power to “raise and support armies,” “provide and maintain a Navy,” and to finance and regulate both. In an important departure from the Articles, Congress would now have key authority over the state militias, as it could “provide for calling forth the Militia” in order “to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions”; and it could “provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining, the Militia, and for governing such Part of them as may be employed in the Service of the United States.” The states retained only limited control, as the Constitution reserved “to the States respectively, the Appointment of the Officers, and the Authority of training the Militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress” (Article I, Section 8). In addition, the president would serve as commander-in-chief of the military forces, including the militia (Article II, Section 2).

Defenders of the new Constitution sought to calm fears and counter criticisms in the Federalist Papers. In Federalist No. 24, Alexander Hamilton, who served as George Washington’s aide during the Revolution, argued that it would be a mistake to restrict or ban standing armies in times of peace, citing constant threats the young nation faced along its vast frontiers and the necessity of allowing Congress appropriate latitude to meet variable but persistent military threats. In No. 25, Hamilton argued forcefully that standing armies were naturally superior on the battlefield, the Revolutionary War notwithstanding, and were similarly superior in dealing with civil unrest (No. 28). Further, Hamilton noted in No. 29 that the federal government must have the power to impose uniformity on the militias in order for them to be effective and efficient. Both he and Madison dismissed the fear that a standing army would deprive the states of their sovereignty, or citizens of their liberties. To critics who predicted that a standing army would produce the downfall of state governments, Madison in No. 46 computed that the United States could at the time raise at best an army of 30,000 men—a force that could be opposed by state militias totaling a half-million men.

The Federalist–Anti-Federalist Debate and the Bill of Rights

No dispute during America’s formative years was more important than that between the Federalists, who embraced a stronger national government as established in the new Constitution, and the Anti-Federalists, who opposed the new Constitution, and who supported a more decentralized governing system. This debate was the root of concerns that gave rise to the Second Amendment.

The adoption of the Constitution enshrined within it the dual militia–standing army military system, but it did not resolve the nagging question of federalism; that is, the new Constitution not only created a national standing army, but gave the federal government vast new power over the militias. Anti-Federalists were extremely concerned that this power might be used not only to undercut the effectiveness and independence of state militias (for example, by federal government refusal to organize, arm or train them, although Federalists asserted that the states would retain such powers if the federal government failed to act), but to gut state power entirely.

These fears found voice in several state ratifying conventions, most particularly that of Virginia, where Anti-Federalists led by Patrick Henry sought assurance that Virginia, and other states, could arm their own militias if the federal government failed to do so. George Mason pressed the Virginia convention to obtain a specific guarantee of such a state right. This, in a nutshell, was the purpose of what became the Second Amendment. The Virginia convention passed this wording when it ratified the Constitution:

That the people have a right to keep and bear arms; that a well regulated Militia composed of the body of the people trained to arms is the proper, natural and safe defence of a free State. That standing armies in time of peace are dangerous to liberty, and therefore ought to be avoided, as far as the circumstances and protection of the Community will admit; and that in all cases the military should be under strict subordination to and governed by the Civil power.

Following Virginia’s lead, four other states—New Hampshire, New York, North Carolina, and Rhode Island—adopted similar resolutions to obtain greater protections for the continued existence and viability of state militias. The central question giving rise to the Second Amendment was whether congressional authority over state militias could surpass that of the state governments and whether this new federal military power (over both the militia and the federal-controlled professional army) might be used to limit state sovereignty and power. In particular, the southern states were anxious to make sure that they would have the ability to mobilize adequately armed state militias to suppress slave revolts, since they were suspicious that a national government dominated by northern interests would not be willing to commit federal troops and supplies to keep African Americans in the bondage of slavery.

The pressure for a Bill of Rights to limit federal authority and retain states rights escalated, and on June 8, 1789, Madison introduced in the House of Representatives of the First Congress a proposed list of rights to be added to the Constitution. Drawn heavily from Virginia's 1776 Declaration of Rights, the list included the wording below, originally to be inserted in Article 1, Section 9 (a section of the Constitution that lists several limits on the federal government, and that followed the section dealing with military matters):

The right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed; a well armed, and well regulated militia being the best security of a free country: but no person religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person.

As reported out of House committee on July 28, the amendment said:

A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, being the best security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed, but no person religiously scrupulous shall be compelled to bear arms.

On August 24, the House passed this wording:

A well regulated militia, composed of the body of the People, being the best security of a free State, the right of the People to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed, but no one religiously scrupulous of bearing arms, shall be compelled to render military service in person.

This and the other amendments then went to the Senate, where the final wording of what became the Second Amendment emerged:

A well regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms, shall not be infringed.

The debate in the First Congress surrounding the Second Amendment dealt with a few familiar questions, all dealing with military matters: whether the amendment wording should codify the right of conscientious objectors to opt out of military service for religious reasons; the relationship among militias, standing armies, and liberty; the need to subordinate the military to civilian authority; and the military unreliability of the militia as compared with a professional army. To judge by the brief debate about and modest wording changes in the amendment's versions quoted above, the basic sentiment was held throughout—that citizens have a constitutionally protected right to serve in militias when called into service by, and in defense of, state and country.

Thus, the Second Amendment is founded on federalism, balancing powers between the federal government and the states, and on military necessity, developing a political compromise between politically popular and state-controlled militias, and a politically unpopular but militarily necessary national professional army. Missing from this extended history is any connection between the Second Amendment and any personal, private, or individual use of firearms, for purposes including hunting, sporting, recreation, or even personal protection, which was already covered by the eighteenth century in common law. The Second Amendment's purpose, like the Bill of Rights as a whole, was to place limits on the federal government, and strike a balance between national power and state power. Its only connection to what might be termed an "individual right" was that individuals would need to retain the ability to fulfill the civic obligation to respond to a call from the government.

The Decline of the Old Militia System

Soon after the ratification of the Bill of Rights in 1791, Congress moved ahead to establish rules and procedures governing the militias in the Uniform Militia Act of 1792, which defined the nation's militia as "every free able-bodied white male citizen of the respective states" between the ages of eighteen and forty-five. Militiamen were legally obligated in the act to provide their own weapons, ammunition, and accoutrements. Even though the Constitution said that Congress bore responsibility for arming the militia (Article I, Section 8), Madison noted that "arming" did not necessarily mean that the federal government had to literally furnish arms. The government could, of course, provide arms if it chose to do so, and from the mid-nineteenth century on, it invariably did.

Despite these efforts, by the close of the eighteenth century it was clear that the militias were impractical, if not obsolete. Almost without exception, the states failed to implement the terms of the Uniform Militia Act. The system of fines imposed to impel men to arm and uniform themselves, and to ensure that they showed up for drill, failed to achieve these objectives, and were almost never enforced.

The reputation of the citizen militias suffered a final, crippling blow as the result of their terrible performance in the War of 1812. Even as a supplement to the regular army, the general militia system was considered useless. Neither the federal government nor the states took much interest in continuing universal militia training and service, although the social structure of the militia system continued for decades. Local militias continued to gather for “musters” throughout much of the nineteenth century, but such gatherings were primarily social occasions often held at local taverns. Instead, the government relied on its professional army and elite corps of volunteers, the select or “organized” militias.

No significant legal changes occurred until 1903, when Congress passed the Militia Act, which legally separated the “organized militia,” now formally dubbed the National Guard, from the “reserve militia,” also called the unorganized militia, even though the unorganized militia had by now been discarded as a viable military entity, as defense needs could no longer be given over to ill-trained amateurs. The balance of the act provided for federal arming, training, and drilling of the National Guard. In 1916, Congress passed the National Defense Act, which mandated that the National Guard would be organized in the same method as the “Regular Army.” It also placed state Guards under federal guidelines.

Gaps in modern military needs have been met by the selective service system—the military draft—rather than activation of the old-style militias. This history and interpretation of militias is described and ratified in the Supreme Court cases of Maryland v. United States and Perpich v. Department of Defense (1990).

In sum, the possession of firearms referred to in the Second Amendment comes into play only at such time as (1) the unorganized militia is activated by a state or the federal government, a practice effectively abandoned before the Civil War, and (2) the government fails to provide weapons for that force.

Supreme Court Rulings

The Second Amendment has generated relatively little constitutional law. In a few instances, however, the Supreme Court has ruled directly on the meaning of this amendment. In the first case, United States v. Cruikshank (1876), Cruikshank and two other defendants were charged with thirty-two counts of depriving blacks of their constitutional rights, including two counts claiming that the defendants had deprived blacks of firearms possession, in violation of the Force Act of 1870. The Court in this case established two principles which it and lower federal courts have consistently upheld: first, that the Second Amendment poses no obstacle to at least some regulation of firearms; and second, that the Second Amendment is not “incorporated,” meaning that it pertains only to federal power, not state power. Admittedly, the Supreme Court did not begin to incorporate parts of the first ten amendments (that is, applying them to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment) until 1897. But the Court has never accepted the idea of incorporating the entire Bill of Rights, and it has never incorporated the Second Amendment, despite numerous opportunities to do so.

Ten years later, the court ruled in Presser v. Illinois (1886) that an Illinois law that barred paramilitary organizations from drilling or parading in cities or towns without a license from the governor was constitutional, and did not violate the Second Amendment. Herman Presser challenged the law after he was arrested for marching and drilling his armed fringe group through Chicago streets. In upholding the Illinois law, the Court reaffirmed that the Second Amendment did not apply to the states, citing Cruikshank. Justice Woods explained:

It is undoubtedly true that all citizens capable of bearing arms constitute the reserved military force or reserved militia of the United States as well as of the States; and, in view of this prerogative ... the States cannot, even laying the constitutional provision in question out of view, prohibit the people from keeping and bearing arms, so as to deprive the United States of their rightful resource for maintaining the public security, and disable the people from performing their duty to the General Government. But, as already stated, we think it clear that the sections under consideration do not have this effect.

The court denied that Presser and his associates had a right to organize with others as a self-proclaimed and armed military organization, since such activity “is not an attribute of national citizenship. Military organization and military drill and parade under arms are subjects especially under the control of the government of every country. They cannot be claimed as a right independent of law.” To deny the government the power to define and regulate militias would, according to the court, “be to deny the right of the State to disperse assemblages organized for sedition and treason, and the right to suppress armed mobs bent on riot and rapine [pillaging].” Thus, the Presser case confirmed the understanding that the right to bear arms came into play only in connection with the formation and conduct of the militia, as formed and regulated by the government. The court emphatically rejected the idea that citizens could create their own militias, much less that the Second Amendment protected citizens’ rights to own weapons for their own purposes. In 1894, the Supreme Court ruled in Miller v. Texas (1894) that a Texas law “prohibiting the carrying of dangerous weapons” did not violate the Second Amendment. Again, the court said that the right to bear arms did not apply to the states.

The most recent Supreme Court case is United States v. Miller (1939). The Miller case was founded on a challenge to the National Firearms Act of 1934, which regulated the interstate transport of various weapons. Jack Miller and Frank Layton were convicted of transporting an unregistered 12-gauge sawed-off shotgun (having a barrel less than eighteen inches long) across state lines in violation of the 1934 Act. They challenged the act's constitutionality partly by claiming that it was a violation of the Second Amendment.

The unanimous court rejected the defendants' claims, and ruled that firearm registration was constitutional, as was the 1934 law. Beyond this, the court was unequivocal in saying that the Second Amendment must be interpreted by its "obvious purpose" of assuring an effective militia as described in Article I, section 8 of the Constitution. Speaking for the court, Justice McReynolds wrote:

In the absence of any evidence tending to show that possession or use of a "shotgun having a barrel of less than eighteen inches in length" at this time has some reasonable relationship to the preservation or efficiency of a well regulated militia, we cannot say that the Second Amendment guarantees the right to keep and bear such an instrument. Certainly it is not within judicial notice that this weapon is any part of the ordinary military equipment or that its use could contribute to the common defense.

Thus, the Court stated that citizens could only possess a constitutional right to bear arms in connection with service in a militia.

The Second Amendment also received brief mention in Lewis v. United States (1980), when the court upheld the constitutionality of a 1968 law that barred felons from owning guns, saying that the law did not violate the Second Amendment, citing United States v. Miller. In a challenge to the Gun Control Act of 1968, the Court said that gun regulations were allowable as long as there was some "rational basis" for them, meaning that the regulations merely had to serve some legitimate purpose. This standard is significant because it is one that is easily met, especially as compared with the higher standard the court has set for laws that might conflict with other Bill of Rights freedoms.

Other Court Rulings and the Individualist View

Lower federal courts have followed the Supreme Court's reasoning on the meaning of the Second Amendment in over forty cases handed down from the 1940s to the present. Challenges to gun regulations and related efforts to win a broader interpretation of the Second Amendment (including efforts to incorporate the Second Amendment) have been uniformly turned aside. Federal courts of appeal, according to United States v. Nelson (1988), "have analyzed the Second Amendment purely in terms of protecting state militias, rather than individual rights." In 2001, however, a federal court did, for the first time, accept an individual rights interpretation of the Second Amendment in United States v. Emerson. Even in this case, however, the defendant claiming a Second Amendment right was found guilty of unlawful gun possession. The primary basis for this ruling was a series of writings, mostly appearing in law journals, that argued that the Second Amendment protected an individual right to own guns aside from citizen militia service. The first published article advancing this argument appeared in 1960; since the 1980s, more such articles have appeared in print. This argument was also accepted by President George W. Bush's attorney general, John Ashcroft. The individualist view has been strenuously pushed in recent years by gun rights groups, led by the National Rifle Association.

ROBERT SPITZER

References and Further Reading

- Bogus, Carl T., The Hidden History of the Second Amendment, University of California Davis Law Review 31 (Winter 1998): 309-408.
- , ed. The Second Amendment in Law and History. New York: New Press, 2002.
- Carter, Gregg, ed. Encyclopedia of Guns in American Society. 2 vols. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Cooper, Jerry. The Rise of the National Guard. Lincoln: University of Nebraska Press, 1997.
- Cornell, Saul, ed. Whose Right to Bear Arms Did the Second Amendment Protect? Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2000.
- DeConde, Alexander. Gun Violence in America. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 2001.
- Finkelman, Paul, "A Well Regulated Militia": The Second Amendment in Historical Perspective, Chicago-Kent Law Review 76 (2000): 195-236.
- Kennett, Lee, and James LaVerne Anderson. The Gun in America. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1975.
- Levinson, Sanford, The Embarrassing Second Amendment, Yale Law Journal 99 (December 1989): 637-59.
- Rakove, Jack N., The Second Amendment: The Highest Stage of Originalism, Chicago-Kent Law Review 76 (2000): 103-66.
- Schworer, Lois G., To Hold and Bear Arms: The English Perspective, Chicago-Kent Law Review 76 (2000): 27-60.
- Shy, John. A People Numerous and Armed. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1990.

RIGHT TO BEAR ARMS (II)

- Spitzer, Robert J. The Right to Bear Arms. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2001.
- . The Politics of Gun Control. 3rd ed. New York: Chatham House, 2003.
- . The Second Amendment “Right to Bear Arms” and U.S. v. Emerson, St. John’s Law Review 77 (Winter 2003): 1–27.
- Uviller, H. Richard, and William G. Merkel. The Militia and the Right to Arms. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2002.
- Wills, Garry. A Necessary Evil. New York: Simon and Schuster, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lewis v. United States*, 445 U.S. 90 (1980)
- Maryland v. United States*, 381 U.S. 41 (1965)
- Miller v. Texas*, 153 U.S. 535 (1894)
- Perpich v. Department of Defense*, 496 U.S. 334 (1990)
- Presser v. Illinois*, 116 U.S. 252 (1886)
- United States v. Cruikshank*, 92 United States 542 (1876)
- United States v. Emerson*, 270 F.3d 203 (5th Cir. 2001)
- United States v. Miller*, 307 United States 174 (1939)
- United States v. Nelson*, 859 F.2d 1318 (8th Cir. 1988)

See also Ashcroft, John; Bill of Rights: Structure; Constitutional Convention of 1787; Declaration of Independence; Fourteenth Amendment; Hamilton, Alexander; Incorporation Doctrine; Jefferson, Thomas; Madison, James; Mason, George; National Rifle Association (NRA); United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1876); United States v. Miller, 307 U.S. 174 (1939); Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776)

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

Pre- and Posttrial Proceedings

As recounted in the article on the evolution of the right to counsel (Sixth Amendment), a defendant’s right to retain the services of counsel for trial has always been acknowledged in American courts, but not the right to have counsel regardless of financial ability to procure it. At the beginning of the process of ensuring that further right, the Supreme Court applied it to capital cases in Powell v. Alabama (1932) and declared the period “from the time of ... arraignment until the beginning of ... trial, when consultation, thoroughgoing investigation and preparation [are] vitally important,” to be “perhaps the most critical period of the proceedings” and affirmed that a defendant “requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him.”

A generation later, as it was concluding the process of ensuring trial counsel for the indigent in all felony cases (Gideon v. Wainwright, 1963) and in misdemeanor cases if prison is imposed (Argersinger v. Hamlin [1972]), the Court also addressed the question of right to counsel in pretrial proceedings.

The two basic issues are the point at which the right to counsel attaches (that is, the point at which the accused is entitled to its protection), and the pretrial events at which it applies. The Court’s initial approach was articulated in United States v. Wade (1967) where, emphasizing that the Constitution guarantees the accused “the assistance of counsel for his defence,” it affirmed that accused persons are entitled to counsel at any critical stage of the proceedings against them, in or out of court—that is, at any proceeding at which the absence of counsel would inhibit his or her ability to provide effective assistance at trial. Wade’s case involved a lineup in which he had been required to appear, and the Court held that to be a critical stage because of the real danger of intentional or unintentional unfairness and an attorney’s consequent need to cross-examine witnesses about the circumstances of their identifications of the defendant as the culprit. The Court significantly narrowed its formulation five years later, however, when it ruled in Kirby v. Illinois (1972) that “a person’s Sixth and Fourteenth Amendment right to counsel attaches only at or after the time that adversary judicial proceedings have been initiated against him ... whether by way of formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment,” because the right is granted “in all criminal prosecutions” and the initiation of formal proceedings is the point at which criminal prosecutions begin. There is thus no right to counsel for a preindictment lineup. Refining this interpretation in United States v. Ash (1973), the Court ruled that since the right to counsel was intended to provide protection at trial, it applies only to those pretrial proceedings that are comparable, and thus does not apply at an out-of-court photo lineup at which the defendant is not present. The right to counsel thus attaches only after the initiation of formal criminal proceedings, and then applies only at adversary proceedings where the accused must confront the forces of the prosecution—even though Justice William J. Brennan (author of the Wade decision) argued that neither criterion is relevant to the determination of a suspect’s need for counsel at pretrial proceedings in order to preserve his or her rights at trial.

Application of these criteria means that the right to counsel applies at some formal pretrial proceedings but not others. It applies at arraignment if rights may be lost there and at preliminary hearings if the accused clearly needs assistance or if the absence of counsel would prejudice the defendant's rights at trial, but it does not apply at probable cause hearings to determine the legality of a warrantless arrest. The vast majority of defendants strike a plea bargain during the pretrial phase, and the right to counsel for the process of negotiating and entering a plea of guilty is unchallenged. Outside the courtroom, the right applies at lineups if it has attached (that is, adversary proceedings have commenced), but not at grand jury appearances, the taking of handwriting exemplars and various forms of physical evidence from suspects, or photo-identification displays for witnesses. At its discretion, however, the government may permit some form of participation by counsel at such events.

The issue of counsel for pretrial interrogation has been especially contentious. When the right has attached, a suspect cannot be interrogated in the absence of counsel unless that right has been waived. In a controversial decision in 1964, the Supreme Court enforced this rule in a situation where the suspect had no opportunity to consult or waive counsel, as incriminating statements were elicited from him by a former accomplice now functioning as an undercover agent of the state (Massiah v. United States). Several years later, the Court also found a violation of the right to counsel when a vulnerable murder suspect did not waive it but did succumb to a police officer's suggestion that he should reveal the location of the victim's body so that she could receive a Christian burial (Brewer v. Williams [1977]). The violation common to both cases was the deliberate elicitation of incriminating information from a suspect by an agent of the state, in the absence of counsel. When an officer or informer makes no effort to elicit information and merely listens, however, suspects have no right to counsel and their statements are admissible against them.

In the same year as Massiah, the Court extended the right to counsel to suspects undergoing interrogation prior to the initiation of formal charges "when the process shifts from investigatory to accusatory—when its focus is on the accused and its purpose is to elicit a confession" (Escobedo v. Illinois [1964]). It soon abandoned that approach, however, in favor of the limited Fifth Amendment right to counsel for custodial interrogation it created in Miranda v. Arizona [1966].

When the right to counsel does attach, it does so automatically. The government has some control over attachment, however, as it determines the timing of the initiation of adversary proceedings. The Sixth Amendment right is, moreover, offense specific. That is, the fact that a suspect's right to counsel has attached for one offense does not mean that he or she has that right with respect to other offenses for which formal proceedings have not yet commenced, even if those offenses are closely associated with the one for which the right has attached. The suspect thus has no Sixth Amendment right to counsel for interrogation about such latter offenses (but may assert a Miranda right to counsel and to silence). Once the Sixth Amendment right has attached, it can be waived only by the knowing, intelligent, and voluntary act of the accused.

After trial, sentencing hearings are also critical stages of the process, and convicted defendants are therefore entitled to appointed counsel if they cannot afford it. Hearings on the revocation of probation or parole, on the other hand, are not deemed adversarial, and there is no guarantee of counsel there unless, as a matter of due process, the absence of counsel would render the proceedings fundamentally unfair. If a probationer's actual sentence is not determined until the point of revocation, however, counsel must be present.

Douglas v. California (1963) held that as a matter of due process and equal protection, counsel must be supplied for all appeals of right (first appeals of a conviction that the government chooses to grant to all convicted persons). There is no constitutional guarantee of counsel for further appeals to higher state appellate courts or the U.S. Supreme Court, which have discretion to hear or reject them, or for habeas corpus actions or other forms of collateral attack on a conviction, but indigents challenging a state or federal death sentence in a federal post-conviction proceeding do have a statutory right to appointed counsel.

Choice and Effectiveness of Attorneys

Defendants who retain counsel have a broad but not unfettered right to an attorney of choice, for "the essential aim of the [Sixth] Amendment is to guarantee an effective advocate for each criminal defendant rather than to ensure that a defendant will inexorably be represented by the lawyer whom he prefers" (Wheat v. United States [1988]). Thus, for example, one may not be represented by the counsel of choice if the trial judge determines that the attorney has a conflict of interest. Defendants for whom counsel is appointed have considerably less discretion, for the Supreme Court has "reject[ed] the claim that the Sixth Amendment guarantees a 'meaningful relationship' between an accused and his counsel" (Morris v. Slappy [1983]).

A confidential relationship, however, has long been considered essential to an effective right to counsel. The attorney-client privilege permits the client, and requires the attorney, to refrain from revealing any confidential communication between them (subject, under the rules of various states, to such narrow exceptions as an attorney's knowledge of a client's intention to commit a serious crime).

This restriction of the right to competent representation does not derogate the choice of self-representation at trial, for the Court has concluded that the structure of the Sixth Amendment—a compendium of personal rights, including the assistance of counsel—requires acknowledgment of the right to defend oneself. That right, however, is not unfettered, either, as persons representing themselves can be held to the normal standards of protocol and procedure, and standby counsel can be imposed on them if necessary to achieve compliance. Persons who represented themselves cannot, moreover, appeal convictions on the grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel.

The right to counsel is the right to effective assistance of counsel at any proceeding at which the right pertains. Convicted persons who had retained or appointed counsel can—presumably with a new lawyer—appeal adverse judgments on the basis of ineffective assistance but face formidable barriers to success. Under most circumstances, appellants must identify specific acts or omissions of the attorney that fell below a reasonable standard of professional assistance (overcoming a general presumption of professional competence) and establish a reasonable probability that, but for the deficiency, the outcome of the proceeding would have been different.

Such appeals are only rarely successful. Supporters of the high standard agree that “the purpose of the effective assistance guarantee of the Sixth Amendment is not to improve the quality of legal representation [but] simply to ensure that criminal defendants receive a fair trial” (Strickland v. Washington [1984]) whose result is presumably accurate; critics such as William S. Geimer fault the standard for “fostering tolerance of abysmal lawyering” that negates the presumption of an accurate result. Even if the result is accurate, however, a further question remains, posed by Justice Thurgood Marshall dissenting in Strickland: whether the Sixth Amendment is “violated when a manifestly guilty defendant is convicted after a trial in which he was represented by a manifestly ineffective attorney.” Emphasizing procedure as much as result, Marshall thought that it is.

Despite Strickland's tolerant conception of adequate performance, there is widespread recognition of a serious problem of the quality of counsel provided for indigent defendants. Public defender offices are often overworked and underfunded, systems of court-appointed attorneys often provide minimal compensation and lack quality control, and legal services companies that contract for defense services may be compensated on a lump-sum rather than fee-for-service basis and thus have an incentive to minimize time and effort spent on individual cases. The problem seems particularly acute in capital cases, where the procedures and substance of the law are especially complex and the costs of effective representation are significantly higher. A study commissioned by the U.S. Senate Committee on the Judiciary and led by James Liebman found that in 4,578 appeals of death sentences in the 1973–1995 period, 68 percent were overturned; the study cited “egregiously incompetent defense lawyers” as one of two principal causes. Many states have launched efforts to upgrade the quality of defense services in the past two decades, and in late 2004 Congress enacted the Justice for All Act, which sets standards for competent representation and authorizes federal grants to states for the improvement of systems of providing counsel to indigents in capital cases. Improvements have been spotty, however, and much remains to be done.

Counsel for Enemy Combatants

The decision in Gideon v. Wainwright (1963) guaranteed the availability if not competence of counsel for defendants in criminal cases, but in the aftermath of the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, the question of access to counsel arose for a new category of suspects. As a result of the war in Afghanistan and the attempt to dismantle the al-Qaeda network, the U.S. government designated hundreds of persons, almost all captured abroad, as enemy combatants and asserted the right to detain them indefinitely without access to counsel or the ability to contest their detention in court. The government's rationale was that the detainees were military prisoners (although not entitled to the protections of the Geneva Convention) and that no rights applied because it had not initiated criminal proceedings; access to counsel would undermine the government's goal of gaining intelligence from them and might even provide a conduit for their participation in terrorist activities.

There is no Sixth Amendment right to counsel in civil proceedings, or in proceedings in the criminal justice system that are not defined as prosecutions, even where confinement may result. There may, however, be a due process right to counsel that is unqualified, as in juvenile delinquency proceedings, or case-by-case as fundamental fairness requires, as in proceedings for deportation, termination of parental rights, revocation of probation, and civil commitment (for which there is typically a statutory right to counsel as well). Even where there is no guaranteed right, civil litigants can usually be represented by retained counsel if they can afford it, but the government adopted a much harsher position with respect to enemy combatant detainees, contending that they could be denied both access to and the services of counsel. Attorneys nevertheless filed cases on their behalf, three of which reached the Supreme Court in 2004.

Two of those cases involved American citizens. The Court ruled that the president had the authority to detain Yaser Esam Hamdi, captured in Afghanistan, as an enemy combatant, but that Hamdi had a right to a hearing before a neutral decisionmaker and was entitled to access to counsel for that purpose. By that point, the government had allowed him to meet with counsel—as a matter of discretion, not of right—presumably because it had completed its interrogation for intelligence purposes. The issue of counsel went no further in this case, as the government chose to release Hamdi rather than contest his petition for habeas corpus. The situation of the other American, José Padilla, was different because he had been apprehended at O'Hare International Airport in Chicago, held as a material witness in New York, and granted counsel before being reclassified as an enemy combatant, transferred to military custody in South Carolina, and denied further access to his lawyer. He was eventually allowed to see his attorney, but the Supreme Court declined to rule on his claim of a right to counsel and a hearing because it had been filed in federal court in New York rather than South Carolina. The case was refiled and as of this writing, a federal district court in South Carolina has ordered Padilla's release because it ruled that the president had no authority to detain an American citizen, apprehended in the United States, as an enemy combatant. Padilla will in all likelihood be detained while the government's appeal goes forward. Alternatively, the government could continue to hold him by reinstating his status as a material witness or by formally charging him with a crime; in either case, Padilla's right to counsel would be clear.

Virtually all other enemy combatant detainees were aliens, several hundred of whom were held at the American Naval Base at Guantánamo, Cuba. The sole question decided by the Court in their case was whether or not federal district courts have jurisdiction to hear habeas corpus petitions on behalf of persons in that location (which the government appears to have chosen to avoid the sphere of constitutional protection), and it ruled that they do. The government then allowed access to counsel as a matter of policy but in further proceedings in federal district court argued that the detainees nevertheless had no constitutional right to counsel or a hearing and that district courts must therefore deny their petitions—a position that would render the Supreme Court decision nugatory. As an alternative, the government had already established Combatant Status Review Tribunals, composed of three military officers, to provide the hearing before a neutral decision maker stipulated in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004). In these forums, detainees have a personal representative who is neither a lawyer nor an advocate, and are denied other procedural rights as well. As of this writing, one judge in a preliminary ruling has upheld the detainees' right to counsel, a second has ruled in favor of the government's position that there is no way detainees can challenge their detention in federal court, and a third has ruled that they are entitled to due process and that Combatant Status Review Tribunals do not meet that constitutional standard. These issues seem destined to return to the Supreme Court.

Government action in the wake of 9/11 also raised new issues with respect to the scope of the attorney-client privilege. The settled understanding had been that the government was prohibited from monitoring attorney-client conversations unless it had obtained a court order by establishing probable cause to believe that the parties were furthering a crime. In the wake of the terrorist attacks, however, the government promulgated a new rule of the Federal Bureau of Prisons under which the attorney general may order the monitoring of such conversations if the head of a federal law enforcement or intelligence agency has determined that there is reasonable suspicion that a particular inmate might use meetings with his or her attorney to further acts of terrorism. Advance notice of monitoring is to be given, communications are to be screened by a privilege team independent of the prosecution, and the team is not to disclose any information without the approval of a federal judge unless necessary to forestall an imminent act of violence or terrorism. As of this writing, the government does not acknowledge a right to counsel for enemy combatants in military custody, and that issue is still in litigation. Where it allows consultation as a matter of discretion, however, the government frequently monitors the meetings.

Enforcement of the right to counsel has engendered less controversy than enforcement of many other fundamental rights, perhaps because it relates more obviously to procedure than to result. Issues of its scope, as to both the persons it covers and the extent of that coverage, will, however, continue to arise and to occupy the courts.

RIGHT TO COUNSEL

JOHN B. TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- Bernhard, Adele. "Effective Assistance of Counsel." In Wrongly Convicted: Perspectives on Failed Justice, edited by Sandra D. Westervelt and John A. Humphrey. New Brunswick, N.J.: Rutgers University Press, 2001.
- Geimer, William S., A Decade of Strickland's Tin Horn: Doctrinal and Practical Undermining of the Right to Counsel, William and Mary Bill of Rights Journal 4 (1995): 91–178.
- Harlow, Caroline Wolf. Defense Counsel in Criminal Cases. U.S. Department of Justice Bureau of Justice Statistics Special Report. Washington, D.C., 2000. <http://www.ojp.usdoj.gov/bjs/id.htm>.
- Liebman, James, Jeffrey Fagan, and Valerie West. A Broken System: Error Rates in Capital Cases, 1973–1995. A Study Commissioned by the U.S. Senate Judiciary Committee. Washington, D.C., 2000. <http://justice.policy.net/proactive/newsroom/release.vtml?id=18200>.
- Taylor, John B. Right to Counsel and Privilege against Self-Incrimination: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-CLIO Press, 2004.
- Tomkovicz, James J. The Right to the Assistance of Counsel: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, Conn.: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Argersinger v. Hamlin*, 407 U.S. 25 (1972)
- Brewer v. Williams*, 430 U.S. 387 (1977)
- Douglas v. California*, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
- Escobedo v. Illinois*, 378 U.S. 478 (1964)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld*, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
- Kirby v. Illinois*, 406 U.S. 682 (1972)
- Massiah v. United States*, 377 U.S. 201 (1964)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Morris v. Slappy*, 461 U.S. 1 (1983)
- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Strickland v. Washington*, 466 U.S. 668 (1984)
- United States v. Ash*, 413 U.S. 300 (1973)
- United States v. Wade*, 388 U.S. 218 (1967)
- Wheat v. United States*, 486 U.S. 153 (1988)

RIGHT TO COUNSEL (VI)

English and American Origins

During the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries in England, criminal trials in the common-law courts were brief, informal affairs in which victims, their relatives, or, occasionally, hired attorneys prosecuted charges against defendants, who were assumed to be guilty unless they could successfully refute the charges. That was difficult, as defendants typically were incarcerated until trial, not informed of formal charges or evidence against them, and unable to compel the testimony of witnesses. A major additional handicap was that persons accused of felonies and treason, for which death and forfeiture of estate were a likely penalty, were forbidden to employ counsel to assist them. It has been suggested that trials were considered sufficiently simple and straightforward for laymen to handle, and that judges were deemed capable of protecting the interests of all parties, but these explanations do not square with the right of persons accused of trespasses or misdemeanors (including lesser political offenses) to retain counsel. This curious disparity is best explained by the conclusion that, especially in the revolutionary seventeenth century, the government placed such a premium on security that it was unwilling to grant any significant advantage in the trial contest to those offenders who presented a serious threat to the authority of the regime.

With the restoration of political stability after the Glorious Revolution of 1688, and in the wake of a series of false treason charges prosecuted by trained attorneys for the Crown, Parliament passed the Treason Act of 1695, granting defendants the right to retain counsel in treason cases and requiring courts to provide counsel if requested. This first legislative modification of the common-law rule of counsel was followed by a gradual change in judicial practice in felony cases, which were increasingly prosecuted by aggressive attorneys employed by the state, or sometimes by private parties. To redress the resulting imbalance in expertise, judges began to allow the appearance of defense counsel, a practice that had become common by the end of the eighteenth century. The role as well as the appearance of defense counsel, however, remained at the discretion of trial judges. There was considerable variation from one case and court to another, but counsel were typically confined to examining and cross-examining witnesses and arguing questions of law while prohibited from addressing the jury and arguing or interpreting matters of fact. The traditional expectation that innocent defendants could give a good account of themselves persisted, and defendants were thus called upon to speak for themselves on these matters.

The gradual transition from common-law practice to statutorily enacted right continued until 1836, when an act of Parliament established the right to the full assistance of counsel for all criminal defendants. The final step was taken in 1903, when Parliament established the right of indigent defendants to appointed counsel.

During the seventeenth century, trial procedures in the American colonies were essentially the same as in England. Few trained lawyers were available, so private parties typically prosecuted those who had offended against them, and the accused defended themselves. Procedures were formalized in America earlier than in England, however, and by the turn of the eighteenth century every colony was represented by professionally trained public prosecutors in criminal cases. With lawyers more numerous and the status of the profession enhanced as the need to protect the rights of colonists against the oppression of the British authorities grew clearer, defendants were increasingly represented by counsel. Rhode Island granted a statutory right to retained counsel in 1660, Delaware, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina enacted that right for serious cases early in the eighteenth century, and after independence, North Carolina, Virginia, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire enacted some form of protection. Meanwhile, Delaware and Pennsylvania created a constitutional right to counsel in their charters of 1701, and after independence Delaware, New Jersey, Maryland, New York, Massachusetts, and New Hampshire adopted constitutional guarantees of counsel. By the time of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, therefore, eleven states recognized a general right to counsel by statute, constitutional provision, or both; Connecticut abided by a deep common law tradition to the same effect; and several states made at least some provision for appointment of defense counsel by the state. Only Georgia continued to adhere to the discretionary common-law practice of the British—a defect that would be remedied by the adoption of a constitution in 1798.

Throughout the process in which the First Congress proposed, and the states ratified, constitutional amendments that would become the Bill of Rights in 1791, James Madison's language with respect to counsel—"in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to have the assistance of counsel for his defence"—remained unchanged and went undiscussed. Since the states had already come to the conclusion that the right was fundamental (Georgia did not participate in ratification), such consensus without debate—while disappointing to those seeking guidance from the intent of the framers—is not surprising. Two caveats must, however, be noted. First, because the Federal Crimes Act of 1790 provided for the appointment of counsel for persons accused of treason and other capital offenses, it is clear that the framers of the Sixth Amendment saw it as an affirmation of the right to retain counsel but not as a guarantee of the assistance of counsel regardless of ability to pay. Over the next century and a half, federal courts increasingly did provide counsel in felony cases, but there was no federal statutory or constitutional guarantee of representation for the indigent. Second, as the decision in Barron v. Baltimore (1833) would make clear, the Bill of Rights bound only the federal government, and the Sixth Amendment right to counsel would not apply to the states—where most criminal prosecutions occur—until 1963. State constitutional provisions did not guarantee representation of the indigent, either, although legislation and judicial practice did so to some extent. In both state and federal jurisdictions, then, the right to retain counsel had been secured by the end of the 1790s, but the scope of the right and the availability of counsel for indigents would vary among jurisdictions until well into the twentieth century.

Development of the Modern Right to Counsel at Trial

The Fourteenth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, ratified in 1868, contains the prohibition that "[n]o State shall ... deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law," and litigants soon began to argue that rights protected against federal invasion by the Bill of Rights were a part of due process of law and thus now protected against state invasion as well. The Supreme Court rejected this interpretation in Hurtado v. California (1884) but gradually relented and, over the next nine decades, incorporated most provisions of the Bill of Rights into the due process clause and thus applied them to the states, including the right to counsel in 1963. The groundwork for that result was laid much earlier, however, for in criminal cases in the 1920s the Court began to hold the states to a more rigorous standard of due process as fundamental fairness, independent of specific provisions of the Bill of Rights.

The elaboration of the modern right to counsel by the Supreme Court began in Powell v. Alabama (1932), an appeal from the notorious Scottsboro trials in which nine young and severely disadvantaged black men were falsely convicted of the rape of white women and sentenced to death by all-white juries in the old rural South. Disregarding other serious procedural shortcomings, the Court focused on the facts that the defendants were incapable of defending themselves, had no realistic opportunity or ability to retain an attorney, and were represented by court-appointed counsel who did not meet them until the morning of the trial and, without preparation, merely went through the motions of conducting a defense. In view of the circumstances—defendants who were ignorant and in some cases illiterate, imprisoned in a hostile environment far from home and out of touch with family and friends—the Court overturned the convictions because it found violations of due process in both the trial judge’s failure to afford the defendants a reasonable opportunity to secure counsel and, assuming their inability to do so, in his failure to make an effective appointment of counsel. Due process includes the right to a hearing, the Court ruled, and the right to a hearing includes the right to be assisted by counsel.

The issue of indigent defendants’ constitutional right to counsel had thus come to the fore, and it would be handled differently for state and federal trials. The Powell opinion asserted that even the intelligent and educated layman has small and sometimes no skill in the science of law.... He lacks both the skill and knowledge adequately to prepare his defense, even though he had a perfect one. He requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him. Without it, though he be not guilty, he faces the danger of conviction because he does not know how to establish his innocence.

The logical corollary of that interpretation is that every criminal defendant is entitled to counsel, regardless of circumstances, and in Johnson v. Zerbst (1938) the Court held that the Sixth Amendment requires federal courts to appoint counsel for defendants unable to obtain it unless they intelligently waive that right.

The holding in Powell, as opposed to its rhetoric, led, however, to a more complex and torturous course of constitutional development in state cases. Powell did not incorporate the Sixth Amendment right to counsel and apply it to the states, but rather held that the lack of counsel could amount to a denial of due process (as in that case, where defendants facing capital charges were unable to defend themselves or retain counsel). The question then became, under what circumstances was due process denied by the absence of counsel? The Court was soon asked to hold that the lack of counsel was per se a denial of due process, but in Betts v. Brady (1942) it declined to do so, on the basis of an exhaustive review of colonial and state history and practice indicating that provision of counsel was regarded as a matter of policy and not as an essential component of a fair trial. This result was compatible with Zerbst, the Court argued, because due process “formulates a concept less rigid and more fluid” than the “specific guarantees found in the Sixth Amendment,” one which avoids the “danger of ... formulating the guarantee into a set of hard and fast rules, the application of which in a given case may be to ignore the qualifying factors therein disclosed.”

Betts thus established a subjective standard for the right to counsel in state cases: due process required the appointment of counsel for indigent defendants only when the circumstances of the offense, the defendant, or the law were such that a trial in the absence of counsel would be fundamentally unfair—the special circumstances rule. The justices quickly agreed that a capital offense was such a special circumstance, but in a series of cases over the next two decades they were unable to formulate a coherent standard of special circumstances or to achieve a consistent line of decisions. Newly appointed justices rejected the Betts approach, and the Court agreed to reconsider that decision in a case from Florida, Gideon v. Wainwright (1963).

The cases were remarkably similar, involving unschooled men defending themselves against uncomplicated charges of theft, but Gideon’s was far more dramatic, as his petition was printed in pencil on prison stationery and filed in forma pauperis (in the manner of a pauper, for which normal fees and technical standards are waived). Prominent Washington attorney (and later Supreme Court Justice) Abe Fortas, assigned by the Court to represent Gideon, made two principal arguments: that representation by counsel is always essential for a fair trial, and that the special circumstances rule in practice had led to error, confusion, unfairness, and frequent reversals and retrials that burdened both states and defendants. A unanimous Supreme Court overturned Gideon’s conviction, overruled Betts v. Brady, and incorporated the Sixth Amendment right to counsel into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, thereby applying it to the states. For indigent defendants in state courts, the decision meant that they had the same right to a lawyer as defendants in federal court. For the states, it meant no great doctrinal change, as most had already made provision for counsel for the indigent (and of twenty-four states filing amicus curiae briefs in the case, all but two had supported Gideon). Many states did upgrade their defense services, however. For Clarence Earl Gideon, the decision meant a new trial in Florida, in which he was acquitted with the aid of W. Fred Turner, a competent local attorney.

On the same day that it decided Gideon, the Court also held in Douglas v. California (1963) that the equal protection and due process clauses require that counsel be supplied to indigents for appeals of right (appeals to which all convicted persons are entitled). Eleven years later, however, it held in Ross v. Moffitt (1974) that there is no constitutional right to appointed counsel for further appeals that are heard at the discretion of appellate courts.

A final component of the evolution of the right to counsel at trial concerned the issue of petty offenses, which reflected a more fundamental issue of federalism. Supreme Court decisions regulating state criminal justice procedures, especially in the era of the Warren Court, occurred in a context of similar regulation in the fields of desegregation, separation of church and state, and legislative apportionment that engendered significant political and philosophical opposition to perceived federal encroachment on state prerogatives. The Gideon decision, which applied to felonies, did not exacerbate that sentiment because states had generally adopted the same policy of their own accord, but the extension of the right to appointed counsel to persons facing lesser offenses would entail a much greater policy shift and a much larger administrative and financial burden.

The Court confronted this issue in Argersinger v. Hamlin (1972) and devised a formula that struck a balance between concern for the rights of the accused and deference to state policy making: “absent a knowing and intelligent waiver, no person may be imprisoned for any offense, whether classified as petty, misdemeanor, or felony, unless he was represented by counsel at his trial.” States may not impose a sentence of imprisonment on an indigent defendant for whom counsel was not supplied, but they may choose where to draw the line between offenses for which they will supply counsel and those for which they will not. In Scott v. Illinois (1979), the Court affirmed that counsel is required only when imprisonment is actually imposed, not when it is authorized but not imposed.

The Gideon, Douglas, and Argersinger decisions mark the major boundaries of the process by which the Sixth Amendment right to the assistance of counsel was extended to defendants in state as well as federal cases, regardless of ability to pay, for trials and appeals of right. In the same period, In re Gault (1967) held that minors facing juvenile delinquency proceedings that may result in confinement have an equivalent right to counsel as a matter of due process (although they commonly waive it in practice). It is also important to note that in Miranda v. Arizona (1966), the Supreme Court created a limited Fifth Amendment right to counsel that applies in some circumstances where the Sixth Amendment right does not, for it may be invoked by any suspect taken into custody and facing interrogation, as a means of protecting the privilege against compelled self-incrimination (though once again, the right is waived by a large majority of suspects). Further issues of the applicability and scope of the contemporary Sixth Amendment right to counsel are explored in an article on that topic.

JOHN B. TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- Beane, William M. The Right to Counsel in American Courts. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1955.
 Heller, Francis. The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States. New York: Greenwood Press, [1951] 1969.
 Lewis, Anthony. Gideon's Trumpet. New York: Random House, 1964.
 Taylor, John B. Right to Counsel and Privilege against Self-Incrimination: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara, Calif.: ABC-Clio Press, 2004.
 Tomkovicz, James J. The Right to the Assistance of Counsel: A Reference Guide to the United States Constitution. Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Argersinger v. Hamlin*, 407 U.S. 25 (1972)
Barron v. Baltimore, 32 U.S. (7 Pet.) 243 (1833)
Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)
Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
Hurtado v. California, 110 U.S. 516 (1884)
In re Gault, 387 U.S. 1 (1967)
Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938)
Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
Ross v. Moffitt, 417 U.S. 600 (1974)
Scott v. Illinois, 440 U.S. 367 (1979)

See also Right to Counsel

RIGHT TO DIE

See Physician-Assisted Suicide

RIGHT TO KNOW

The right to know is also referred to as “freedom of information” or “government in the sunshine.” The right to know encompasses two rights of citizenship: the right to examine records and documents possessed by governments and the right to participate in government proceedings. The first is typically guaranteed by a state constitution or a freedom of information act or public records act. The right to participate refers to the right to observe deliberations of government and public bodies and to comment audibly or in writing on matters before them. While the right to know is protected by various state statutes and constitutional provisions, and various federal statutes as well, it does not receive direct protection under the First Amendment. That is to say, the Supreme Court has refused to treat the First Amendment as a “Freedom of Information Act.”

RIGHT TO KNOW

Access to information in the possession of governmental bodies and observation of the proceedings and deliberations of governmental bodies ensure that government actions are transparent. When actions are transparent, the official who is responsible for them will be fully accountable for them.

Governments restrict the right to know in various ways. These include restrictive definitions of “public documents,” and of “public bodies,” and by excluding classes of documents or matters from public examination. These exemptions have been based upon claims of invasion of privacy, trade secrets, proprietary information, ongoing law enforcement investigations, national security, “records that, by their nature, must be confidential in order for the government to avoid the frustration of a legitimate government function,” and other evidentiary privileges. Governments may also limit the enforcement of a right to know by requiring fees for examination and copying of documents, by failing to give notice of meetings, and by imposing upon citizens the costs judicial enforcement of the right.

The most expansive right in the United States is found in the Constitution of the State of Montana. It guarantees “the right to examine documents or to observe the deliberations of all public bodies or agencies of state government and its subdivisions, except in cases in which the demand of individual privacy clearly exceeds the merits of public disclosure,” and “the right to expect governmental agencies to afford such reasonable opportunity for citizen participation in the operation of the agencies prior to the final decision as may be provided by law.” Montana also requires offending governments to pay the attorneys’ fees of a person who prevails in an action to enforce the right to know.

JEFFREY RENZ

Cases and Statutes Cited

California Constitution, Article I, Section 3
Montana Constitution (1972), Article II, Sections 8, 9
New Hampshire Constitution (1784) (as amended), Article 8

See also Freedom of Information Act (1966); Freedom of Information and Sunshine Laws

RIGHT TO PETITION

The First Amendment provides that “Congress shall make no law ... abridging ... the right of the people ... to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.” Under modern Supreme Court jurisprudence, the right to petition has been almost completely collapsed into freedom of speech. Yet the right was meant to have independent scope.

Before it was explicitly recognized in the Constitution, the right to petition had a long-standing Anglo-American pedigree as a right independent of general free speech and press rights. The Magna Carta first formally recognized the right to petition the king. Initially, the right applied only to certain nobles. Later, Parliament claimed the right to petition as a quid pro quo for its approval of royal requests for new taxes. In 1669, Parliament recognized the right of every British subject to petition Parliament, and in 1689 the Declaration of Rights established that not only is it “the right of the subjects to petition the king,” but that “all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning is illegal.” At a time when the king was considered above the law, petitions were the only method short of revolt to seek redress for illegal royal action.

By the late seventeenth century, petitions were the public’s primary means of communicating with government officials and were directed to all levels of government, including the royal bureaucracy and Parliament. Moreover, the king and Parliament generally treated petitions seriously and worked to resolve legitimate grievances raised by petitions. Much of the legislation passed by Parliament over a period of centuries was introduced in response to petitions from the public.

Petitioning naturally spread to the American colonies. In 1642, the Massachusetts Body of Liberties became the first colonial charter to provide explicit protection for the right to petition. By the time of the American Revolution, five other colonies—Delaware, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, and Vermont—had followed suit. The other colonies recognized the right informally. Throughout British North America, petitioning was an important way for individuals to express their views to the local governing bodies, especially colonial assemblies. The assemblies, following English tradition, treated petitions seriously and often referred them to committees for further action. Petitions were not always granted, but they were always answered.

In 1774, the Declaration and Resolves of the First Continental Congress proclaimed that the colonists “have a right peaceably to assemble, consider of their grievances, and petition the King; and that all prosecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments for the same, are illegal.” The emphasis on the government’s lack of power to punish a citizen for petitioning made the right to petition more robust in the Revolutionary era than the more general right to freedom of speech. Colonial governments generally recognized the right to freedom of speech, but this typically meant only that laws could not create prior restraints on speech. The right to petition, however, had a full legal pedigree. When considering the Bill of Rights, Congress approved the right to petition with little controversy.

The right to petition only guarantees that citizens can communicate with the sovereign through petitions. It does not guarantee that the sovereign will respond in any particular way, or indeed, at all. Parliament and colonial legislatures nevertheless felt obligated to respond to every petition, but that was because those bodies had judicial as well as legislative functions. In the American constitutional scheme, judicial power rests solely in the judicial branch, and the judiciary is the only branch of government that is always obligated to consider and respond to petitions submitted to it. The executive branch (including for these purposes the independent regulatory agencies) may arguably have the obligation to respond to petitions when, in the modern administrative era, it is exercising judicial-like functions.

Congress initially took petitions very seriously, following the tradition of its colonial forebears. The House of Representatives scheduled time into its regular business in order to hear petitions on the floor. Typically, the Representative of the petitioner’s state would assume the role of referring the petition to a special committee for consideration. The committee considered petitions and reported to Congress, resulting either in a consideration of a bill or rejection of the petition.

The exception was in petitions regarding slavery. A pattern developed by which Congress responded to petitions by sending them to committee, where they ultimately died without being answered, rejected, or denied. In 1836 the House adopted a rule that “all petitions relating ... to the subject of slavery or the abolition of slavery shall, without being either printed or referred, be laid upon the table and that no further action whatever by had thereon.” In 1840, the House ruled that it would not receive abolitionist petitions at all. After a fierce debate over the right to petition, led in part by Congressman John Quincy Adams, the House repealed the “gag rule” in 1844, but thereafter antislavery petitions simply died in committee as before. Unlike those from the abolitionist movement, petitions regarding such issues as the National Bank, expulsion of Cherokees from Georgia, and the Alien and Sedition Acts, among many others, were duly considered by Congress.

The right to petition became less important, as modern democratic politics gradually replaced petitioning and public protests as the primary means for constituents to express their views to their representatives. Today, Congress treats most petitions in a pro forma way. A representative may present a petition on behalf of a private party to the Clerk of the House who enters it in the Journal.

Although the right to petition is somewhat anachronistic in modern times and has largely been subsumed in the right to freedom of speech, it continues to have some independent weight. Most important, under the Noerr-Pennington doctrine an effort to influence the exercise of government power, even for the purpose of gaining an anticompetitive advantage, does not create liability under the antitrust laws (Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc. [1961], Mine Workers v. Pennington [1965]). The Supreme Court initially adopted this doctrine under the guise of freedom of speech, but it more precisely finds its constitutional home in the right to petition. Unlike speech, which can often be punished in the antitrust context, as when corporate officers verbally agree to collude, the right to petition confers absolute immunity on efforts to influence government policy in a noncorrupt way. Noerr-Pennington has been expanded beyond its original antitrust context to all situations in which plaintiffs attempt to use a defendant’s lobbying activity or filing of a lawsuit (provided the lawsuit was not a sham) as evidence of illegal conduct. For example, trade associations cannot be held liable in tort for lobbying the government for lenient safety standards for their industry.

DAVID E. BERNSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil. The Bill of Rights: Creation and Reconstruction. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1998.
- Hague v. CIO*, 307 U.S. 252 (1941).
- Lawson, Gary, and Guy Seidman, Downsizing the Right to Petition, Northwestern University Law Review 93 (1996): 739.
- Mark, Gregory A., The Vestigial Constitution: The History and Significance of the Right to Petition, Fordham Law Review 66 (1998): 2153.
- Smith, Don L. “The Right to Petition for the Redress of Grievances: Constitutional Development and Interpretations.” Ph.D. diss., 1971 (University Microfilms International).

RIGHT TO PETITION

United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U.S. 542 (1875).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Eastern Railroad Presidents Conference v. Noerr Motor Freight, Inc., 365 U.S. 127 (1961)
Mine Workers v. Pennington, 381 U.S. 657 (1965)

RIGHT TO REPLY AND RIGHT OF THE PRESS

Although it has never been the First Amendment’s concern that the press be fair, that issue has emerged as a serious concern with the increased monopolization of newspapers in their circulation areas. If the injured person cannot respond to an editorial’s personal accusations in another paper of equal stature and audience, does the editorializing newspaper’s refusal to print the response in its own pages undermine the purposes of the free press clause’s protections?

This was the question considered by the U.S. Supreme Court in Miami Publishing Co. v. Tornillo (1974). In Tornillo, a Florida political candidate invoked a state right-to-reply law after the Miami Herald editorialized against his election. The Herald’s refusal was taken to the Supreme Court, which ruled against Tornillo. In its decision, the Court held the right-to-reply law unconstitutional for three reasons.

First, reply rights of candidates would impose costs on newspapers. To make room for the reply, the paper might forgo publishing other content, or incur expenses to publish the added content. Second, reply rights would chill editorial speech. If an editor knew that the newspaper would be required to publish a response, he or she might decide to forgo the critical editorial completely.

Most importantly, a mandated right to reply intrudes on editorial autonomy. Although the parameters of constitutionally protected “editorial judgment” were left unelaborated by the Court, it relied on broad principles. The First Amendment on its face proscribes state action, but does not require press responsibility. In other words, the free press clause means that the press must be free, not fair.

Two contradictory justifications for the press’s constitutional protections collide in this decision. On the one hand, it is common to hear that the press guarantees are designed to foster vibrant political debate. In the airing of different positions on matters of public concern, citizens become informed on important questions, and thus better prepared to make wise decisions regarding public policy. From this perspective, the intentions of the First Amendment are furthered, not hindered, by a right-to-reply statute.

Alternatively, the Constitution envisions the press serving as a “check” on the abuses of government, earning the press the sobriquet of the “Fourth Estate.” This was the face of the press most famously on display during the Watergate investigations. This function would be seriously compromised if the government could control content in the press, and thus a right-of-reply statute must fall.

The Court implicitly found in Tornillo that the balance favored the checking function over the informed debate function. Because conditions have changed since 1974, however, it should not be presumed that the balance today favors the same outcome.

The reluctance to impose a fairness requirement on the press made more sense when alternative outlets were easily available. Few markets today have more than one newspaper, and thus a refusal to publish a reply is tantamount to preventing an alternative viewpoint from becoming known to the public. Similar limited accessibility allowed the Supreme Court, in Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC (1969), to uphold a fairness rule imposed on broadcast media. (This rule was repealed administratively in 1987.) As print outlets approach the scarcity of broadcast frequencies, the Tornillo rationale to reject right-to-reply statutes might require rethinking.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

Bezanson, Randall P. How Free Can the Press Be? Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2003.
Powe, Lucas A., Jr. The Fourth Estate and the Constitution: Freedom of the Press in America. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1991.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miami Publishing Co. v. Tornillo, 418 U.S. 241 (1974)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co. v. FCC, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

See also Freedom of Speech and Press: Nineteenth Century; Press Clause (I): Framing and History from Colonial Period up to Early National Period

RIGHT TO TRAVEL

Some cherished individual rights do not appear in the U.S. Constitution. One prominent example is the right of privacy; another is the right to travel. Former U.S. Supreme Court Justice William Douglas observed, “[f]reedom of movement is the very essence of our free society, setting us apart.... [I]t often makes all other rights meaningful.”

The right to travel, while not expressly contained in the text of the U.S. Constitution, is ingrained throughout this nation’s history. Regardless, many have had trouble interpreting the basis for this now commonly accepted right.

When Judge Bushrod Washington handed down his famous decision in Corfield v. Coryell (1823), the right to travel was a matter of first impression in American jurisprudence. The court held that the State of New Jersey could prevent nonresidents from raking oysters in its waters, whereas in dictum it proscribed prohibition of interstate travel under the protections afforded by the Article IV privileges or immunities clause. The court articulated the perimeters of the rights therein, finding that the privileges or immunities clause protects the right to travel as well as the rights of citizens who have arrived or relocated in a new state.

In 1873, the Court decided the Slaughterhouse Cases, which dealt with Louisiana’s quasi-monopoly of in favor of the slaughtering business. Competing businesses challenged the state’s action, contending that the contract award constituted “involuntary servitude” in violation of privileges and immunities and in defiance of equal protection of the law. Moreover, competitors accused the state denying them the right to liberty and property without due process of law. The Supreme Court held that the alleged monopoly violated neither the Thirteenth nor Fourteenth Amendments. For the most part, the Court devoted its opinion to the narrow construction of the privileges and immunities clause, which it interpreted as applicable to national citizenship, not state citizenship. This distinction has fostered much confusion in courts’ application of this ruling.

In Edwards v. California (1941), the Supreme Court looked to the commerce clause as an alternate source of protection. The Court held that a law prohibiting importations of indigents into California exceeded the scope of a state’s police power, thus unconstitutionally interfering with interstate commerce.

In Shapiro v. Thompson (1969), the Supreme Court declared the conditioning of welfare aid on various residency requirements unconstitutional under the Fourteenth Amendment’s equal protection clause. While the comprehensiveness of Shapiro has been tested over time, courts have consistently deemed durational residency requirements unconstitutionally burdensome on the right to travel. Gradually, the Court has expanded the scope of Shapiro’s protection so as to render unconstitutional state-prescribed deterrents to resettlement in other states.

Recently, the Supreme Court revived the Fourteenth Amendment privileges or immunities clause, which had largely remained dormant since the Slaughterhouse Cases. In 1999, the Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment protects the right to travel in three ways: permitting citizens to move freely about the states, securing the right to be treated equally in all states when visiting, and ensuring the rights of new citizens to be treated the same as long-established residents of a state. In Saenz v. Roe (1999), plaintiffs, having moved to California for the purposes of seeking employment sought to enjoin the state’s use of a durational residency requirement which as applied would have limited plaintiffs’ welfare benefits to the amount received in their former states of residence. The district court granted the injunction and the Ninth Circuit affirmed. The U.S. Supreme Court granted certiorari and in a seven-to-two decision affirmed. The Court explained that by paying first-year residents the same welfare benefits as those collected in their state of origin, states created two classes of residents and rendered services discriminatorily.

While the right to travel is sometimes difficult to interpret, or ground in a specific part of clause of the U.S. Constitution, it is an enduring “right” within American constitutional jurisprudence.

LAUREN M. WEBB and MARC M. HARROLD

References and Further Reading

- Harrold, Marc M., Constitutional Law—“Right to Travel”—Fourteenth Amendment Privileges or Immunities Clause Invalidates a State’s Durational Residency Requirement for Full Welfare Benefits, Mississippi Law Journal 69 (Winter 1999): 993.
- Strasser, Mark, The Privileges of National Citizenship: On Saenz, Same-Sex Couples, and the Right to Travel, Rutgers Law Review 52 (Winter 2000): 553.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aptheker v. Secretary of State*, 378 U.S. 500, 520 (1964) (Douglas J., concurring).
- Corfield v. Coryell*, 6 F. Cas. 546 (E.D. Pa. 1823)
- Edwards v. California*, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)
- Saenz v. Roe*, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)
- Shapiro v. Thompson*, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)
- Slaughterhouse Cases*, 83 U.S. 36 (1873)

RIGHT TO VOTE FOR INDIVIDUALS WITH DISABILITIES

The right to vote is basic to our democratic way of life yet many individuals with disabilities find themselves unable to vote confidentially and independently.

Early Statutory Protections

Congress has been tackling the problem of voting rights for individuals with disabilities since 1965. The 1965 Voting Rights Act contains a provision requiring that “[a]ny voter who requires assistance to vote by reason of blindness, disability, or inability to read or write may be given assistance by a person of the voter’s choice.” (See Voting Rights Act of 1965 [amended 1984].) The 1965 statute did nothing to correct the problem of access to polling places. It simply eliminated the secret ballot requirement for individuals with disabilities.

Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act

In 1984, Congress focused more specifically on the problem of access to polling places with enactment of the Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act (VAEHA). The purpose of this act was “to promote the fundamental right to vote by improving access for handicapped and elderly individuals to registration facilities and polling places for federal elections.” It only applies to federal elections.

With respect to voter registration, the act requires each state to make available: (1) instructions, printed in large type, conspicuously displayed at each permanent registration facility and each polling place, and (2) information by telecommunication devices for the deaf. The VAEHA also provides that states must permit disabled voters to vote by absentee ballot without notarization or medical certification, unless the individual desires: (1) to automatically receive an application or a ballot on a continuing basis, or (2) to apply for an absentee ballot after the deadline has passed.

The act defines “disability” broadly as including anyone who has “a temporary or permanent physical disability.” A temporary, broken leg is therefore a disability under the 1984 Act even though it is not a disability under the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA). Although absentee voting may not be the desirable or preferable option for an individual with a disability, the 1984 Act does provide that it must be an option for disabled voters.

The 1984 Act also contains provisions that were designed to improve the accessibility of polling places. It provides that each political subdivision responsible for conducting elections must assure that all polling places for federal elections are accessible to disabled voters. It also provides that disabled voters may make an advance request to be assigned to an accessible polling place or be provided with an alternate means of casting a ballot on the day of the election if they have been assigned to an inaccessible polling place.

Americans with Disabilities Act

Some voting rights litigation has also been brought under the ADA, which prohibits public entities from engaging in discrimination. In 2000, the New York Attorney General brought a suit on behalf of disabled voters to require several counties to make their polling places compliant with the ADA. This suit resulted in injunctive relief and set the important precedent that a state attorney general could sue on behalf of disabled voters (People of New York ex rel. Spitzer v. County of Delaware [2000]). Unlike cases brought under other statutes, the ADA can be used to make polling places accessible for state elections.

Help America Vote Act

President George W. Bush signed the Help America Vote Act (HAVA) into law on October 29, 2002. HAVA gives states significant financial incentives to implement accessibility. It also requires that every polling place in the county must have at least one voting system that is accessible to individuals with disabilities by January 1, 2006.

HAVA is stronger than previous laws in specifying that individuals are to have access to secret and independent voting opportunities. It states that voting systems shall be “accessible for individuals with disabilities, including nonvisual accessibility for the blind and visually impaired, in a manner that provides the same opportunity for access and participation (including privacy and independence) as for other voters.”

Constitutional Protection

In Tennessee v. Lane (2004), the Supreme Court implied that access to voting booths is a fundamental right under the U.S. Constitution. Possibly, litigants will use that ruling in the future to challenge accessibility barriers that limit their ability to vote.

Prior to the Lane decision, however, litigation was not a fruitful option for disabled voters. For example, Michigan voters challenged a state statute that provided that the state may require that a blind person accepts assistance to mark his or her ballot. They argued that this statute violated their right to vote in secrecy, and that they must be provided with technology which would permit them to vote independently and privately. The Sixth Circuit held that the Michigan statute was lawful and constitutional (Nelson v. Miller [1999]). But in American Association of People with Disabilities v. Smith (2002) the Court held that state election officials failed to approve voting systems that would permit visually and manually impaired voters to vote without assistance, and in American Association of People with Disabilities v. Hood (2004), the Court held that a county elections supervisor had violated ADA regulations in utilizing optical scan voting system—visually impaired voters could not use optical scan system without third-party assistance and manually impaired voters could have voted unassisted using touch screen technology.

RUTH COLKER

Cases and Statutes Cited

American Association of People with Disabilities v. Smith, 227 F.Supp.2d 1276 (M.D. Fla. 2002)
American Association of People with Disabilities v. Hood, 310 F. Supp. 2d 1226 (M.D. Fla. 2004)
Nelson v. Miller, 170 F.3d 641 (6th Cir. 1999)
People of New York ex rel. Spitzer v. County of Delaware, 82 F. Supp.2d 12 (N.D.N.Y. 2000)
Tennessee v. Lane, 124 S. Ct. 1978, 1993 (2004)
 Help America Vote Act, 42 U.S.C., section 15301 et seq.
 Voting Accessibility for the Elderly and Handicapped Act, 42 U.S.C. Section 1973ee-1(b)

See also Voting Rights Act of 1965

RIGHT v. PRIVILEGE DISTINCTION

The distinction between rights and privileges was not well established during the founding era, when rights were often regarded as conferred by monarchs rather than by nature or the social contract, and the language reflected this, even as the natural rights philosophy of John Locke and others was becoming ascendant. However, as political philosophers and legal scholars thought through the implications of their ideas, they came to realize that they needed to make a distinction among legal claims based on the sources of those claims.

One of the early political philosophers to develop the distinction was Algernon Sidney:

The Israelites, Spartans, Romans and others, who thus framed their governments according to their own will, did it not by any peculiar privilege, but by a universal right conferred upon them by God and nature.

Although he did not make it as explicit as he could have, Locke laid the basis for two sources of rights: nature and the social contract. He identified three primary rights: life, liberty, and property, but left open the impression that the source for all of them was nature, when some further thought reveals that if property is title and not just possession, that survives the loss of possession, then it only makes sense in the context of a society, which suggests the source is the social contract.

Some of the rights not discussed by Locke are due process and the right to a presumption of nonauthority implicit in the common law prerogative writs, mainly of habeas corpus, quo warranto, mandamus, prohibito, procedendo, and certiorari, as recognized in the Ninth Amendment. Again, these rights only make sense in the context of a society or its government, which suggests their source is either the social contract or the constitution of government, or a combination thereof.

Some claims called “rights” only make sense in the context of government, such as the citizenship rights of voting and holding public office. Others, such as the rights of denizenship, of remaining at and returning to one’s place of residence, can make sense in the context of a society in exclusive dominion of a territory, which need not have a government.

That leaves legal claims that arise from private contracts and from statutes or other acts of government officials. A monopoly on the use of a business name is clearly not one that is a “right” in the same sense as life or liberty. Thomas Jefferson recognized this in the Declaration of Independence when he stated that the rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, are “inalienable,” with a more fundamental status than holding public office or a license to hunt on public land. To distinguish between rights proper, which can be disabled or deprived only by due process, and claims that are conferred by government and may be withdrawn at any time by government, a different term was needed, and the word usually chosen was “privilege.”

This distinction can be seen in the language of the Fourteenth Amendment, which uses the terms “privileges and immunities.” By ancient usage, an “immunity” was a right against the positive action of government, and by the time the amendment was drafted in 1868, it was understood that all of the “rights” recognized by the Constitution and Bill of Rights were actually claims against the positive action of government that could not be withdrawn, and were therefore “immunities.” But the framers of the Fourteenth Amendment also wanted to include claims that were conferred by government, that is, privileges.

Since then, however, there has been a steady movement to reduce rights, or immunities, to privileges, and to restrict or withdraw them. It was once considered a matter of common right to engage in an occupation or profession of one's choice, but today many professions, such as the practice of medicine or law, are licensed, although the way the practice of law is "licensed" is handled more like a combination of a custom and a private contract. People used to regard themselves as being able, as a matter of common right, to erect a house, or improve one, on his own land. Today, one typically has to get a permit and have the work inspected by a government official.

The right-privilege distinction has long adversely impacted individuals within the public sector in protecting themselves against arbitrary governmental action. Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., declared the doctrine of unconstitutional conditions for a "privilege" to which substantive due process is inapplicable. In 1892, Justice Holmes, speaking for the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford (1892), dismissed the petition of a policeman who had been fired for violating a regulation which restricted his political activities:

The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics, but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman.... There are few employments for hire in which the servant does not agree to suspend his constitutional right of free speech, as well as of idleness, by the implied terms of his contract. The servant cannot complain, as he takes the employment on the terms which are offered him.

More recently, in 1954, the Supreme Court upheld the suspension of a physician's license. The physician had been convicted of contempt of Congress for declining to produce certain papers for a committee of the House of Representatives. His license was suspended on the basis of this conviction, without a showing that his actions related to his competence or professional integrity as a physician, and the Court deferred to the police power of the state:

The practice of medicine in New York is lawfully prohibited by the state except upon the conditions it imposes. Such practice is a privilege granted by the State under its substantially plenary power to fix the terms of admission.

A person may sometimes successfully rely on an independent right to procedural due process to avoid some of the harsh consequences of the right-privilege distinction. One may have no right to talk politics while in the public service, but still he may not be discharged without an adequate hearing which may fairly determine whether in fact he had been talking politics.

Under the equal protection clause, however, it seemingly makes no difference that the threatened interest is a privilege rather than a right. Even a privilege, benefit, opportunity, or public advantage may not be granted to some but withheld from others where the basis of classification and difference in treatment is arbitrary.

A response to this tendency to convert immunities into privileges has been the "doctrine of unconstitutional conditions," that whatever an express constitutional provision forbids government to do directly forbids government to do indirectly, such as by setting conditions on the conferring of some privilege that requires a person to relinquish an immunity. By this doctrine it would be unconstitutional to require a person to relinquish his right against warrantless search of his lodgings as a condition for receiving public welfare, or to relinquish his right to political speech while off-duty as a condition for public employment, or to relinquish his right against self-incrimination as a condition for employment as a law enforcement officer. At the very least, this principle, when combined with a right to procedural due process, would entitle a person facing the loss of a privilege to a hearing to decide whether the unconstitutional conditions principle has been violated.

Under the equal protection clause, it seemingly makes no difference that the threatened interest is a privilege rather than a right. Even a privilege, benefit, opportunity, or public advantage may not be granted to some but withheld from others where the basis of classification and difference in treatment is arbitrary. Justice Clark stated in Wieman v. Updegraff (1952), in striking down a state loyalty oath read as containing no requirement of scienter:

We need not pause to consider whether an abstract right to public employment exists. It is sufficient to say that constitutional protection does extend to the public servant whose exclusion pursuant to a statute is patently arbitrary or discriminatory.

The relation between rights and privileges has played out in voting, which was originally established not as a right but as a privilege. There might be a right not to be taxed without representation in the taxing body, but that did not require that one personally have the right to vote in elections to that body. It was considered sufficient for dependents, such as children, women, wage workers, and slaves, to be represented in voting by their father, husband, employer, or master. However, the Fifteenth Amendment, in establishing a right not to be denied the "right" to vote on the basis of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude, confused the distinction by terming voting a "right" rather than a "privilege," even while indicating it could be withheld on other grounds than those it prohibited. We have to recognize that in using the word “right” the Fifteenth Amendment did not make it one. It only prohibited the withholding of the privilege on certain grounds, thereby creating a right not to have it withheld on those grounds. Similarly, the Nineteenth Amendment established a right not to be denied the privilege of voting on the basis of sex, the Twenty-Fourth Amendment established a right not to be denied the privilege of voting on the basis of nonpayment of a tax, and the Twenty-Sixth Amendment established a right not to be denied the privilege of voting on the basis of being under the age of eighteen. The fact that the term “right” was used instead of “privilege” in each of those amendments indicates, however, that one cannot rely on the terms to be used carefully in legal discourse.

Conflation of the terms “right” and “privilege” as synonymous has a long history in English law, in which originally all “rights” were considered privileges granted by the sovereign, that is, the monarch. With independence of the American colonies, however, making the people the sovereign, and their adoption of the Constitution, came acceptance in law that the rights, or more precisely, immunities, recognized and protected in the Constitution precede the Constitution, and are either natural, preceding society and government, or arise out of the social contract that created the society. Nevertheless, the legacy of monarchy lingers in the language sometimes used by legislators and judges.

Most attempts to reduce immunities to privileges, and then often to withdraw them, are done through exercise of a power to regulate or tax, or at the state level, by exercise of the state “police powers.” Thus, while U.S. and state constitutions might recognize a “right to keep and bear arms,” their legislatures have tried to make it a privilege to acquire or convey title or possession to them. Congress in 1937 adopted legislation that imposed a $200 tax on certain types of firearms, and made it illegal to possess a firearm on which a tax had not been paid, and then delegated the power to executive officials to effectively prohibit the weapons by refusing to accept payment of the tax. This was done in defiance of the ancient principle that a right may not be taxed in a way that imposes an undue burden on its exercise. Congress has since prohibited acquisition or possession of similar weapons manufactured after 1985, under the alleged authority of the Commerce and necessary and proper clauses, on the argument that, following the precedent in Wickard v. Filburn (1942), they have a “substantial effect on interstate commerce.” Some states have argued that, since militia commanders may direct the use or nonuse of weapons by persons in called up militia status, they have the power to prohibit the acquisition or possession of any weapons even for persons not on militia duty, and to not recognize as militia those not called up by officials with the authority to impose penalties for failing to respond to a call-up. This is in conflict, however, with the ancient principle that the authority for militia, that is, defense activity, is not officials or the law, but a threat to public safety and the constitution of the state or United States, and every person aware of such a threat has not only the right but duty to defend against it, alone or in concert with others, regardless of whether officials concur or cooperate. Indeed, the concept contemplates that the officials may become the threat to which a defensive response is required.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

- Barsky v. Board of Regents*, 347 U.S. 442, 451 (1954).
Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Comm. v. McGrath, 341 U.S. 123, 185 (1961) (concurring opinion).
Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943). Commentary by Jon Roland. <http://www.constitution.org/ussc/319-105jr.htm>.
 Sidney, Algernon. Discourses Concerning Government, Chapter 1, Section 16 (1698). http://www.constitution.org/as/dcg_116.htm.
 Van Alstyne, William W., The Demise of the Right-Privilege Distinction in Constitutional Law, Harvard Law Review 81 (1967): 1439.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford*, 155 Mass. 216, 220, 29 N.E. 517, 517 (1892)
Wickard v. Filburn, 317 U.S. 111 (1942)
Wieman v. Updegraff, 344 U.S. 183, 192 (1952)

See also Due Process

RIGHTS OF THE ACCUSED

The best way to understand what rights our criminal justice system accords the accused is to investigate the process by which accused persons are brought into court and their alleged culpability adjudicated. The criminal justice process exists to justify society’s imposition of punishment upon an individual. In a free and just society, stripping an individual of her liberty—that is, punishing through imprisonment—must be legitimated by a legal process that is fair and accurate. Sometimes promoting fairness harmonizes with the pursuit of accuracy in adjudication; sometimes not. For example, ensuring free and adequate legal representation for indigent criminal defendants strikes us as fair; but it also serves society’s irrevocable commitment to ensuring that no innocent person is convicted, a risk that is heightened when an accused person must undergo a trial process without, as the Supreme Court put it in Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), the “guiding hand of counsel.” Conversely, while it might be “fair” to suppress relevant evidence at a criminal trial because the police violated the constitutional rights of the accused, that judicial remedy hinders the system’s pursuit of adjudicatory accuracy.

Complicating things further, we demand not just fairness and accuracy, but also a certain level of efficiency in the criminal justice process. What kind of efficiency? We want law enforcement to prevent crime, and to the extent that is not possible, we want criminals swiftly apprehended and swiftly punished. We want the criminal justice process to incapacitate criminals and deter would-be offenders. Important as this objective is, single-minded attention to efficiency would lead us to adopt what might be called an “administrative tribunal system of justice,” where the focus is exclusively on fact-finding, and those rights of the accused that impede that goal would be jettisoned. Even accuracy could be sacrificed in an efficiency-obsessed system, since efficiency may well require that we tolerate higher risks of error in the adjudicatory process than we currently do.

No criminal justice system pursues one objective and ignores the others. Balancing the competing objectives, through evaluation of society’s values and needs, is a perennial feature of the administration of justice. Fairness, accuracy, and efficiency are elusive objectives that compete for our concern. And what rights we accord the accused exist within this triangle of concerns.

No adjudicatory process could command our allegiance if it did not pursue the very important goal of discovering the truth. No doubt, many of the rights of the accused promote this goal. As noted above, anyone facing felony charges (typically a criminal accusation that brings with it the possibility of at least six months incarceration) is entitled to have a lawyer, free of charge if the accused is too poor to pay counsel’s fee (which is true of most criminal defendants). The accused may even be entitled to the services of an investigator and necessary experts, also paid for by the taxpayers, so as to mount a challenge to the prosecution’s case. The accused may demand of the prosecution that it disclose any information it has that might be favorable to the defense, and any failure by the prosecution to disclose favorable evidence that undermines confidence in the outcome would require a new trial. At the trial itself, defense counsel must be given the opportunity to cross-examine the prosecution witnesses. Cross-examination has been called the “greatest engine of truth ever devised.” Guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, the right of cross-examination exists in tandem with another truth-promoting right—the right of compulsory process, which empowers the accused to subpoena necessary witnesses. The right to confront witnesses and the right to compulsory process are species of the larger right to present a defense, including the right of the accused to offer his own testimony.

The goal of discovering the truth is part of the overarching objective that the criminal-justice process render accurate results—that is, convicting the guilty and exonerating the innocent. But the notion of the “truth” is too slippery on which to build an elaborate adjudicatory process. Sometimes according an accused the right to counsel and the right to have counsel vigorously attack the prosecution’s case through cross-examination and through motions to suppress reliable and competent evidence undermines the pursuit of truth. But our commitment to fairness, a commitment to an adjudicatory process that accords the accused the right to participate in the proceedings in a way that permits such attacks upon the prosecution’s case, demands that we not allow ourselves to be overwhelmed by the idea that uncovering the truth should guide every decision regarding process. The fundamental precept that each individual defendant has dignity and may not be treated as a means to an end that might seem laudable or necessary requires that the adjudicatory process include the irrevocable right to be heard and to participate in the trial proceedings.

But leaving aside these considerations of fairness and dignity, often we can never know the “truth,” only versions of the truth as told by witnesses who have their own infirmities and biases that undoubtedly affect their reliability and credibility. The accuracy objective demands a societal judgment about risk: What risks are we willing to tolerate of convicting the innocent or exonerating the guilty? Because our society is committed to the proposition that it is better to exonerate the guilty than convict the innocent—on a ten-to-one ratio, the famous maxim goes—the accused has certain rights that reflect this risk aversion. Most notable are the cluster of rights centering on the prosecution’s burden of proof. The accused has the right to be presumed innocent, unless and until the prosecution can prove guilt through competent evidence. The presumption of innocence means that the fact-finder (typically the jury) must evaluate the prosecution’s case from the point of view that the accused is, in fact, innocent. The fact-finder must be persuaded of the accused’s guilt as opposed to having a pre-existing suspicion of guilt ratified by the proof. Not only that, the prosecution must persuade the fact-finder with proof so compelling that there exists no reasonable doubt as to the accused’s guilt. Even if the jury thinks the accused is probably guilty, the accused is entitled to an acquittal because the prosecution has failed to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Moreover, the prosecution may not satisfy its burden of proof by insisting on questioning the accused or by commenting on the accused's silence as indicative of guilt. The accused has a Fifth Amendment right to silence that extends beyond the interrogation room of a police precinct, but into the courthouse as well. That means neither the prosecution nor the judge may compel the accused to testify, and the accused may not suffer any prejudice by the decision not to testify or otherwise remain silent about the accusation. Undoubtedly, this rigorous burden of proof has sometimes led to acquittals of the factually guilty. But it would be misleading to say that the system has failed in its goal of promoting accuracy in the adjudicatory process. Accuracy in this context takes into account society's values about the power of government to strip individuals of their liberty. Acquitting the factually guilty because of a bona fide reasonable doubt in the accusations is an accurate result because we have decided that the risks of convicting the innocent are too great to lower that burden of proof.

Other rights reinforce this notion of risk aversion. The accused has a Sixth Amendment right to be tried by a jury for any offense that could lead to imprisonment of at least six months. Empaneling a jury is time consuming and costly. Sometimes, in complex white-collar crime cases, jurors are less equipped to handle the fact-finding task than a judge or a panel of experts. But community participation in the adjudicatory process, plus the demands for unanimity or near-unanimity in the verdict, protect the accused against government overreaching. In fact, the accused's right to certain pretrial screening procedures reflect our "accuracy" objective. The police may not under the Fourth Amendment take an individual into custody without probable cause of criminality, and under the Fifth Amendment that probable cause may not be built upon investigatory procedures that produce involuntarily rendered incriminating confessions. Whatever charges that are brought against an accused must be screened either by a magistrate in a preliminary hearing or by a grand jury consisting of members of the community.

Similarly, the right against double jeopardy can be understood in part as a safeguard against erroneous convictions. Subjecting an individual to multiple prosecutions for the same offense increases the chances of a conviction. In some instances a conviction in a second or third trial may be the "accurate" result insofar as the accused is factually guilty and secured an "erroneous" acquittal in the first proceeding. But the risk exists that an innocent defendant is factually innocent but cannot defeat the prosecution's quest for a conviction in a subsequent trial. In that sense, the right against being put twice in jeopardy reflects yet again our aversion to the risk of convicting the innocent.

DANIEL R. WILLIAMS

References and Further Reading

- Amar, Akhil Reed, The Future of Constitutional Criminal Procedure, American Criminal Law Review 33 (1996): 1123.
- Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Procedure. 3rd ed. Newark, NJ: LexisNexis, 2002.
- Duff, R.A. Trials and Punishments. Cambridge; New York: New York University Press, 1986.
- Packer, Herbert. The Limits of the Criminal Sanction. Stanford, NJ: Stanford University Press, 1968.
- Uviller, H. Richard. The Tilted Playing Field: Is Criminal Justice Unfair? New Haven, NJ: Yale University Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)

RIPENESS IN FREE SPEECH CASES

Ripeness is a justiciability doctrine concerned with identifying cases that are premature for judicial review because the injury that the plaintiff seeks to prevent—typically through injunction or declaratory judgment—is merely speculative and may never occur. In free speech cases, if the defendant government argues that the case is unripe because the challenged law has not been enforced, the plaintiff argues that the law inhibits speech and the courts should decide its constitutionality before it is enforced.

It is often difficult to distinguish ripeness cases and discern an underlying principle. Three Supreme Court free speech cases exemplify this: United Public Workers v. Mitchell (1947) involved a challenge to the Hatch Act, which barred federal employees from political activity. Only one plaintiff had been disciplined; the others' claims were dismissed as unripe because the court could "only speculate" about the kinds of activity and speech they wanted to engage in and about how the law would be enforced.

In Adler v. Board of Education (1952), New York City schoolteachers challenged a state law requiring dismissal of anyone who advocated overthrowing the government by force or violence or who belonged to an organization that did. No one had yet been dismissed, yet the court found the case ripe for adjudication and sustained the law.

In Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction (1961), the Court implicitly found ripeness by invalidating a Florida law requiring every employee to take an oath that he had never lent “aid, support, advice or influence to the Communist Party.” The court found that the law was vague and could potentially inhibit speech.

One possible unifying theme of these cases is that if the justices consider the challenged law to be clearly facially unconstitutional (Cramp) or constitutional under any conceivable set of circumstances (Adler), ripeness is not an issue, but when the outcome may hinge on the nature of a plaintiff’s activity or speech and on the circumstances of the enforcement (Mitchell), the Court may defer judicial review until (if ever) an appropriate case presents itself.

WILLIAM V. DUNLAP

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen Law & Business, 2002.
- Nowak, John E., and Ronald D. Rotunda. Constitutional Law. 7th ed. St. Paul, MN: West, 2004.
- Tribe, Laurence. American Constitutional Law. 3rd ed., vol. 1. St. Paul, MN: West, 2000.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adler v. Board of Education*, 342 U.S.485 (1952)
- Cramp v. Board of Public Instruction*, 368 U.S. 278 (1961)
- United Public Workers v. Mitchell*, 330 U.S. 75 (1947)

See also Hatch Act; Standing in Free Speech Cases

COUNTY OF RIVERSIDE v. McLAUGHLIN, 500 U.S. 44 (1991)

Arrests are justified if the police have probable cause, which is defined as meaning “facts and circumstances within the officer’s knowledge that are sufficient to warrant a prudent person, or one of reasonable caution, in believing, in the circumstances shown, that the suspect has committed, is committing, or is about to commit an offense.” When a warrant is used, the issuing magistrate determines if there is probable cause. When the police act without a warrant, they do so without such a determination.

Gerstein v. Pugh (1974) established that the Fourth Amendment required that a person detained after a warrantless arrest must be given a prompt judicial hearing to establish probable cause for continued detention. In McLaughlin, the Court was called on to interpret what “prompt” means.

McLaughlin was a class action complaining about the policy of the County of Riverside, California, which required such hearings within two days of arrest. The policy excluded from computation weekends and holidays. Thus, a person arrested late in the week could be held as long as five days before the hearing. Over the Thanksgiving holidays, a seven-day delay was possible. The Court concluded that judicial determinations of probable cause within forty-eight hours of a warrantless arrest usually are reasonable. This conclusion was a practical compromise between the government’s interest of detaining dangerous individuals and the individual’s liberty interest.

McLaughlin provides a needed benchmark. The forty-eight-hour rule gives assurances to state and local jurisdictions that, if they comply, they will be immune from systematic challenges to their probable cause hearing procedures. It also gives meaning to the promise made by Gerstein to detainees that there will be a prompt determination whether continued detention is justified.

THOMAS K. CLANCY

References and Further Reading

- Michigan v. DeFillippo*, 443 U.S. 31, 37 (1979).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Gerstein v. Pugh*, 420 U.S. 103 (1974)

See also Arrest; Arrest Warrant; Due Process; Seizure

RIZZO v. GOODE, 423 U.S. 362 (1976)

Philadelphia in the 1970s was rife with controversy over alleged police misconduct toward minority residents. During this period, city residents brought two class-action lawsuits against the mayor and police commissioner of Philadelphia, claiming the officials allowed unconstitutional police misconduct, including arrests without probable cause and use of excessive force, through inadequate supervision of their officers. The trial court agreed, finding that the city’s existing citizen complaint procedures were inadequate and should be overhauled. The Supreme Court reversed this injunction for several reasons. First, the Court declared the plaintiffs lacked a “personal stake” in the outcome because the defendants in this case, the city officials, were not directly responsible for the plaintiffs’ distress, while the police officers who were responsible were not sued. Second, the lower court’s conclusion that the number of incidents of police misconduct was “unacceptably high” and thus unconstitutional overstated the problem, since levels of police misconduct in Philadelphia were similar to those in other major cities. Finally, the Court ruled that the injunction was an unjustified federal intrusion into the local discretion of police authority. By declining to extend federal authority to the supervision of police departments for misconduct, the Court departed most notably from previous decisions that had created federally supervised busing of schoolchildren to facilitate desegregation. This case marks an important example where concern for local independence from the federal government, a principle known as federalism, overruled the Court's sensitivity to issues of social justice. The case became known afterward as a nearly absolute bar to individual suits against municipal police forces.

DAVID D. BURNETT

References and Further Reading

Baddeley, Jeffrey, Parents Patriae Suits by a State under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, Case Western Reserve Law Review 33 (1983): 431–57.

Council of Orgs. on Philadelphia Police Accountability and Responsibility v. Rizzo, 357 F. Supp. 1289 (E.D. Pa. 1973).

Note: The Changing Social Vision of Justice Blackmun, Harvard Law Review 96 (1983): 717–36.

See also Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts; Police Investigation Commissions; Police Power of the State; Race and Criminal Justice

ROBERTS v. UNITED STATES JAYCEES, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)

Roberts v. United States Jaycees established a framework for a First Amendment defense against anti-discrimination laws, based on what an organization expresses via its membership policies. In Roberts, the national organization of the Jaycees had a policy of male-only membership. Two local chapters in Minnesota admitted women. The national organization threatened to revoke their charters. The local chapters charged sex discrimination, under a Minnesota statute.

The U.S. Supreme Court delineated two distinct interests protected by First Amendment freedom of association. The first is a right of “intimate association.” This is an element of personal liberty, protecting certain intimate relationships from undue intrusion by the state. Marital and familial relationships are leading examples. The Jaycees is not small, selective, or exclusive, however, so its claim did not fit this category.

“Expressive association” also derives from the First Amendment. This right protects a group's efforts toward shared goals, be they political, social, economic, educational, religious, or cultural. The Jaycees' interest in its membership requirements was of this type. Minnesota's antidiscrimination law intruded by forcing the association to accept members—women—whom the Jaycees did not want. The right to expressive association is not absolute, however, and can be infringed on to further compelling state interests. These must be unrelated to suppression of viewpoint, and the state's law must be the least restrictive means of achieving the state's goals. Minnesota's interest in eradicating sex discrimination was a compelling interest. The Jaycees' expressive association was not seriously burdened by the anti-discrimination law, because the exclusion of women did not involve any symbolic message and the club's policies were unlikely to be altered by the participation of women members.

The right of intimate association has not had much success in court. Expressive association is another matter. In Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group (1995), it was an alternative rationale for protecting the exclusion of an Irish gay group from a privately organized St. Patrick's Day parade. In Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), the Boy Scouts' policy of excluding of gay men as adult leaders was protected as expressive association; forcing the inclusion of gay men pursuant to an antidiscrimination statute would have violated this right.

After Dale, commentators returned to Justice O'Connor's concurring opinion in Roberts. She drew a distinction between organizations whose purpose is expressive and organizations whose purpose is commercial. The more commercial an association, the less right it has to assert First Amendment protection against antidiscrimination laws. If applied expansively, the doctrine of expressive association threatens to undermine antidiscrimination laws Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights v. Rumsfeld (2005) may further clarify its scope.

MARC R. POIRIER

References and Further Reading

Board of Directors of Rotary International v. Rotary Club of Duarte, 481 U.S. 537 (1987).

Koppelman, Andrew, Should Noncommercial Associations Have an Absolute Right to Discriminate? Law and Contemporary Problems 67 (2004): 67.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights v. Rumsfeld, 319 F.3d 219 (3d Cir. 2004), cert. granted, 125 S.Ct. 1977 (2005)

Hurley v. Irish-American Gay, Lesbian and Bisexual Group, 515 U.S. 557 (1995)

See also Freedom of Association; Marches and Demonstrations; NAACP v. Alabama Ex Rel. Patterson, 357 U.S. 449 (1958)

ROBERTS, OWEN JOSEPHUS (1875–1955)

An exponent of fidelity to precedent and judicial restraint, Roberts sided frequently enough with the underdog to forge a solid if unspectacular record in civil liberties cases.

Owen J. Roberts was born in Germantown, Pennsylvania, on May 2, 1875. He graduated Phi Beta Kappa from the University of Pennsylvania in 1895 and received a law degree from the same institution in 1898. On May 9, 1930, President Herbert Hoover selected the Republican lawyer for the Supreme Court following the failed nomination of Judge John J. Parker. On May 20, 1930, the Senate confirmed Roberts.

Roberts was joined in the same year by Charles Evans Hughes, who became chief justice. Both justices emerged as central figures in the modern history of civil liberties. For example, shortly after reaching the bench, Roberts voted with Hughes in Stromberg v. California (1931). The case involved a California statute that banned red flags, a symbol of the Communist Party. For the first time, the Court extended the Fourteenth Amendment to incorporate a First Amendment protection. Roberts also joined Hughes in Near v. Minnesota (1931) to strike down a Minnesota state “gag” law and hold that freedom of the press was within the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Roberts first important majority opinion came in a Fourth Amendment case, Grau v. United States (1932). As was typical of rights of the accused cases during these years, Grau had significant libertarian overtones. In considering a search warrant issued under the National Prohibition Act, Roberts held the warrant invalid because it failed to state a probable cause.

Two years later, Roberts followed with a sharp dissent in a Sixth Amendment case, Snyder v. Massachusetts (1934). “The concept of due process,” he wrote, “is not technical.... It is fundamental that there can be no due process without reasonable notice and a fair hearing.” Roberts was also careful not to exaggerate the reach of the judiciary in such cases.

He spoke for the Court in Betts v. Brady (1942), holding that states did not have to provide legal assistance for noncapital felonies.

Roberts usually was sympathetic to First Amendment claimants. For example, he wrote for the Court in Herndon v. Lowry (1937), decided by a vote of five to four. Angelo Herndon was a black organizer convicted under a Georgia statute of attempting to incite insurrection by seeking to persuade others to join the Communist Party’s campaign to establish separate black states in the South. Roberts overturned Herndon’s conviction on the grounds that the evidence in the case failed “to establish an attempt to incite others to insurrection,” even at some indefinite future time. According to Roberts, the clear and present danger test applied to laws that addressed forbidden acts; the bad tendency test applied to laws that addressed forbidden language. The decision enhanced civil liberties because in general the most punitive forms of legislation dealt with acts rather than language.

Roberts wrote for a plurality in Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization (1939) in voiding a Jersey City, New Jersey ordinance that required labor organizers to have a permit to conduct a public meeting and distribute print materials in the streets. Roberts held that labor had the right to organize and that streets and parks were public forums protected by the Fourteenth Amendment under the privileges and immunities clause.

The same year, Roberts also spoke for the Court in Schneider v. State (1939). The case involved attempts by municipal authorities to control demonstrations and the distribution of radical literature by charging that these activities contributed to unsightly streets and public places. Roberts, however, insisted that the First Amendment secured freedom of speech and of the press against abridgment by the states through the Fourteenth Amendment. The purpose of keeping the streets neat was insufficient to justify an ordinance that prohibited a person rightfully from handing literature to persons willing to receive it.

Roberts was unwilling to extend the concept of protected speech to commerce. In Valentine v. Chrestensen (1942), his majority opinion upheld a city ordinance prohibiting distribution of “commercial and business advertising matter” on public streets. Without even mentioning the First Amendment, Roberts held that “[t]he Constitution imposes no ... restraint on government as respects purely commercial advertising.”

Roberts also expanded religious liberty through his unanimous opinion in Cantwell v. Connecticut (1940). Newton Cantwell and his sons were Jehovah’s Witnesses, charged with violating a Connecticut statute that made it illegal to solicit money for any cause without a certificate issued by the state.

Roberts's opinion held that while a state might regulate the time, place, and manner of soliciting contributions and holding meetings in the streets, it could not forbid them. "Such a censorship of religion as the means of determining its right to survive," Roberts wrote, "is a denial of liberty protected by the First Amendment and included in the liberty which is within the protection of the Fourteenth." Simply because the Cantwells' speech was offensive, Roberts explained, it did not follow that it was dangerous.

His opinion was important for two reasons. First, it reinforced the proposition that the free exercise clause of the First Amendment applied to the states through the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Second, it suggested that the free exercise clause protected not only beliefs but some actions. The protection of the former was absolute; the protection of the latter could be limited by appropriate state action.

Roberts's history of support for civil liberties, however, was tarnished by the two flag salute cases, Minersville School District v. Gobitis (1940) and West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette (1943). In both instances, his sensitivity to precedent and judicial restraint outweighed his usual sympathy for individual expression. Moreover, with the appointment of Felix Frankfurter to the Court in 1939, Roberts found a jurisprudential soul mate, a relationship that strengthened with the departure of Hughes and the appointment of Stone as chief justice in 1941.

The principal opponents of the Nazi-like flag salute were the Jehovah's Witnesses, the same group that Roberts had supported in Cantwell. This tightly knit evangelical sect refused to worship graven images, including the flag. In Gobitis, Justice Frankfurter, speaking for an eight-to-one majority, reiterated the Court's previous support for the flag salute, a position in which Roberts silently agreed. In Barnette, however, the Court, by a vote of six to three, overturned compulsory flag saluting. Justice Frankfurter wrote an impassioned dissent; Roberts silently joined him again.

Roberts struggled to balance his commitment to stare decisis with his respect for civil liberties produced a mixed record where race was involved. On the one hand, he supported Herndon and agreed to admit a black student to the all-white University of Missouri law school. On the other hand, he upheld the use of race to discriminate against voters in primary elections, even after the Court in Smith v. Allwright (1944) held that citizens had a right to vote in such elections free of racial discrimination.

In Korematsu v. United States (1944), however, Roberts dissented when the Court upheld the war-time detention of American citizens of Japanese ancestry. Hugo Black and Frankfurter, the two justices regarded as the best and the brightest of the era, led the six-vote majority. Its decision, however, failed to ensure that liberty was a paramount value in war as well as in peace. Roberts rejected the majority's position on the grounds that the internment laws had subjected Korematsu to conflicting orders to leave the military area and to stay put, an obvious violation of due process.

The Court's divisions in the Japanese internment and flag salute cases revealed the brittle relationships among the justices. Although Roberts and Frankfurter disagreed on certain issues, they had found themselves emotionally united in their dislike of William O. Douglas and Black and constitutionally allied in their belief that the Roosevelt Court disregarded settled law. To underscore that fact, in his last full term, Roberts dissented fifty-three times, or in almost one-third of the nonunanimous cases.

Roberts wearied of the contentious infighting and resigned on July 31, 1945. He left without the traditional farewell letter from his colleagues, a victim of the pettiness of Black and Douglas, who claimed his jurisprudence lacked principles. Roberts became dean of the University of Pennsylvania law school and president of the American Philosophical Society.

Roberts was an honest man, especially with himself. "I have no illusions about my judicial career," he wrote. "But one can only do what one can. Who am I to revile the good God that he did not make me a Marshall...." In 1951, he authored The Court and the Constitution that summarized his adherence to stare decisis and concluded that in matters of civil liberties it was "regrettable that in an era ... whose greatest need [was] steadfastness of ... purpose, this court ... should ... become the breeder of fresh doubt and confusion in the public mind as to the stability of our institutions."

KERMIT L. HALL

References and Further Reading

- Burner, David. "Owen J. Roberts." In The Justices of the United States Supreme Court: Their Lives and Major Opinions. Vol. 3, edited by Leon Friedman and Fred L. Israel, 2253–67. New York: Chelsea House Publishers, 1995.
- Bybee, Jay S. "Owen J. Roberts." In The Supreme Court Justices: Illustrated Biographies, 1789–1995, edited by Clare Cushman, 122–35. Washington, D.C: Congressional Quarterly, 1995.
- Grovey v. Townsend*, 295 U.S. 45 (1935).

Leonard, Charles. A Search for a Judicial Philosophy: Mr. Justice Roberts and the Constitutional Revolution of 1937. Port Washington, NY: Kennikat Press, 1971.
Missouri ex rel. Gaines v. Canada, 305 U.S. 337 (1938).
Roberts, Owen. The Court and the Constitution. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1951.
Rotunda, Ronald D., ed. Six Justices on Civil Rights. New York: Oceana Publications, Inc., 1983.
United States v. Macintosh, 283 U.S. 605 (1931).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Beets v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942)
Cantwell v. Connecticut, 310 U.S. 296 (1940)
Grau v. United States, 287 U.S. 124 (1932)
Hague v. Committee for Industrial Organization, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
Herndon v. Lowry, 301 U.S. 242 (1937)
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
Minersville School District v. Gobitis, 310 U.S. 586 (1940)
Near v. Minnesota, 283 U.S. 697 (1931)
Schneider v. State, 308 U.S. 147 (1939)
Smith v. Allwright, 321 U.S. 649 (1944)
Snyder v. Massachusetts, 291 U.S. 97, 123 (1934)
Stromberg v. California, 283 U.S. 359 (1931)
Valentine v. Chrestensen, 316 U.S. 52 (1942)
West Virginia State Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943)

ROBINSON v. CALIFORNIA, 370 U.S. 660 (1962)

In Robinson, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Eighth Amendment precludes punishment for a “status offense” in the absence of criminal behavior. The defendant was charged under a California statute that forbade “one to be addicted to the use of narcotics.” At the close of evidence, the judge instructed the jury that it could convict if it found that the defendant had merely been addicted to illegal narcotics while in the court’s jurisdiction. The defendant was convicted and sentenced to serve ninety days in jail.

In a fractured opinion, the Supreme Court held that the conviction violated the defendant’s Eighth and Fourteenth Amendment rights. The Court distinguished a state’s authority to punish a defendant for using narcotics from the state’s authority to punish him for being addicted to narcotics. Finding addiction to be more like a status than an act, the Court drew a parallel between addiction and mental illness, reasoning that punishment for addiction would be akin to punishing the insane for their insanity. Even though the Court found that a state may lawfully confine a mentally ill person for medical treatment, the justices differentiated treatment from punishment, reasoning that “[e]ven one day in prison would be cruel and unusual” as punishment for a status similar to mental illness. Robinson later provided foundation for the Court’s 2002 conclusion that execution of mentally ill defendants would be cruel and unusual (Atkins v. Virginia [2002]).

Shortly after issuing the Robinson decision, the Court narrowed the scope of its holding, refusing to constitutionalize an insanity test and holding that punishment of an act somewhat compelled by addiction could survive constitutional scrutiny (Powell v. State of Texas [1968]).

KRISTOPHER B. STEVENS

References and Further Reading

Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Atkins v. Virginia, 536 U.S. 304 (2002)
Powell v. State of Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968)

See also Bill of Rights: Structure; Capital Punishment: Eighth Amendment Limits; Cruel and Unusual Punishment (VIII); Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Fourteenth Amendment; Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238 (1972); Powell v. Texas, 392 U.S. 514 (1968); Status Offenses

ROCHIN v. CALIFORNIA, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)

Police officers entered Rochin’s home and forced their way into this bedroom. When he grabbed two capsules from a table and put them in his mouth a struggle ensued. After failing to forcibly recover the capsules from Rochin’s mouth, the officers took him to a hospital where the capsules, which contained morphine, were recovered from his stomach by chemically induced vomiting. Over the objection of his lawyer the capsules were admitted into evidence, and Rochin was convicted of drug possession. The state court of appeal found that although the officers were guilty of various crimes such as assault and battery, it upheld the conviction.

Applying the due process provision of the Fourteenth Amendment, the Supreme Court overturned Rochin’s conviction. While aware of the criticism that the inherent vagueness of the due process concept entails a risk that federal judges will impose an amorphous body of “natural law” or their own personal values on state courts, it concluded that police conduct, such as that which occurred here, which shocks the Court’s conscience violates the norms of decency and fairness that underlie due process.

In concurring opinions, Justices Black and Douglas criticized the Court's reliance on the due process provision and, instead, urged the Court to apply the Fifth Amendment's protection against self-incrimination to state criminal prosecutions. A decade later this view became the majority view when the Court, under the leadership of Earl Warren, applied most of the provisions of the Bill of Rights to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment.

STEVEN B. DOW

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul, MN: Thomson/West, 2004.
- Rubin, Peter J., Square Pegs and Round Holes: Substantive Due Process, Procedural Due Process, and the Bill of Rights, Columbia Law Review 103 (2003): 833–92.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- U.S. Const., Fourteenth Amendment
U.S. Const., Fifth Amendment

See also Due Process; Self-Incrimination (V): Historical Background; Warren, Earl

ROCK v. ARKANSAS, 483 U.S. 44 (1987)

In Rock v. Arkansas the Supreme Court struck down a per se rule from the Supreme Court of Arkansas that would preclude a witness, even the defendant, from testifying on any matters about which her memory may have been affected by hypnosis. Petitioner Vickie Rock was accused of murdering her husband. She claimed that the shooting was an accident; the gun had misfired.

In an attempt to recover some more precise memory of the shooting she underwent tape-recorded hypnosis sessions with a licensed neuropsychologist. As a result, Rock claimed to remember that her finger had not been on the trigger at the time of the shooting. An expert examination of the gun revealed that the gun would indeed misfire under certain conditions. The trial judge would not, however, let the defendant testify as to any of the events of that day on the grounds that the hypnosis session rendered her testimony unreliable. Rock was convicted and the conviction was upheld by the Arkansas Supreme Court on the grounds that hypnosis necessarily rendered the testimony unreliable. The U.S. Supreme Court, relying on the Fifth and Sixth Amendments, in particular the defendant's right to testify in her own defense, held that a per se ban was unconstitutional. While the Court was prepared to agree that preclusion would sometimes be appropriate, the facts did not support exclusion of Rock's testimony and thus a per se ban was overbroad. The decision had implications for child abuse cases involving the controversial recovered memory syndrome.

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

- Faigman, David L., David H. Kaye, Michael J. Saks, and Joseph Sanders. Science in the Law: Social and Behavioral Science Issues. St. Paul, MN: West Group Publishing, 2002.
- Kuplicki, Francis P., Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments—A Constitutional Paradigm for Determining the Admissibility of Hypnotically Refreshed Testimony, Journal of Criminal Law and Criminology 78 (1988): 853.
- Loftus, Elizabeth F., Memory Distortion and False Memory Creation, Bulletin of the American Academy of Psychiatry and the Law 24 (1996): 281.

See also Defense, Right to Present; Due Process

ROE v. WADE, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

In the decades immediately following the Civil War (1861–1865), a majority of the states enacted criminal statutes prohibiting the termination of pregnancies. These laws placed grave burdens on women who wished to avoid childbirth. In the 1960s, women began filing lawsuits in state and federal courts challenging their constitutionality. In Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court held that the decision to abort a pregnancy was a personal liberty protected by the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court, however, said that this right was not absolute and permitted the states to impose some regulations on its exercise in order to further their interests in safeguarding women's health and protecting potential human life. The scope of the state's power in this area, however, is very limited, and, as a consequence of Roe, abortion became freely available as an option to pregnant women throughout the country.

Roe v. Wade proved to be the most controversial decision that the Court made following the retirement of Chief Justice Earl Warren in 1969. It helped galvanize many Protestant fundamentalists and Roman Catholics into an unprecedented level of political activity that contributed to a movement of the Republican Party to the right of the political spectrum. Failing in their attempt to nullify Roe by means of a constitutional amendment, conservative Republican presidents and members of Congress sought to change the makeup of the Supreme Court by nominating and confirming justices committed to overturn the decision. A Supreme Court nominee's position on Roe became the focus of Senate confirmation hearings, with supporters of the Court's decision opposing any nominee who they feared would vote to overturn it. Once on the Court, even conservative justices, however, are reluctant to violate the rule of precedent and to deprive women of a constitutional right on which they have relied for decades, regardless of their views of the constitutional soundness of the reasoning underpinning Roe.

An unmarried pregnant woman who wished to terminate her pregnancy by abortion, using the pseudonym Jane Roe, filed a lawsuit in the federal district court in Dallas, Texas, asking the Court to declare the state's criminal abortion law unconstitutional. The Texas statute permitted abortion only when necessary to save the life of the mother. The special three-judge district court agreed that the law was inconsistent with the Fourteenth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. On appeal, the Supreme Court, in a seven-to-two decision, affirmed the district court's judgment. Justice Harry Blackmun wrote the opinion for the Court. The Texas statute criminalizing abortion had remained unchanged since 1857. In a companion case, Doe v. Bolton (1973), the Court invalidated a Georgia statute enacted in 1968, even though it reflected more modern thinking about abortion, because it also placed too many constraints on the woman's right to end her pregnancy.

The principal issue before the Court was whether the Constitution recognizes a right of women to abort their pregnancies. The constitution, acknowledged Justice Blackmun, does not mention abortion. Section 1 of the Fourteenth Amendment, however, prohibits the states from depriving any person of liberty without due process of law. Following ratification of the Fourteenth Amendment in 1868, the Supreme Court at first interpreted the language as authorizing state authorities to deprive individuals of their freedom, for example through incarceration, but only after affording them a fair trial. This approach was known as the "procedural due process" understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment. In the 1880s, however, the Supreme Court began to strike down state laws that constricted people's economic liberties on the grounds that they were unfair. An excellent example is Lochner v. New York (1905), where the Court found a New York law limiting the number of hours that bakers could work unconstitutional. This interpretation became known as the "substantive due process" reading of the Fourteenth Amendment. After 1937, the Court began employing the substantive due process doctrine to invalidate state laws, such as the one challenged in Roe, that intrude upon non-economic, or personal, liberty.

In Griswold v. Connecticut (1965), in an appeal brought by a married couple, the Supreme Court held that a state law prohibiting the use of contraceptives denied a liberty protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, a freedom that the Court extended to the unmarried in 1972 (Eisenstadt v. Baird). In Loving v. Virginia (1967), the Court ruled that men and women have a constitutional right to marry whomever they wish, regardless of race. In Roe, Justice Blackmun explained that contraception, marriage, and abortion were personal freedoms belonging to a subset of liberty that could be described as the right of privacy. He pointed out that, although the Constitution never uses the term "privacy," it implicitly recognizes zones of privacy. Justice Louis Brandeis first referred to privacy as a constitutional right in 1928 in a dissent in a Fourth Amendment case, Olmstead v. United States, which he described as the right to be let alone by the government. Privacy is, therefore, an implied right, found in the shadows, or penumbras, cast by such explicit provisions of the Bill of Rights as the First Amendment's guarantee of freedom of speech and press, the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches and seizures, and the Fifth Amendment's right to remain silent during governmental interrogation. The district court also had referred to the Ninth Amendment which recognizes that individuals enjoy rights in addition to those explicitly mentioned in the first eight amendments of the Constitution (Bill of Rights). Justice Blackmun, however, grounded the abortion right in the concept of personal liberty guaranteed against state action by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

The next issue faced by the Court was whether the fetus is a human being and, as such, enjoys the right to life protected by the same due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment on which Jane Roe was relying. Justice Blackmun held that human life does not begin until birth, and thus denied any constitutional rights to the embryo or fetus.

Justice Blackmun regarded the Constitution as a living, evolving document, whose meaning changes with the needs of society and popular attitudes. He noted that there was a flurry of activity in the state legislatures during the Victorian age to make abortion a crime. This punitive treatment of abortion stood in sharp contrast with the English common law that existed at the time the Constitution was drafted and in the laws of ancient Greece and Rome and the original position of the Catholic Church, all of which permitted abortion at least until the moment of quickening, when the mother could feel the fetus move on its own within the womb. As the medical procedure of abortion became safer, however, and women began asserting their interests, states began in the 1960s to make abortion more readily available, either through legislative action or judicial decision. The Roe decision joined this progressive trend in the expansion of women's choices.

The Court rejected the more extreme claim made by the plaintiff that women have a constitutional right to do what they want with their bodies. In earlier decisions, for example, the Supreme Court had upheld the right of states to make immunization compulsory. Justice Blackmun said that the appropriate standard to use in measuring restraints upon such a fundamental right as abortion is whether the state has a compelling interest in restricting its exercise. He found two such compelling interests: the health of the mother and preservation of potential human life. In order to strike a reasonable balance between the woman's personal liberty and the state's interests in restraining that liberty, Justice Blackmun divided human gestation into three periods, or trimesters. During the first trimester, abortions are safer than childbirth. Therefore, the woman has an unlimited right to terminate her pregnancy as long as she can find a qualified medical professional to perform the procedure. Because abortions performed after the twelfth week of pregnancy pose greater risk to the woman's health, the state can intervene by prescribing the kind of facility where abortions can be procured. After viability, the point where the fetus could live on its own outside the mother's womb, which occurs approximately at the end of the second trimester, the state can prohibit all abortions except those necessary for the woman's life or health. Health, however, includes mental health. The decision whether a late-term abortion is necessary to preserve a woman's mental health, or well-being, is one for the attending physician to make alone, as a matter of professional judgment. The physician can consider such variables as the woman's age, income, marital status, and the potential burden of rearing an unwanted child. The result of the Court's reasoning in Roe is that women enjoy, for all practical purposes, nearly an absolute right to abortion, in spite of Chief Justice Warren Burger's statement in his concurring opinion that Roe does not give women a right to abortion on demand.

The Supreme Court has allowed some restrictions on the abortion right. In 1989 in Webster v. Reproductive Health Service, the Court upheld a Missouri law prohibiting public facilities and public employees from being used to perform abortions. The Court, in Hodgson v. Minnesota (1990), ruled that states can require minors to notify a parent prior to procuring an abortion or obtain the consent of a judge if parental notification would be unwise. In Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), the Court upheld a Pennsylvania requirement that a physician must provide state-scripted information about abortion to a woman twenty-four hours in advance of the procedure.

In Lawrence v. Texas (2003), homosexuals relied on the right to sexual privacy, developed in Roe, to challenge successfully state laws treating sodomy as a criminal act. The Court has yet to develop the full scope of the right to privacy, a right invoked by advocates of assisted suicide and in other areas where states continue to limit personal choice.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Balkin, Jack M., ed. What Roe v. Wade Should Have Said: The Nation's Top Legal Experts Rewrite America's Most Controversial Decision. New York: New York University Press, 2005.
- Faux, Marian. Roe v. Wade. New York: Cooper Square Press, 2000.
- Garrow, David J. Liberty and Sexuality: The Right to Privacy and the Making of Roe v. Wade. Berkeley: University of California Press, 1998.
- Hull, N.E.H., and Peter Charles Hoffer. Roe v. Wade: The Abortion Rights Controversy in American History. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2001.
- Weddington, Sarah. A Question of Choice. New York: Penguin, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Doe v. Bolton*, 410 U.S. 179 (1973)
Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Hodgson v. Minnesota, 497 U.S. 417 (1990)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
Lochner v. New York, 198 U.S. 45 (1905)
Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)
- See also Abortion; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Doe v. Bolton, 410 U.S. 179 (1973); Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Planned Parenthood v. Casey, 112 S.Ct. 2791 (1992); Reproductive Freedom; Right of Privacy; Substantive Due Process; Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

ROEMER v. MARYLAND BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS, 426 U.S. 736 (1976)

This case involved a challenge to a Maryland provision of annual grants to private colleges and universities, including religiously affiliated institutions, as long as (1) no funds were used for “sectarian purposes,” (2) no institution awarded “only seminarian or theological degrees,” and (3) the state determined eligibility for aid and compliance with the statute.

Anti-aid plaintiffs appealed to the Supreme Court which held (five to four) that the First Amendment establishment clause did not prohibit the aid statute. Justice Harry Blackmun, writing for the court, noted that the Maryland statute had a secular purpose (to support higher education); and did not have the primary effect of advancing religion since the autonomous Catholic institutions were not “pervasively sectarian,” did not require chapel attendance or classroom prayers, chose faculty and students “without regard to religion,” and supplemented mandatory religion classes with a wide range of liberal arts courses. Further, aid did not create “excessive” church/state entanglement (the colleges performed “essentially secular educational functions” and compliance audits were similar to generic college accreditation processes).

In his summation, Blackmun lectured on the necessary distinction between a scrupulous state neutrality “regarding religion and an impossible hermetic separation of the two.” He highlighted the Court’s past recognition that “religious institutions need not be quarantined from public benefits that are neutrally available to all,” and the state may sometimes “act in such a way that has the incidental effect of facilitating religious activity.” Neutrality with respect to religion meant only “the state must confine itself to secular objectives ... neither advance nor impede religious activity,” and avoid “such an intimate relationship with religious authority that it appears either to be sponsoring or to be excessively interfering with that authority.” Despite some inconsistency in demarcating acceptable and unacceptable church/state relations, the Court has usually held “neutral” aid to sectarian schools for secular activities and facilities permissible. In prior cases (Tilton v. Richardson [1971], Hunt v. McNair [1973], and Board of Education v. Allen [1968]), it found no constitutional bar against secular textbook subsidies for private schools or building grants for religious colleges.

Roemer dissenters, William Brennan, Thurgood Marshall, John Paul Stevens, and Potter Stewart, argued that the Maryland statute directly aided religious institutions and thus advanced religion—an establishment clause violation.

The debate over the extent to which a state may accommodate (without endorsing) religion in efforts to enhance education resurfaced repeatedly since Roemer. The Court ruled (1) state provision of textbooks and various health, remedial, guidance, and diagnostic services to students attending church-related schools (Wolman v. Walter [1977]); (2) tax breaks for church-related school tuition costs (Mueller v. Allen [1983]); (3) rehabilitation aid to a blind student in pastoral studies at a Christian college (Witters v. Washington [1986]); (4) provision of sign language interpreters for private school students (Zobrest v. Catalina [1993]); (5) provision of public school teachers for remedial instruction on parochial school campuses (Agostini v. Felton [1997]); and (6) government loans of “nonideological” educational material and equipment to sectarian schools (Mitchell v. Helms [2000]) did not violate the establishment clause.

These cases indicated that government aid that crosses paths in a neutral way and for secular purposes with church-related schools does not endorse or establish religion. They continued in the accommodationist understanding Blackmun revealed in his reminder in Roemer of the inevitable entanglement of church and state. He wrote:

A system of government that makes itself felt as pervasively as ours could hardly be expected never to cross paths with the church. In fact, our State and Federal Governments impose certain burdens upon, and impact certain benefits to, virtually all our activities, and religious activity is not an exception. The Court has enforced a scrupulous neutrality by the State, as among religions, and also as between religious and other activities, but a hermetic separation of the two is an impossibility it has never required.

L. SUE HULETT

References and Further Reading

- Alley, Robert. The Constitution and Religion: Leading Supreme Court Cases on Church and State. Amherst, NY: Prometheus Books, 1999.
- Levy, Leonard. The Establishment Clause. New York: Macmillan, 1986.
- McConnell, Michael, John H. Harvey, and Thomas C. Berg. Religion and the Constitution. New York: Aspen Publishers, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Board of Education v. Allen*, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
- Hunt v. McNair*, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)

Tilton v. Richardson, 403 U.S. 672 (1971)
Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind,
 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
Wolman v. Walter, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)
Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School Dist., 509 U.S. 1 (1993)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; First Amendment and PACs; Marshall, Thurgood; Stevens, John Paul; Stewart, Potter

ROMER v. EVANS, 517 U.S. 620 (1996)

In a statewide referendum in 1992, Colorado voters adopted “Amendment 2” to the state constitution. The impetus for the amendment was the adoption of legislation in various Colorado municipalities aimed at eliminating discrimination in housing, employment, education, and various forms of public accommodation on the basis of sexual orientation. The amendment effectively repealed these municipal ordinances and prohibited the enactment or official recognition of a “protected status” based on sexual orientation by the state or any of its political subdivisions. The Colorado Supreme Court enjoined enforcement of the amendment on the grounds that it impermissibly denied homosexuals the fundamental right to participate in the political process.

On appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court, the state argued that Amendment 2 merely restored the status quo ante—homosexuals would enjoy the same protections afforded other individuals, but no special protection based on their sexual orientation. In this way, according to the state, the amendment sought to respect the rights of citizens more broadly, including landlords and employers, who wished to refrain from associating with homosexuals. It would also allow the state to conserve its resources to combat other forms of discrimination.

The Court held that Amendment 2 violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, failing to satisfy even the most deferential standard of constitutional review. Specifically, the broad scope of Amendment 2, spanning both the public and private spheres, was not commensurate with the meager rationales offered to support it. Instead, “its sheer breadth is so discontinuous with the reasons offered for it that the amendment seems inexplicable by anything but animus toward the class it affects.” Thus, although homosexuals do not constitute a “suspect class” triggering heightened constitutional scrutiny, the Court could not discern even a rational relationship between Amendment 2 and a legitimate state interest. Moreover, far from restoring homosexuals to a position of equality with other citizens, the amendment imposed a “special disability” on homosexuals, uniquely denying them the means of legal and political redress available to other citizens. “A State cannot so deem a class of persons a stranger to its laws.”

In a vigorous dissent, Justice Scalia chided the Court for taking sides in the culture wars. Where, as here, neither the Constitution nor historical tradition condemns the challenged provision, it is not the Court’s role to second-guess the value judgments of democratic decision makers. Further, Scalia noted the Court’s failure to reconcile its rejection of Amendment 2 with its earlier holding in Bowers v. Hardwick (1986), which permitted states to criminalize homosexual conduct. “If it is constitutionally permissible for a State to make homosexual conduct criminal, surely it is constitutionally permissible for a State to enact other laws merely disfavoring homosexual conduct.” Indeed, because homosexuals would continue to be protected against discrimination by laws of general applicability, Amendment 2 merely placed them on equal footing with other citizens by denying them special treatment. In addition, Amendment 2 did not deny them access to the political process to any greater degree than other citizens unfavorably affected by duly enacted state constitutional provisions. Equal protection of the laws, including equal access to the political process, does not require that citizens be able to pursue their legislative agenda at the most local and accessible level of political decision making. Finally, despite the Court’s disapproving tone, the state was readily able to meet the burden of providing a legitimate justification for Amendment 2—the moral disapproval of homosexual conduct by a majority of Coloradans.

By deciding Romer on equal protection grounds, the Court was able to avoid a direct confrontation with its holding in Bowers that the criminalization of homosexual conduct is constitutionally permissible. In 2003, however, the Court revisited the question presented in Bowers. In Lawrence v. Texas, the Court invalidated a criminal prohibition on homosexual sodomy, invoking the substantive component of the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Court noted that Romer’s equal protection analysis provided viable grounds for invalidating the Texas statute, but it determined that the rights of homosexuals would be better secured by a recognition of their fundamental right to privacy in intimate relationships. In this way, Romer was a key decision in the Court’s evolving jurisprudence of sexual privacy rights. Drawing on a handful of equal protection decisions that seemed to apply heightened constitutional scrutiny to legislation disadvantaging unpopular groups, including retarded persons and “hippies” living communally, Romer signaled the Court's growing intolerance for laws it judges to be "born of animosity toward the class of persons affected."

MARY SIGLER

References and Further Reading

Farber, Daniel, and Suzanna Sherry, The Pariah Principle, Constitutional Commentary 13 (1996): 257.
Sullivan, Kathleen M., and Gerald Gunther. Constitutional Law. 15th ed. New York: Foundation Press, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)

See also Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Gay and Lesbian Rights; Privacy; Sodomy Laws; Substantive Due Process

ROOSEVELT, FRANKLIN DELANO (1882–1945)

Franklin Delano Roosevelt, thirty-second president of the United States (1933–1945), cited the protection and expansion of civil liberties throughout the world as a justification for U.S. entry into World War II, broadened liberty to include entitlement to public benefits, such as food and shelter, and appointed justices to the Supreme Court who played critical roles in the expansion of civil liberties into the 1970s. At the same time, Roosevelt's record on civil liberties is deeply blemished. He authorized the internment of more than 100,000 Japanese Americans during the war, most of whom were U.S. citizens, even though there was no evidence of disloyalty or criminal activity on the detainees' part, an act repudiated by the U.S. Congress in 1988.

Franklin D. Roosevelt was born on January 30, 1882, at his family's estate at Hyde Park, New York, overlooking the Hudson River. His mother came from a wealthy family, and his father was a successful businessman, with an interest in Democratic politics. He was schooled by tutors at home until the age of fourteen. A graduate of Groton School and Harvard College, he supported the vice-presidential and presidential campaigns of his cousin, Theodore Roosevelt, in 1900 and 1904. He attended Columbia University Law School and practiced law in New York City. In 1905, he married his distant cousin, Anna Eleanor Roosevelt, niece of President Theodore Roosevelt, who was present at the ceremony.

He won election to the New York State Senate in 1910. At the state capitol in Albany, he became known as a champion of economic and social reform. Roosevelt campaigned for Woodrow Wilson in the 1912 presidential election and was rewarded by the victorious Wilson with appointment as assistant secretary of the Navy. In 1920 Roosevelt sought and won the Democratic nomination for the vice presidency but was forced to return to private life after the Republican Warren Harding's victory. In August 1921 he was struck down by poliomyelitis and was never able again to walk unaided. He soon returned to politics and was elected governor of New York in 1928.

In 1932, Roosevelt received the Democratic presidential nomination. In his acceptance speech delivered at the convention in Chicago, he promised a New Deal for Americans. The New Deal was his response to the crisis of the Great Depression and signified that the federal government would become involved in social and economic regulation at an unprecedented level. Roosevelt easily defeated Republican President Herbert Hoover and began the first of four presidential terms in March 1933.

Roosevelt's presidency (1933–1945) resulted in the expansion and redefinition of civil liberties in the United States. The New Deal introduced far-reaching reforms within the economy and represented the beginning of what was later termed "the welfare state." As leader of the Democratic Party, he transformed it from an institution associated with conservative principles and laissez-faire capitalism into the chief vehicle for the promotion of liberal policies, including government regulation of the economy and protection of the poor, unemployed, and aged against hardship and deprivation. He empowered the labor movement by including protections for union organizing in the New Deal. The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 gave federal protection to the right of workers to organize and bargain through unions.

Roosevelt, in his 1941 State of the Union Address, delivered before a joint session of Congress on January 6, focused understandably on the threat to national security posed by the aggressive acts of the Axis Powers, Germany, Italy, and Japan. By the end of the year the United States would be at war with all three countries. Toward the end of his speech, he shifted from a presentation of foreign and defense policy to domestic issues. He pointed out that the rise of dictators in Italy, Germany, and elsewhere in the 1920s and 1930s was due to economic and social problems, problems that spawned a social revolution. He described the foundations of a healthy and strong democracy: equality of opportunity, the ending of special privilege for the few, jobs, a rising standard of living, security, and the preservation of civil liberties. He asked Congress to expand old-age pensions and unemployment insurance and widen the opportunities for adequate medical care. He closed his address by saying that he looked forward to a world founded upon four essential human freedoms: freedom of speech and expression, freedom of religion, freedom from want, and freedom from fear. “Freedom,” he concluded, “means the supremacy of human rights everywhere.” Roosevelt continued this theme in the Atlantic Charter, issued jointly with British Prime Minister Winston Churchill on August 14, 1941. The charter promised the peoples of the world suffering from the hardships of World War II improved economic conditions, freedom from fear, and the disarmament of the aggressor nations.

Not only did Roosevelt cite the preservation and restoration of civil liberties, especially freedom of speech and religion, as a justification for going to war against the Axis dictatorships, more importantly, he redefined liberty itself. James Madison, author of the Bill of Rights, in 1787 had conceived liberty as a person’s right to be left alone by government. Freedom had an essentially negative meaning. Government may not intrude upon an individual’s expression of political or religious opinions. Government may not prescribe modes of worship or establish an official religion. Freedom was something enjoyed by individuals in the private sphere and was dependent upon the absence of governmental restraint. While acknowledging the value of this form of liberty, Roosevelt believed that human beings were not truly free if they were hungry, homeless, idle and in fear of their lives or property. He called for a positive role for government in securing civil liberties by making government responsible for meeting the needs of the poor, the elderly and the disabled—needs previously met primarily by families or private charities. This package of government provided benefits came to be known as the social safety net. Roosevelt established the welfare state through legislation enacted during his first term (1933–1937), the most important of which was the Social Security Act of 1935. The act provided unemployment insurance, an old-age pension system, and financial assistance for dependent children and the blind. The funds needed to finance such extensive programs of public assistance were supplied by taxes, including payroll taxes shared equally by employers and employees.

Roosevelt’s recasting of liberty as consisting of both negative and positive rights played an enormous role in the way that many Americans came to understand civil liberties. In Roe v. Wade (1973), for example, the Supreme Court recognized the negative right of a woman to terminate her pregnancy, free of the threat of criminal sanction. This decision lay within what the Court referred to as a zone of privacy protected by the Fourteenth Amendment, which guaranteed that no person would be deprived of liberty without due process of law. In Harris v. McRae (1980), four dissenting justices expressed the opinion that, for a poor woman, the freedom to terminate a pregnancy is meaningless unless the government is willing to pay for her abortion. The Constitution, they claimed, does not protect individual rights without obliging the government to provide to the indigent the means of enjoying them. A majority of the justices of the Supreme Court, however, has refused to accept that there is a necessary linkage between civil liberties and government entitlements.

Two justices who embraced an expanded view of individual freedom were Roosevelt appointees—Hugo Black and William Douglas. Roosevelt’s appointment of liberal justices to the Supreme Court had an enormous and enduring impact on the expansion of civil liberties. Roosevelt was able to transform the Court from a conservative bastion of laissez-faire economics into a champion of civil liberties and the welfare state because of his demand expressed in 1937 that Congress increase the size of the tribunal from nine to fifteen justices. Although Congress ultimately failed to enact his “court-packing” plan, two of the jurists who had opposed the New Deal, Chief Justice Charles Evans Hughes and Associate Justice Owen Roberts, in response to the president’s campaign against the High Court, changed their minds and began voting in favor of the constitutionality of New Deal legislation, a change known as “the switch in time that saved nine.” Now in the minority, the anti-New Deal “four horsemen of the Apocalypse”—Justices George Sutherland, James McReynolds, Pierce Butler, and Willis Van Devanter—began to retire from the high bench, leaving vacancies for the president to fill with like-minded justices.

Roosevelt appointed Black to the Court in 1937. Black, as a Democratic senator from Alabama, had strongly supported the New Deal, including the Fair Labor Standards Act which established a minimum wage and maximum hours for workers. Black took an absolutist view of the First Amendment, declaring that neither Congress nor the state legislatures could make any law abridging freedom of speech or the press. He opposed governmental controls over what had been considered offensive or dangerous speech, such as obscenity, defamation and sedition. He also supported racial desegregation, the separation of church and state and the rights of the criminally accused, including, in Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), the right of indigent defendants to a government-appointed attorney. In his opinion for the Court, Black expressed the view that the right to counsel, guaranteed by the Sixth Amendment, was a positive right, requiring government involvement if it was to have any meaning for the poor.

William O. Douglas served on several federal regulatory commissions from 1934 until 1939. In 1939, Roosevelt appointed him as an associate justice of the Supreme Court. Douglas, one of the most liberal justices ever to serve on the Court, supported the Supreme Court's ban on prayers in public schools (Engel v. Vitale [1962]), saw a right of privacy implied in the Bill of Rights (Griswold v. Connecticut [1965]) and expanded the definition of speech to include symbolic expression, such as the burning of a draft card to protest the war in Vietnam (United States v. O'Brien [1968]). Douglas also viewed tax exemptions for churches as unconstitutional governmental subsidies for religion (Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York [1970]).

Roosevelt, Black, and Douglas, however, were not consistent supporters of civil liberties. In Korematsu v. United States (1944), Black wrote the opinion for the Court, an opinion in which Douglas joined, supporting President Roosevelt's order to remove all Japanese Americans from the western coast of the United States and place them in detention camps during the course of the war. After the Japanese surprise attack on American naval facilities at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, on December 7, 1941, there was widespread fear of disloyalty by Japanese citizens and resident aliens living in the United States. On February 19, 1942, the president, citing the danger of espionage and sabotage, issued Executive Order 9066 authorizing military authorities to remove persons of Japanese ancestry from the West Coast. The army detained and relocated 120,000 Japanese Americans to camps in the interior of the country. Ironically, the military authorities did not arrest and remove Japanese Americans living in Hawaii, the U.S. territory with the highest percentage of persons of Japanese descent and the site of the Japanese attack. Moreover, residents of German and Italian ancestry were not removed. More than 60 percent of the Japanese Americans who were forcibly taken away from their homes were U.S. citizens.

Many Japanese Americans lost their property and means of livelihood during their long confinement in the relocation centers. Following the war, many of them demanded reparations and, in 1980, Congress established the Commission on Wartime Relocation and Internment of Civilians. The commission found that there was no military necessity for the internment and blamed it on racial prejudice, an irrational fear of a Japanese invasion and the failure of President Roosevelt to exercise proper leadership. In 1988, President Ronald Reagan signed the Civil Liberties Act of 1988, which provided an apology from the federal government and compensation of $20,000 to each surviving internee.

Roosevelt, Black, and Douglas's support for the deprivation of freedom on the basis of one's race illustrates the dilemma that supporters of civil liberties face in time of war. Roosevelt's action is often placed with Abraham Lincoln's suspension of the writ of habeas corpus during the Civil War and Woodrow Wilson's suppression of free speech during World War I as the three most egregious examples of violation of civil liberties during wartime.

Roosevelt died in Warm Springs, Georgia, on April 12, 1945, of a cerebral hemorrhage, only three months into his unprecedented fourth term as president.

KENNETH M. HOLLAND

References and Further Reading

- Black, Conrad. Franklin Delano Roosevelt: Champion of Freedom. New York: Public Affairs, 2003.
- Kersch, Kenneth I. Constructing Civil Liberties: Discontinuities in the Development of American Constitutional Law. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.
- McMahon, Kevin J. Reconsidering Roosevelt on Race: How the Presidency Paved the Road to Brown. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004.
- Rehnquist, William H. All the Laws but One: Civil Liberties in Wartime. New York: Knopf, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Engel v. Vitale*, 370 U.S. 421 (1962)
- Gideon v. Wainwright*, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Harris v. McRae*, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
- Korematsu v. United States*, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- United States v. O'Brien*, 391 U.S. 367 (1968)
- Walz v. Tax Commission of the City of New York*, 397 U.S. 664 (1970)

See also Douglas, William Orville; Japanese Internment Cases; New Deal and Civil Liberties; World War II, Civil Liberties in

RORTY, RICHARD (1931–)

Richard Rorty is one of America's most distinguished, broad-ranging, and controversial philosophers. Born in New York City, he received his bachelor's and master's degrees from the University of Chicago, in 1949 and 1952, respectively, and his doctorate from Yale University in 1956. He is currently professor of comparative literature at Stanford University, and he has had previous academic appointments at Virginia, Princeton, and Wellesley College.

Rorty views his philosophy as following in the pragmatist tradition that includes the American philosophers William James, Charles Sanders Peirce, and, Rorty's philosophical hero, John Dewey. His work, however, also draws upon the writings of several other philosophers (whom he claims as philosophical allies), in both the analytic and continental philosophical traditions, including Wittgenstein, Sellars, Quine, Davidson, Kuhn, Heidegger, Nietzsche, and Derrida. His writings have two main components: a destructive project that seeks to debunk certain entrenched, mainstream philosophical ideas, and a constructive project that seeks to present a vision of social, cultural, and political life without these entrenched ideas.

On the destructive side, Rorty's pragmatism is perhaps best described as "anti-essentialist" in that it attempts to show that core philosophical problems—and the concepts they invoke such as truth, knowledge, reality, justification, good, moral, right—are thoroughly contingent and dispensable rather than perennial and necessary. According to Rorty, modern philosophy, from around the time of Descartes to the present, has been obsessed with attempting to discover the one true description of reality. This obsession manifests itself, for example, in epistemological accounts that search for infallible knowledge, metaphysical accounts that search for the nature of reality or mind, and truth theories that define truth as correspondence to reality or the facts. Those who focus on whether our descriptions represent reality, he argues, have been led astray by a picture of inquiry that he refers to metaphorically as "mirroring," as in whether our descriptions "reflect" reality. (The title of his now-classic book on this subject is Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature.)

Rorty sees this concern with something external to humans—that is, the "world" or "reality" or "the facts" or "science"—as a vestige of pre-Enlightenment religious thinking. He describes humanity as maturing when it realized that it did not need an external God to give it laws or morality. But, he suggests, humanity replaced its religious impulses by creating a replacement deity out of the idea of objective reality, that is, replaced one external source telling humanity how it is with another. Thus, he sees a second stage of maturity or enlightenment occurring when humanity realizes that the world does not privilege one description or vocabulary, scientific or otherwise, over all others. Instead, Rorty sees our descriptions as bound up in various linguistic, scientific, and other social practices. And the vocabularies generated by these practices are to be viewed as tools for achieving certain human purposes. Therefore, they, like other tools, should be judged by the practical aid they provide in navigating and coping with our environment rather than whether they get reality right.

What, then, does Rorty's world look like once humanity gets over God and science? It is one in which we stop looking backward for extrahuman authority and instead look forward for different visions of how we might want to live. It emphasizes human solidarity and social hope. Rather than filled with arguments about what is required, it involves democratic competition over different utopian dreams, competition over which future we would like to bring about, to make true. Rorty has criticized the American academic left, in particular, for focusing too much on negative critiques rather than on offering positive visions of such possible futures.

His vision is one that is unabashedly leftist, but not radical. It aims at liberal piecemeal reforms that increase freedom while decreasing suffering, cruelty, and humiliation. These aims in turn allow for human flourishing, publicly and privately. They engender a public sphere in which cultural institutions and objects can continue to evolve and supplant previous ones, and in which alternate futures can compete for the public imagination. And they allow everyone a private sphere in which they have the freedom to create themselves. Rorty presents this vision while taking the ironic stance that none of it is required or true or right, acknowledging that it and our views are just as historically contingent as anything else.

MICHAEL S. PARDO

References and Further Reading

- Brandom, Robert B., ed. Rorty and His Critics. Oxford: Blackwell, 2000.
- Rorty, Richard. Philosophy and Social Hope. London: Penguin, 1999.
- . Achieving Our Country: Leftist Thought in Twentieth Century America. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1998.
- . Truth and Progress. Vol. 3, Philosophical Papers. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998.
- . Essays on Heidegger and Others. Vol. 2, Philosophical Papers. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- . Objectivity, Relativism, and Truth. Vol. 1, Philosophical Papers. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1991.
- . Contingency, Irony, and Solidarity. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1989.
- . Consequences of Pragmatism. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1982.
- . Philosophy and the Mirror of Nature. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1979.

ROSALES-LOPEZ v. UNITED STATES, 451 U.S. 182 (1981)

On December 10, 1978, Humberto Rosales-Lopez was arrested for participation in a scheme to smuggle three Mexican aliens into southern California. Prior to trial, Rosales-Lopez, who is of Mexican descent, requested that the trial judge, in conducting voir dire, question potential jurors as to their possible prejudice against Mexicans. The trial judge refused to ask that specific question but did question potential jurors as to their possible prejudice against aliens. Rosales-Lopez was subsequently tried and convicted on all charges. Rosales-Lopez appealed, arguing that the trial judge's refusal to ask potential jurors on possible prejudice against Mexicans was an error. The Court of Appeals rejected that argument and affirmed the conviction.

The U.S. Supreme Court agreed with the lower courts. The Court, reaffirming its holdings in Aldridge v. United States (1931) and Ristaino v. Ross (1976), held that while a federal judge, in having an intimate connection with the trial, has ample discretion in conducting a voir dire examination, is constitutionally required in "special circumstances" where racial issues are "inextricably bound up with the trial" to question potential jurors about their racial and ethnic biases. The Court went on to say, absent such "special circumstances" a trial judge's failure to ask questions concerning racial or ethnic bias is only an error where there is a "reasonable possibility" that race or ethnic prejudice might influence the jury's impartiality. Although the determination of what constitutes a "reasonable possibility" should be done by the trial judge on a case-by-case basis, the Court suggested inquiries are required in cases of violent crimes involving members of different racial or ethnic groups.

MARCEL GREEN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Aldridge v. United States, 238 U.S. 308 (1931)
Ristaino v. Ross, 424 U.S. 589 (1976)

ROSE v. LOCKE, 423 U.S. 48 (1975)

In a per curiam opinion, the U.S. Supreme Court held that a Tennessee statute proscribing "crimes against nature" was not unconstitutionally vague as applied to the act of cunnilingus (oral stimulation of the vulva or clitoris). The Supreme Court's decision was without plenary review; thus, it disallowed the parties the opportunity for oral arguments. Three justices dissented: Brennan, Marshall, and Stewart.

Respondent Locke was convicted and sentenced to five to seven years imprisonment under Tennessee's criminal code for having committed a "crime against nature." The evidence showed that under threat of knifepoint, he forced his female neighbor to submit to him twice performing cunnilingus upon her. The respondent challenged the Tennessee statute's proscription of "crimes against nature" on due process grounds: he claimed that the language "crime against nature" was so vague, that it did not give citizens fair warning of just what sort of acts were prohibited. According to the respondent, the main vice with the Tennessee statute was that several states differed as to whether the words "crime against nature" were narrowly or broadly construed. A narrow construction limited the offense to sodomy; a broad construction included many other forms of sexual activity.

The Supreme Court was unconvinced with the respondent's vagueness argument. It held that the challenged statutory phrase, "crime against nature" was no vaguer than many other terms describing criminal offenses at common law. In fact, all that the due process clause required, in terms of notice, is that laws give "sufficient warning that men may conduct themselves so as to avoid that which is forbidden." Furthering its position, the Court cited three specific instances giving the respondent sufficiently clear notice that his conduct would be included within the Tennessee statute's proscription. First, in the 1955 Fisher case, the Tennessee courts rejected the claim that "crime against nature" did not include fellatio. Thus, this decision extended the statute's scope beyond the traditional common law definition of "crime against nature," which was limited to anal sex. Second, in the 1959 Sherril case, the Tennessee state courts further emphasized that the "crime against nature" language was to be given the broadest meaning possible. Third, in the 1959 Townsend case, a Maine statute, which the Tennessee courts had twice previously equated with its own, was made applicable to cunnilingus. Although Tennessee courts had never previously applied their statute to the act of cunnilingus, other jurisdictions had; and this was enough notice to the respondent.

The vagueness language of the Rose decision has been frequently cited in subsequent Supreme Court decisions. In contexts other than the First Amendment, it is sufficient that a statutory proscription only make out a rough area of prohibited conduct.

KERRY L. MUEHLENBECK

References and Further Reading

U.S. Const., Fourteenth Amendment.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fisher v. State, 197 Tenn. 594 277 S.W. 2d 340 (1955)
Sherril v. State, 204 Tenn. 427, 429, 321 S.W. 2d 811, 812 (1959)
State v. Townsend, 145 Me. 384, 71 A. 2d 517 (1950)

ROSENBERG, JULIUS AND ETHEL

On June 19, 1953, shortly after 8 P.M., in the Sing Sing Correctional Facility in Ossining, New York, Julius and Ethel Rosenberg were executed. A little more than two years before, both had been convicted for passing to the Soviet Union atomic secrets related to U.S. development of a nuclear weapon (the Manhattan Project), in violation of Section 2 of the Espionage Act of 1917. Both were sentenced by U.S. District Court Judge Irving Kaufman to die by electrocution in Sing Sing's electric chair. The Rosenbergs maintained their innocence to the very end. Although certain facts of the case remain contested to the present day, some factual matters seem to have been resolved when, in 1995, the National Security Agency released declassified translations from the "Venona Project." It now seems clear that Julius Rosenberg had indeed passed information to Soviet agents, although the actual harm to U.S. security caused by his actions remains contested. Ethel Rosenberg's knowing involvement in any espionage activity, however, seems very much in doubt.

At the time of the Rosenbergs' arrest and trial, the United States was in the grip of an increasing level of fear. On September 29, 1949, President Truman announced to the American public that the Soviet Union had exploded an atomic bomb. The specter of the communist nation, now armed with an atomic bomb, much sooner than anyone expected, generated anxiety at all levels of American society. The Cold War was now fully engaged. An increasingly virulent anticommunism manifested itself in the prosecution under the Smith Act of several Communist Party members toward the end of 1948 (see Dennis et al. v. United States [1951]). And the Rosenberg prosecution itself contributed to the emergence of a second "red scare" associated with the brief national ascendance of Wisconsin Senator Joseph McCarthy.

The origins of the Rosenberg prosecution can, perhaps, be traced to the early days of 1950 and the conviction for perjury of former State Department official Alger Hiss. Two years earlier, Hiss was named as once having been involved in unlawful clandestine Communist Party activity by former Communist Party member Whittaker Chambers, in testimony given before an executive session of the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC). Later testifying before both the HUAC and a subsequently convened federal grand jury, Hiss denied, under oath, any past or present involvement with the Communist Party. Chambers was able, however, to produce compelling evidence to the contrary and Hiss was ultimately charged and convicted on two counts of perjury, for which he served the majority of a five-year sentence in federal prison. Despite Hiss's continued protestations of innocence, and despite continued support for Hiss from various quarters, the attention given to Chambers's accusations and Hiss's subsequent conviction provided a platform for anticommunist crusaders such as Senator McCarthy, who alleged extensive communist infiltration at the highest levels of government. Then, within a month of Alger Hiss's conviction, the British physicist Klaus Fuchs was arrested and charged with passing atomic secrets to the Soviet Union. The information was related to Fuchs's work as a nuclear scientist on the Manhattan Project, begun in New York City and brought to completion in the New Mexico desert at the Los Alamos facility. Confronted with evidence obtained from the "Venona Project"—evidence that indicated he had been transferring detailed nuclear secrets to an American chemist and Soviet agent named Harry Gold—Fuchs soon confessed. He was convicted of espionage and sentenced to fourteen years in prison, of which he served nine years. Gold, too, quickly provided a voluntary confession regarding his role in receiving and transmitting information from Fuchs as well as other activity; he was sentenced to thirty years in prison. Exposure of the Fuchs–Gold connection at Los Alamos began to clear a trail that would also lead to the Rosenbergs.

When questioned by the Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI), Harry Gold provided information of an un-named American soldier who had worked at the Los Alamos facility and who had provided Gold with important information regarding an "implosion lens" for an atomic weapon. Further investigation revealed the name of the soldier, Gold's contact, to be David Greenglass. Greenglass was Ethel Rosenberg's brother. In June 1950, during FBI questioning, David Greenglass confessed to passing secret information to Harry Gold; he also identified others whom he alleged were involved in the "spy ring," among them, his brother-in-law, Julius Rosenberg. Indeed, Greenglass maintained that Rosenberg was the one who initially encouraged and would later direct his illegal activity. Greenglass's testimony would prove crucial in the government's prosecution of the Rosenbergs. He received a fifteen-year sentence and, in 2001, would admit that he falsely implicated his older sister Ethel Rosenberg, under pressure from the FBI, in order to protect his wife Ruth from potential prosecution.

Within a month of Greenglass's initial questioning, Julius Rosenberg was picked up at his New York apartment for questioning. Rosenberg, the son of Polish immigrants, grew up in very modest circumstances in Manhattan's lower east side. While a student at New York's City College, Rosenberg became involved in leftist politics, joining the college's Young Communist League (YCL). It was through his involvement with the YCL that Rosenberg would meet his future wife, Ethel Greenglass. And, it was also City College where Rosenberg initially met and became friends with Morton Sobell. Sobell would later stand trial as a co-defendant with the Rosenbergs. Convicted and sentenced to thirty years in prison, Sobell continued to maintain his innocence after his release from prison in 1969.

Unlike Fuchs, Gold, and Greenglass, Julius Rosenberg refused to admit involvement in any illegal activity, and refused to name names of those who might be involved in such activity. On July 17, 1950, within a month after the FBI first questioned him, and based in part on further information provided by David Greenglass and his wife Ruth, Julius Rosenberg was arrested while at home with his family. Rosenberg continued to deny the allegations against him. Less than a month later, on August 11, 1950, Ethel Rosenberg was arrested by the FBI as well. Although the evidence against her was limited, many historians have suggested that Ethel Rosenberg's arrest was initially premised on the belief by the FBI that she could be used to leverage a confession from her husband. If this was the plan, it failed, and U.S. Attorney Irving Saypol, fresh from his successful prosecution of Alger Hiss, along with Assistant U.S. Attorney Roy Cohn, secured grand jury indictments on January 31, 1951, and commenced with the federal prosecution that culminated in the trial of Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, and Morton Sobell, in the New York federal courthouse on March 6, 1951.

In a jury trial lasting nearly a month, the prosecution relied heavily on testimony by Ruth and David Greenglass, and Harry Gold. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg testified in their own behalf and were the only witnesses called by defense attorney Emanuel Bloch. Closing statements by both the prosecution and defense were marked by appeals to the jurors' emotions. Emanuel Bloch, whose zealous advocacy on behalf of the Rosenbergs has become legendary, urged members of the jury to set aside any anticommunist biases they might have held, but then sought, in the harshest of language, to direct the jurors' emotions against the principal prosecution witness, David Greenglass. In so doing, Bloch seemed to gesture toward another law, one of family and blood relations, something violated by Greenglass's testimony. Bloch seemed to want to use Greenglass's tragic "betrayal" of his older sister and her husband as a way to push the Rosenbergs' alleged betrayal of their country to the margins of the jurors' consciousness. Irving Saypol, on the other hand, sought to underscore the Rosenberg's Communist Party membership. This was an ideological affiliation, according to Saypol that, once understood, would explain the Rosenbergs' behavior. Their loyalties, said Saypol, were to the Soviet Union and the cause of worldwide communist revolution. The trial ended on March 28, 1951 and a jury of eleven men and one woman would, the next day, find all three defendants guilty, under the Espionage Act of 1917, of "conspiring to commit espionage in wartime."

Judge Irving Kaufman imposed the death sentence against the Rosenbergs on April 5. In his sentencing statement, Judge Kaufman characterized the Rosenbergs' crime as "worse than murder." According to Kaufman, the Rosenbergs put an atomic bomb into the hands of the Soviet Union "years before our best scientists predicted." In other words, the monopoly on atomic weapons enjoyed by the United States and its allies had ended as a result of the Rosenbergs' actions and, as Kaufman understood it, they were, therefore, directly responsible for endangering the entire country, putting at risk millions of innocent people—a betrayal that, said Kaufman, "undoubtedly ... altered the course of history to the disadvantage of our country."

Over the next two years, Emanuel Bloch unsuccessfully appealed the Rosenberg's conviction. Thousands of others—including the Rosenbergs' own small children—marched in support of the couple, urging political intervention on the Rosenbergs' behalf. On June 19, 1953, the couple's efforts were exhausted, however, as the U.S. Supreme Court vacated a stay of execution that had been entered two days before by Justice William O. Douglas. They were executed later that evening.

WILLIAM ROSE

References and Further Reading

- Gaddis, John Lewis. The Cold War: A New History. New York: Penguin Press, 2005.
- Haynes, John Earl, and Harvey Klehr. Venona: Decoding Soviet Espionage in America. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 2000.
- Meeropol, Robert, and Michael Meeropol. We Are Your Sons: The Legacy of Ethel and Julius Meeropol. 2nd ed. Urbana-Champaign: University of Illinois Press, 1987.
- Meeropol, Robert. An Execution in the Family: One Son's Journey. New York: St. Martin's Press, 2003.

Nizer, Louis. The Implosion Conspiracy. Garden City, NJ: Fawcett Books, 1973.
 Radosh, Ronald, and Joyce Milton. The Rosenberg File. 2nd ed. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1997.
 Roberts, Sam. The Brother: The Untold Story of the Rosenberg Case. New York: Random House, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dennis, et al. v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Rosenberg v. United States, 346 U.S. 273 (1953)
United States v. Rosenberg, 195 F.2d 583 (2nd Cir., 1952)
United States v. Rosenberg, 200 F.2d 666 (2nd Cir., 1952)
 18 U.S.C. Section 792 et seq.

ROSENBERGER v. RECTOR AND VISITORS OF THE UNIVERSITY OF VIRGINIA, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)

The Student Activities Fund (SAF) of the University of Virginia (UVA) subsidizes student publications by paying outside contractors for printing costs; SAF funds come from mandatory student fees. Wide Awake Productions (WAP), a Christian student organization that publishes a newspaper, Wide Awake: A Christian Perspective at the University of Virginia, was denied SAF funding because the newspaper “primarily promotes or manifests a particular belief in or about a deity or ultimate reality.” UVA contended that subsidizing “Wide Awake” would violate the establishment clause of the Constitution. A five-to-four majority of the Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that UVA’s denial constituted impermissible viewpoint discrimination prohibited by the free speech clause of the First Amendment, and was not required by the establishment clause.

Conflict over state financial and other aid to religious institutions has been a continuing strain in American life and law. Even prior to adoption of the Constitution, Americans struggled to reconcile the deep religiousness of the American people with an equally profound awareness of the need for church–state separation in a nation with widely varying faiths.

Education at all levels has been perhaps the most frequent battleground, and the many Supreme Court decisions on state aid to religion have traced an inconsistent and often baffling line. The difficulties and resulting inconsistencies appeared in the Supreme Court’s first decision for state aid to religious schools. In Everson v. Board of Education (1947), the Court seemed to espouse a “no aid” principle as a result of which, neither a state nor the federal government “can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another.” Despite the apparent comprehensiveness of that statement, however, a five-to-four majority of the Court in Everson allowed public funding for bus transportation to religious schools.

In 1971, the Court developed what became known as the “Lemon test” for state aid to religious entities. The test focused on the purpose and effect of the state support, and whether monitoring the aid would excessively “entangle” the government in religious matters (Lemon v. Kurtzman [1971]).

Ten years later, an eight-to-one majority ruled that religious worship and instruction were entitled to full constitutional protection under the free speech clause. If a university allowed student groups generally to meet in university classrooms, it created a limited public forum. If it then denied religious groups use of the classrooms, even if for specifically religious prayer, this was deemed to be unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination (Widmar v. Vincent [1981]). Justice Byron White protested against allowing prayer and religious instruction full First Amendment protection, but he was alone. The Court subsequently extended the “public forum” logic of Widmar to require a public school district to provide a religious group with the same facilities for showing films on family values from a religious perspective, as it offered to groups that discussed these issues from a non-religious point of view (Lamb’s Chapel v. Central Moriches Union Free School District [1993]).

Rosenberger extended these principles into the financial subsidization context. Writing for a majority of five, Justice Anthony Kennedy first stressed that WAP was not classified by UVA as a “religious organization,” but had qualified as an independent student group normally entitled to SAF funds just like other groups. He likened the SAF funding to “a metaphysical” forum in which all viewpoints were entitled to be represented. The university’s refusal to fund WAP because of “Wide Awake’s” religious perspective was thus unconstitutional viewpoint discrimination. He rejected the four dissenters’ view that since the university barred all publications that took a position on a “deity or ultimate reality,” there was no viewpoint discrimination.

The Court of Appeals had also found viewpoint discrimination, but upheld UVA’s contention that the establishment clause prohibited it from paying “Wide Awake’s” printing expenses because that amounted to direct monetary subsidization of religious activities. Justice Kennedy dismissed this claim, without even mentioning the Lemon test. While recognizing “dangers where the government makes direct money payments to sectarian institutions,” he emphasized that the benefit received by the religious group was a service and not cash; the subsidization was thus indirect. Moreover and apparently of central importance to the majority, the service was provided on a neutral basis, which distinguished it from a general tax levied for the support of a church or churches, or a cash payment directly to a church. It thus entailed no endorsement of religion by the university, a position stressed by Justice Sandra Day O'Connor in a concurring opinion.

In a lengthy opinion by Justice David Souter, four justices sharply disagreed. Citing numerous examples from Wide Awake, Justice Souter concluded that the publication openly proselytized for evangelical Christianity and "preached the word"; SAF payment for the printing costs thus provided direct monetary support for a religious activity. This, he asserted, was "categorically forbidden" by a long line of cases and history. The fact that the subsidization was available on a neutral basis to sixteen diverse publications was considered by the dissenters to be irrelevant to the constitutionality of the payment; they also saw no merit to the distinction between direct and indirect monetary support, or between a general tax and a mandatory student payment to the SAF.

Rosenberger left many questions open, particularly the significance of neutral distribution of governmental benefits, the scope of the "metaphysical" open forum, and the continued viability of the Lemon test. These uncertainties have been compounded by the Court's 2004 decision in Locke v. Davey (2004). There, the Court refused to require Washington State to extend a scholarship program to a student majoring in theology that was taught from a perspective that was "devotional in nature or designed to induce religious faith," while allowing other scholarship recipients to use the scholarship for all other purposes. Some have contended that the decision is inconsistent with Rosenberger's stress on neutrality.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

- Layock, Douglas, Comment: Theology Scholarship, The Pledge of Allegiance and Religious Liberty: Avoiding the Extremes but Missing the Liberty, Harvard Law Review 118 (2004): 155.
- Redlich, Norman. "The Religion Clauses: A Study in Confusion." In Herman Schwartz, ed. The Rehnquist Court. New York: Farrar Strauss and Giroux, 2002.
- The Supreme Court, 1994 Term*, Harvard Law Review 109 (1995): 111:210.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Lamb's Chapel v. Central Moriches Union Free School District*, 508 U.S. 384 (1993)
- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Locke v. Davey* 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
- Widmar v. Vincent*, 454 U.S. 263 (1981)

See also Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Government Funding of Speech; Lemon Test; Religion in Public Universities; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

ROSS v. MOFFITT, 417 U.S. 600 (1974)

In Ross v. Moffitt, the Supreme Court addressed a question expressly held open in the Court's earlier decisions: whether the constitutional right to counsel as recognized in Douglas v. California (1963) should be extended to require appointment of counsel beyond a first level of appeal after a criminal conviction. The Court held that the right should not be extended to that level of appeal. The Court held that there is no right to the appointment of counsel at subsequent appellate steps, that is, in seeking to convince a higher state appellate court to hear a criminal case (a discretionary state appeal) or for application for that same kind of review in the U.S. Supreme Court (by a petition for certiorari). The Supreme Court thus reversed the decision of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit, which had held that appointment of counsel was required by the due process and equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment.

In Ross, the defendant had pleaded not guilty in two cases and was represented by a court-appointed lawyer. He was convicted and took separate appeals to the state court of appeals, where he was again represented by a court appointed lawyer. His convictions were affirmed. On one of the appeals, he sought further review in the North Carolina Supreme Court and asked the court to appoint counsel to help him do so. The court refused to appoint counsel at state expense. The defendant then tried to appeal this ruling, first to the higher state courts and then to the federal courts. When he asked the court to appoint a lawyer to prepare a petition for a writ of certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court and for postconviction remedies in the state courts on this issue, the court again refused. The North Carolina court of appeals reversed, holding that Ross was entitled to a lawyer at state expense both on his petition for review in the North Carolina Supreme Court and on his petition for certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court.

In an opinion by Justice Rehnquist, the majority disagreed and reversed this holding. It refused to extend its holding in Douglas. That is, the Court held that the appointment of counsel was only required on an appeal that is granted as of right, without needing permission of the appellate court. The Court also distinguished the situation of a defendant at the trial stage and at the appellate stage of a proceeding. It explained that counsel is required as a matter of due process when it is the attorney for the state who prosecutes the case but that, on appeal, it is the defendant who starts the process of seeking review. The Court also recalled that appeals are not even required by due process of law. On appeal, then, unfairness results only if poor people are treated differently from rich people in a way that denies them an adequate opportunity to present their claims.

Moreover, according to the Court, there is no real need for counsel on discretionary appeals so that the absence of counsel is not constitutionally unfair. As the Court explained, on discretionary appeals—requests for review by the states' highest courts and by the U.S. Supreme Court by way of certiorari—a poor person already has had the help of a lawyer in preparing briefs on the first level of appeal. The discretionary review will be based on those briefs. In addition, the poor person will already have had a transcript of the record in the trial court reproduced at state expense, because this is required under the Supreme Court's decision in Griffin v. Illinois (1956). There may also be a decision written by the first appellate court that the higher courts can use to review the issues. Taken together, these materials are adequate to ensure that the request for review by the higher courts is meaningful. The sufficiency of these materials for review was particularly true in North Carolina, in fact, because the critical issue before the North Carolina Supreme Court when a defendant is seeking permission to appeal there is whether the appeal has "significant public interest or major significance to the jurisprudence of the state." Similarly, in the U.S. Supreme Court, a grant of certiorari depends on many factors other than the correctness of the judgment below. And, moreover, the right to appeal is conferred by federal statute, not by the state, so that it would appear that the obligation to provide counsel is a federal one. Yet the Supreme Court regularly decides petitions without the appointment of counsel.

Justice Douglas, joined by Justice Brennan and Marshall, dissented. He relied on and agreed with the opinion of Chief Judge Haynsworth, for the unanimous panel in the Court of Appeals, who held that the most meaningful review of a criminal conviction occurs at the North Carolina Supreme Court stage so that counsel is essential. To the dissenters, the review of a conviction by a state's highest court is extremely important and fairness therefore requires the assistance of counsel at that stage. For other reasons, the dissenters believed that assistance of counsel was required on petition for certiorari to the U.S. Supreme Court. At that stage, the existing briefs and records do not address the issue that the Supreme Court has to decide: whether the case is worthy of its review, not because of any error, but because of the national importance of the issue or the need for Supreme Court resolution of the issue for the nation. That is a more sophisticated set of arguments that may not have been covered in the other previously filed documents. Counsel is also necessary at that stage because preparing a petition for certiorari has many technical requirements that a pro se defendant may be unable to negotiate. Finally, it would be a relatively easy matter for counsel appointed on an earlier appeal to remain as counsel in the later stages of appeal. Accordingly, Justice Douglas would have held that due process fairness and equal protection equality would require counsel in discretionary appeals.

LISSA GRIFFIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963)

Griffin v. Illinois 351 U.S. 12 (1956)

See also Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455 (1942); Douglas v. California, 372 U.S. 353 (1963); Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963); Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956); Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45 (1932); Right to Counsel

ROTARY INTERNATIONAL v. ROTARY CLUB OF DUARTE, 481 U.S. 537 (1987)

This case illustrates how the Supreme Court weighs the First Amendment right to private association and expressive association against government antidiscrimination laws that are asserted to interfere with those rights. The approach is to give strong weight to the interests forwarded by the government regulation, then to determine if enforcing the regulation will infringe significantly the expressive association rights of the challenging group. If it will, the regulation violates the First Amendment. If not, the regulation stands.

In this case, Rotary International (RI), a worldwide organization of service clubs, terminated the membership of its Duarte, California club because that club, contrary to RI policy of that time, had admitted women members. The club sued RI, claiming the termination violated California's Civil Rights Act.

The Court first determined that this was not a matter involving private association rights. As to expressive association, it found that admitting women would not infringe significantly the associational rights of club members. It would not change club goals of humanitarian service, goodwill, and ethical professional behavior. Moreover, women were allowed to attend meetings, give speeches, and otherwise participate in club activities, although not as full members. Therefore, any infringement of associational rights would be very minor and easily outweighed by the state's compelling interest in eliminating discrimination against women. The Court also noted that Rotary Club meetings were public events, often attended by significant numbers of nonmembers and covered by the media. The activities of the club were more public than private.

The decision in this case is similar to that rendered by the Court earlier in Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees (1984), and cited in Duarte. However, applying the rule of those cases will not always result in victory for a public accommodations statute. Notably, in Boy Scouts of America v. Dale (2000), the Court, by five to four, held that applying New Jersey's equal accommodations law to the Boy Scouts, and thereby compelling them to admit open homosexuals, was an unconstitutional infringement of the First Amendment right to expressive association. A rule intended to eliminate discrimination against a particular group, would place a "serious burden" on the right of expressive association, the First Amendment outweighs the public accommodation law. The dissenting judges did not disagree with that; they believed that the Boy Scouts had not provided sufficient evidence to show that the organization's principles would be significantly infringed by requiring open homosexuals to be admitted to membership.

Thus, the right to expressive association trumps equal accommodations laws—but only when enforcing those laws significantly infringes the basic principles of the association in question.

GERALD J. THAIN

Cases and Statutes Cited

Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000)

Roberts v. U.S. Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)

See also Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Freedom of Association; Roberts v. United States Jaycees, 468 U.S. 609 (1984)

ROTH v. UNITED STATES, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

In 1953, when Justice William Brennan sat on the New Jersey Supreme Court, he wrote in Adams Theatre Co. v. Keenan (1953), "The standard 'lewd and 'indecent' is amorphous" and warned that "[t]here is ever present ... the danger that censorship upon that ground is merely the expression of the censor's own highly subjective view of morality ... or may be a screen for reasons unrelated to moral standards." In this decision, the Court, reasoning that a burlesque show was a form of speech, ruled the City of Newark violated the First Amendment when it refused a license to a theater because city officials thought it would present indecent burlesque shows.

In 1942, fifteen years before Justice William Brennan joined the U.S. Supreme Court, the Court, ruling in Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire (1942), stated,

There are certain well defined and narrowly limited classes of speech, the prevention and punishment of which have never been thought to raise any Constitutional problem. These include the lewd and obscene... (Emphases added)

With these two words, the Court set in motion a train of complex cases centered around "lewd" and "obscene," for how these words were defined would determine how "narrowly limited" classes of sexually explicit speech would be and their protection, if any, under the First Amendment. Roth v. United States was Brennan's opportunity to define the terms and to clarify when the "lewd" and the "obscene" might be protected by the First Amendment.

Just months before Roth was announced, however, Justice Felix Frankfurter in Butler v. Michigan (1957) tolled the death knell for the Hicklin rule (Regina v. Hicklin [1868]). Under Michigan's law, selling a book to the general public containing material "tending to the corruption of the moral of youth" was a misdemeanor. Frankfurter struck down the law for being overly broad; it would "burn the house to roast the pig." The legislation was not reasonably restricted "to the evil with which it is said to deal." The effect of the law if left to stand, Frankfurter concluded, would "reduce the adult population of Michigan to reading only what is fit for children." As the purpose of the Hicklin test was to stop "those whose minds are open to ... immoral influences" from reading allegedly obscene material, Frankfurter's ruling for a unanimous Court in effect repealed the Hicklin test.

Roth v. United States was argued and decided at the same time as Albert v. California (1957) and Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown (1957); the Court's decisions, in accordance with Chaplinsky, restated that pornography was not protected by the First Amendment. This meant, however, that the criterion for identifying obscenity became a critical issue. In Roth, the vote was six to three with Brennan delivering the majority opinion, joined by Burton, Clark, Frankfurter, and Whittaker. Chief Justice Warren voted with the majority but wrote a separate concurring opinion. Black and Douglas dissented with Douglas writing a dissent. Harlan, who also dissented, wrote separately. Brennan's "opinion coalition" in Roth was a minimum winning coalition of five justices, and Roth was the last time he mustered majorities for his views as the Court grew increasingly fractured and fractious in subsequent obscenity cases.

According to Brennan, Roth squarely presented the Supreme Court for the first time with the “dispositive question” of whether obscenity was “utterance within the area of protected speech and press.” The answer based on earlier court cases, past and current laws, as well as legal tradition, was clearly “no,” for despite its “unconditional phrasing,” Brennan declared, the First Amendment “was not intended to protect every utterance.” Nevertheless, because the First Amendment was designed to foster an “unfettered interchange of ideas for the bringing about of political and social changes desired by the people,” all ideas with “even the slightest redeeming social importance” fell within “the full protection of the guaranties.” Obscene speech or indecent publications “utterly without redeeming social importance” were beyond the pale, however. The issue therefore was finding a line between “obscene” and “nonobscene” utterances that minimized the restrictive impact of suppressing obscenity on the free and full exchange of ideas.

The first step line was to recognize that “sex and obscenity are not synonymous.” The portrayal of sex per se was not sufficient to warrant suppression; rather sexual activities or images had to be depicted “in a manner appealing to prurient interest” in order to cross the line into obscenity. The next step was to accept the view of Augustus and Learned Hand in United States v. One Book Entitled “Ulysses” (1934) that rejected the Hicklin standard’s emphasis on the effects of isolated obscene passages within larger works on susceptible persons. Brennan’s test in Roth thus states that material is obscene according to whether from the perspective of an average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material, taken as a whole, appeals to prurient interest.

Chief Justice Warren’s concurring opinion demurred with respect to the focus of the majority’s decision. Warren felt that the focus on a book or a picture was misplaced; the rightful focus should be on the conduct of the defendant. This shift, Warren wrote, was consistent with the laws at issue in both cases which prohibited individuals from “purveying textual graphic matter openly advertised to appeal to the erotic interest of their customers.” Warren concluded that the state and federal governments could constitutionally prohibit “the commercial exploitation of the morbid and shameful craving for materials with prurient effect.” As it was clear from the record that Roth actively participated in this commerce, Warren felt there was no need for the Court to have gone beyond this aspect of the cases.

One reason for Harlan’s dissent was his critical view of the majority’s definition of obscenity as something “utterly without redeeming social importance.” He felt the standard was too broad and only superficially specific. He complained that the “Court seems to assume that ‘obscenity’ is a peculiar genus of ‘speech and press,’ which is as distinct, recognizable, and classifiable as poison ivy is among other plants.” The judgment as to whether something was obscene, moreover, could not be reduced to a general formula. The constitutional suppression of some “tangible form of expression,” Harlan countered, is an “individual matter” demanding “particularized judgments.” He went to say, “In short, I do not understand how the Court can resolve the constitutional problems now before it without making its own independent judgment upon the character of the material upon which these convictions were based.”

For Douglas, the new test inflicted criminal punishments for “thoughts provoked, not for overt acts nor [for] antisocial conduct.” He objected that defining obscene material as that “which deals with sex in a manner appealing to prurient interest” failed to make a nexus with actions a legislature can regulate or prohibit. To compound the problem, the test also turned on whether material offended community standards, Douglas argued, juries could “censor, suppress, and punish what they don’t like, provided the matter relates to ‘sexual impurity’ or has a tendency ‘to excite lustful thoughts.’ This is community censorship in one of its worst forms. It creates a regime where, in the battle between the literati and the Philistines, the Philistines are certain to win.”

Roth opened the floodgates to further litigation that with each round raised new questions about the various elements of the test propounded by Brennan. Beginning with Roth, the Supreme Court over the next ten years decided thirteen cases that produced fifty-five separate opinions as the justices struggled to clarify what Roth meant. As the test became more complex, the Court also increasingly struck down convictions in state courts, adding to the controversy surrounding the issue Brennan thought he had laid to rest.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Herbeck, Dale. Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire. In Free Speech on Trial, edited by Richard A. Parker, 85–99. Tuscaloosa: University of Alabama Press, 2003.

- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.
- Rembar, Charles. The End of Obscenity: The Trials of Lady Chatterley, Tropic of Cancer, and Fanny Hill. New York: Random House, 1968.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adams Theatre Co. v. Keenan*, 96 A.2d 519, 521 (N.J. 1953)
- Albert v. California*, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)
- Butler v. Michigan*, 352 U.S. 380 (1957)
- Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire*, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
- Kingsley Books, Inc. v. Brown*, 354 U.S. 436 (1957)
- Regina v. Hicklin*, L.R. 2 Q.B. 360 (1868)
- United States v. One Book Entitled "Ulysses,"* 72 F.2d 705 (2d Cir. 1934)

ROVIARO v. UNITED STATES, 353 U.S. 53 (1957)

The Supreme Court recognized in Roviaro held that the government must sometimes disclose the identity of its confidential informants in order to ensure a fair trial for the defendant. Roviaro thus placed an important limitation on the long-recognized "informer's privilege."

Roviaro was charged with illegally transporting narcotics after he allegedly sold a packet of heroin to "John Doe," an undercover informant. At trial, the government presented the testimony of several police officers who had observed the alleged sale but refused to disclose the identity of John Doe on the ground that Doe was still acting as an undercover informant in other cases.

After being convicted, Roviaro appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which reversed his conviction by a vote of six to one. The Court observed that it had long recognized that the informer's privilege furthers effective law enforcement by encouraging citizens to report crimes without fear of being identified. However, the Court concluded, the privilege must yield to a criminal defendant's right to a fair trial when the informer does not merely observe a crime but, as John Doe did, actively participates in it. Since that active participation made Doe a material witness to the alleged crime, Roviaro was entitled to learn Doe's identity so that he could decide whether he wished to call Doe as a defense witness. Although the decision in Roviaro was formally based on the Court's supervisory power, most lower courts and commentators have regarded the decision as compelled by the due process clause.

DAVID A. MORAN

References and Further Reading

- Westen, Peter, The Compulsory Process Clause, Michigan Law Review 73 (1974): 71.

See also Defense, Right to Present; Due Process

ROWAN v. UNITED STATES POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, NO. 399, 397 U.S. 728 (1970)

In 1967, Congress passed legislation commonly referred to as the "Anti-Pandering Act" or the "Pandering Advertisement Act." This act allowed persons who felt advertisements mailed to them were "erotically arousing or sexually provocative" to instruct the Post Office to order the senders to remove their names and addresses from their lists and to cease any future mailings.

The appeal was brought by fourteen petitioners besides Rowan, who operated the American Book Service, and included publishers, mail order houses, mailing list brokers and other businesses or organizations involved in mass mail marketing challenged the constitutionality of the act. A three-judge federal district court had decided the law was constitutional. The Supreme Court's unanimous decision, affirming the lower court, was written by Chief Justice Warren Burger who had been nominated by President Nixon and confirmed by the Senate for the Supreme Court in 1969 to replace the retired Earl Warren. This was Burger's first majority opinion in an obscenity case.

The act permitted parents to remove the names of their children under nineteen from these lists. This was important to Burger. In his first draft of the opinion (which Burger assigned to himself, a prerogative of being chief justice), he included a strong statement on parents' rights to censor their children's mail, going so far as to describe this right as "absolute." He told Brennan that parents should closely supervise their children and, if they had, perhaps the disorder and excesses of that time might not have occurred. In a note to Burger, Harlan stated that he was "gun-shy" of absolutes, found them "distasteful," and objected to Burger's statement, which Burger deleted from the final opinion.

In the course of Burger's opinion, he points out "the right of every person 'to be left alone'" must be weighed against the right of others to communicate. He stresses that in a complex society where citizens are often "inescapably captive audiences for many purposes" there is a need to preserve "a sufficient measure of individual autonomy" to permit "every householder to exercise control over unwanted mail." The Court, he claims, has traditionally respected the right of householders to bar solicitors from their property. "Nothing in the Constitution compels us to listen to or view any unwanted communication, whatever its merit," he argues; the federal law was thus constitutional.

Brennan's concurrence, joined by Douglas, demurs from Burger's broad interpretation of the law and cautions against the possibility that the law might be used by parents to prevent their children, even those eighteen and older, from receiving political, religious, or other materials the parents find offensive. The statute, he writes, is not without constitutional difficulties for this reason, although it was not challenged on this ground nor did the record showed evidence of the statute being used in this way.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-Clio, 2002.
- Schwartz, Bernard. The Ascent of Pragmatism: The Burger Court in Action. New York: Addison-Wesley, 1990.

RUBY RIDGE INCIDENT

In 1992 a federal force of U.S. Marshals, Federal Bureau of Investigation, and Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms (BATF) agents conducted an assault on the Idaho homestead of Randy and Vicki Weaver, resulting in the deaths of Vicki and their son, Sammy. This incident has raised serious questions about the abusive use of force by federal agencies against U.S. citizens, and aroused a dissident activist movement to resist such abuses.

The incident began when Randy Weaver was asked to act as an informant for the government on the activities of local militant groups in northern Idaho, and he refused. Weaver was then approached by an informant of the BATF to sell him sawed-off shotguns. Weaver apparently relented after refusing several times. He sold two shotguns to the informant in October 1989. According to the FBI, the shotguns were 0.25 short of the barrel length, below which a transfer tax becomes due on the sale, and the nonpayment of which makes the weapon "illegal," even though the well-known policy of the BATF is to refuse to accept payment of the tax. Weaver contended that they were not that short at the time he handed them to the informant, raising the question of whether the FBI fabricated the evidence, a question that has been raised in many other cases.

Weaver was given notice to appear in court on the weapons charges, but with an incorrect date. Rather than correcting the error, the federal officials declared him a fugitive. A federal judge ruled after the siege at Ruby Ridge that the weapons charges amounted to entrapment by the FBI. The incorrect court date appeared to be a deliberate attempt by federal authorities to initiate a confrontation.

On August 21, 1992, deputy marshals engaged in surveillance after entering the Weaver property, without a warrant, in military dress, and armed with night vision devices and fully automatic weapons. While Randy Weaver, his fourteen-year-old son, Sammy, and a family friend, Kevin Harris, were walking the property with the family dog, the dog caught wind of the intruders, and began barking. Following standard practice, the dog was shot by one of the marshals, apparently Art Roderick, from cover, without the agents first showing or identifying themselves.

Enraged by the death of his dog by an unknown and unseen assailant, Weaver's son Sammy fired back with his deer rifle. Randy Weaver fired his shotgun into the air and screamed for Sammy to return to the cabin. As Sammy turned to run, he was shot in the back, apparently by U.S. Marshall William Degan, and died at the scene. It was then that Harris returned fire. It was alleged this shot killed Degan, but some have contended Degan was killed by a stray round from one of his colleagues.

The FBI were called to the scene the next day, August 22, and an FBI sharpshooter, Lon Horiuchi, shot Weaver's wife Vicki as she stood with an infant in her arms in the doorway of her cabin. Horiuchi had contended, up until the time a Senate hearing began, that he had been aiming at an armed man, later said to be Harris, who was threatening a helicopter, but invoked the Fifth Amendment against self-incrimination when he took the stand. The judge in the criminal trial of Weaver and Harris found this testimony so blatantly false that he ordered the charges related to the testimony to be dismissed. (The helicopter was nowhere near where Weaver or Harris could have shot at it.)

The rules of engagement were also changed the night before by FBI commanders. The new rules instructed FBI sharpshooters in part that they "could and should" use deadly force against any armed male spotted in the open. The standard rules of engagement for the FBI are such that they can only use deadly force in situations to protect themselves or the lives of innocent people. Originally, the FBI concluded that its own sharpshooter had followed the standard procedures and not the modified rules of engagement handed down at Ruby Ridge. However, Horiuchi violated even the modified rules by firing on an unarmed female standing behind an open door.

Horiuchi would later be charged with voluntary manslaughter by the county district attorney, but prosecution was blocked when a federal judge seized jurisdiction, under the alleged authority of the supremacy clause of the U.S. Constitution, and then dismissed the case, following the standard practice when local prosecutors seek to prosecute federal agents for a crime committed while the agent is “on duty,” on the theory that they are protected by “official immunity” for all of their actions while on duty, even if they act outside their lawful authority.

The government tried Randy Weaver and Harris on conspiracy and murder charges. They were acquitted on all counts, after their defense attorney, Gerry Spence, rested his case without presenting any evidence. Weaver was convicted of failing to appear for trial on an earlier weapons charge and did serve a short prison term. Testimony at the Weaver trial about the days that followed the shooting of Vicki and Sammy disclosed that the FBI would taunt Weaver, knowing that his wife and son were dead, by directing a loudspeaker toward the cabin, saying things such as “Good morning Mrs. Weaver—we’re having pancakes, what are you having for breakfast?”

The U.S. government later settled a civil suit by the Weaver family for $3.1 million.

JON ROLAND

References and Further Reading

Constitution Society. “Ruby Ridge.” Documents and links, n.d. <http://www.constitution.org/ruby/ruby.htm>.
Walter, Jess. Ruby Ridge: The Truth and Tragedy of the Randy Weaver Family. New York: Regan Books, 2002.

RULE OF LAW

The term rule of law is probably one of the most widely cited terms in the field of civil rights throughout the world without a clear consensus as to what it means. Popular slogans with great emotional appeal, such as “a nation of laws not of men,” merely mask the confusion.

At its simplest level, rule of law identifies a regulatory system under which the state asserts control over the social and political life of its citizens through a system of legally enacted laws applicable to, and open to review by, all citizens and monitored by an effective juridical system. Such a system provides stability and predictability. One can safely plan one’s actions according the parameters provided by disclosed law and can rely upon the state to enforce that law. This system substitutes law and legal enforcement for anarchic exercise of force and violence by individual actors. Most countries throughout the world accept this understanding of rule of law.

In the West, particularly in the United States, many assume that the term includes more substantive content. Since the concept emerged as a shield against the arbitrary authority of the despot, by implication it bore within itself concepts protective of individual liberty. According to this understanding, rule of law should include concepts such as equality before the law for all citizens, procedural and substantive due process, and subservience of all (including sovereigns and those wielding governmental authority) to the authority law.

At its most extreme, substantive rule of law would include principles of justice, often drawn from ideas of natural law.

DAVID E. GUINN

References and Further Reading

Tamanaha, Brian A. On the Rule of Law: History, Politics, Theory. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2004.

See also Due Process; Equal Protection of Law (XIV)

RUSH, BENJAMIN (1746–1813)

Benjamin Rush, early America’s most renowned physician, was a distinguished scientist and educator, an ardent patriot and politician, as well as an untiring social reformer and opponent of slavery. Born on January 4, 1746 in Byberry Township near Philadelphia, he was the fourth child of John Rush, a farmer and gunsmith of Quaker descent, and Susanna (Hall) Harvey Rush. After John Rush’s death at an early age, Susanna sent Benjamin to Nottingham Academy, a private school run by the Presbyterian minister James Finley in Cecil County, Maryland. Upon Rush’s graduation in 1759, Finley arranged for his admission to the College of New Jersey (later Princeton University) from which he obtained his bachelor’s degree in 1760. At Nottingham and the College of New Jersey, Rush received a classical education as well as a firm grounding in science and mathematics. He also imbibed strong religious beliefs that reinforced his lifelong commitment to charity and social reform.

Upon his return to Philadelphia in 1761, Rush apprenticed himself for five years to Dr. John Redman, a disciple of the Dutch physician and advocate of bloodletting Hermann Boerhaave. He also attended lectures by Dr. William Shippen, Jr. and Dr. John Morgan at the College of Philadelphia, and he supported the patriot cause during the Stamp Act crisis. In 1766, Rush set sail for Britain to study medicine under Dr. William Cullen at the University of Edinburgh. After receiving his medical degree in September of 1768, Rush held residencies at Middlesex Hospital and St. Thomas's Hospital in London. Encouraged by Benjamin Franklin to visit Paris, Rush toured France. He became committed to Enlightenment principles and developed a firm belief in human progress.

Returning to America in 1769, he joined the faculty of the College of Philadelphia and became the first professor of chemistry in the United States. He also began his medical career as a private practitioner, initially serving the poor but gradually expanding his practice to include members of the Presbyterian Church that he attended and some of Philadelphia's elite. He was appointed attending physician for the Philadelphia Almshouse in 1772 and the Society for Inoculating the Poor in 1774. He held these positions until his death.

In the early 1770s, Rush emerged as a leading social reformer and a prolific writer. In 1772, he published Sermons to Gentlemen upon Temperance, which influenced the nineteenth-century temperance movement including the Women's Christian Temperance Union. In 1773, he initiated his campaign against slavery, publishing his Address to the Inhabitants of the British American Settlements, upon Slave-Keeping and, following a storm of criticism, A Vindication, a pamphlet in which he defended his antislavery views. These works contributed to the founding of America's first antislavery society, the Pennsylvania Society for Promoting the Abolition of Slavery and the Relief of Free Negroes Unlawfully Held in Bondage.

The onset of the imperial crisis witnessed Rush's fervent embrace of the patriot cause. After the passage of the Tea Act, he published a series of articles under the pseudonym of Hampden and encouraged Thomas Paine's writing of Common Sense. Following the battles of Lexington and Concord, Rush became one of Pennsylvania's first and strongest proponents of independence. Elected to Philadelphia's Committee of Safety, he was also a member of the Continental Congress, a signer of the Declaration of Independence, and the physician general for the middle department of the Continental Army, a post he resigned after a dispute with the Army's chief physician, Dr. Shippen, Jr. After the Battle of Brandywine, Rush became mired in the infamous Thomas Conway scheme, which sought the removal of George Washington as the leader of the Continental forces. In 1776, Rush married Julia Stockton, the daughter of Richard Stockton of New Jersey. They had thirteen children, four of whom died in infancy.

Although in the 1780s Rush focused on expanding his private practice, he remained active in political and social affairs. As a delegate to the Pennsylvania convention on ratification, he was outspoken in favor of adopting the Constitution. He continued his support of the temperance movement and became secretary, and later president, of the Pennsylvanian Abolition Society. After developing extensive records on the mentally disturbed at the Pennsylvania Hospital where he was appointed staff physician in 1783, he wrote An Enquiry into the Physical Causes upon the Moral Faculty (1786).

Rush's detection of the correlation between disease and uncovered polluted waters precipitated his involvement in municipal improvement projects. He campaigned for the cleanup of Dock Creek, a mosquito-ridden sewer that ran through Philadelphia. A strong believer in a virtuous and informed citizenry, he became one of the first American advocates of state-financed education. He helped to found Dickinson College as well as Franklin (and Marshall) College. He also advanced the idea of a federal university and proposed an expanded curriculum for women's education. Late in the decade, he embarked on a campaign for the reform of the penal system and criminal justice, attacking public punishment and demanding the elimination of the death penalty except for first-degree murder. In 1789, he published his most famous professional work, Medical Inquiries and Observations.

In the 1790s, Rush extended his efforts for social reform to the advancement of the religious and educational welfare of African Americans. He supported the founding of the African Episcopal Church of St. Thomas, the first African-American Episcopal Church in the United States. In 1794, he made a heroic, yet ill-designed, attempt to stem the epidemic of yellow fever in Philadelphia through the application of herbal purges and bloodletting, treatments that unfortunately may have increased the death rate. His efforts led to a bitter court battle with William Cobbett. Rush, a leading Republican in the mid-1790s, sued the arch-Federalist publisher for libel following the latter's vicious attacks on his bloodletting treatments. The public criticism hurt Rush's practice and distanced him from the College of Physicians of Philadelphia from which he eventually resigned. Although Rush won a settlement of $8,000 in court, he received only half of the amount before Cobbett fled to England to avoid financial ruin.

In his final years, Rush pursued his interest in mental illness and published a comprehensive work entitled Medical Enquiries and Observations upon the Diseases of the Mind (1812), which served as the first American text on psychiatry. Rush is still recognized as “the father of American psychiatry.” He continued private practice, acted as president of the Pennsylvania Abolition Society, promoted veterinary medicine, and assumed the position of treasurer of the United States Mint. Committed to disinterested public service, Rush expressed disillusionment with the rising importance of “interests” during the new nation’s remarkable economic expansion in the early nineteenth century. Rush died in Philadelphia on April 19, 1813, and was buried in Christ Church Burial Ground. In the late nineteenth century, temperance reformers marked his grave with a memorial plaque acknowledging him as the “instaurator of American Temperance Reform.”

GORDON S. BARKER

References and Further Reading

- Binger, Carl Alfred Lanning. Revolutionary Doctor: Benjamin Rush, 1746–1813. New York: W.W. Norton and Company, 1966.
- D’Elia, Donald J. Benjamin Rush, Philosopher of the American Revolution. Philadelphia: American Philosophical Society, 1974.
- Fox, Claire G., Gordon L. Miller, and Jacquelyn C. Miller, comps. Benjamin Rush, M.D.: A Bibliographic Guide. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1996.
- Risjord, Norman K. Representative Americans: The Revolutionary Generation. Madison, WI: Madison House Publishers, 2001.

RUST v. SULLIVAN, 500 U.S. 173 (1991)

Title X of the Public Health Service Act authorizes the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to fund a range of family planning services but prohibits the use of Title X funds in programs where abortion is a method of family planning. In 1988, HHS promulgated new regulations prohibiting projects receiving Title X funding from referring pregnant women to abortion providers, even upon specific request. The regulations also prohibit these entities from engaging in activities advocating for the availability of abortion through lobbying, distributing materials, or participating in litigation.

In Rust v. Sullivan, a majority of the U.S. Supreme Court rejected claims that these regulations violated the First Amendment free speech rights of Title X fund recipients, their staffs, and their patients by conditioning the receipt of government funds on the expression of specific viewpoints. The Court also held that the regulations did not interfere with the Fifth Amendment substantive due process rights of Title X clients to choose to terminate a pregnancy.

In raising these First and Fifth Amendment claims, the challengers sought to invoke the principle that the government may not condition a benefit on the requirement that the recipient relinquish a constitutional right, nor penalize a person for exercising a constitutional right (Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington [1983]). This unconstitutional conditions doctrine has not been consistently applied by the Supreme Court. The Court has sought to draw a line between content-based regulation of speech, which the Court has held unconstitutional (Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez [2001]), and cases in which the government has refused to subsidize the exercise of a constitutional right to engage in a constitutionally protected activity, such as speech or obtaining an abortion (Harris v. McRae [1980]). Writing for the Rust majority, Chief Justice Rehnquist stated that through the Title X regulatory prohibitions on referrals for abortion, the government was not discriminating on the basis of viewpoint, but choosing to fund one activity and not others. The Court has subsequently described Rust as involving the government using private speakers to transmit specific information pertaining to a government program. Under such circumstances, the government may say what it wants (Rosenberger v. Rector of the University of Virginia [1995]). In upholding these restraints on speech, Rust is inconsistent with traditional notions of free exchange of information between patients and health care professionals and contributes to the confused state of the unconstitutional conditions doctrine.

If one views the funding conditions at issue in Rust as the government funding some services and not others, the Court’s decision seems consistent with the cases in which the Supreme Court consistently has concluded that federal or state governments may constitutionally implement a value judgment of discouraging abortion by funding childbirth-related health care services while declining to fund abortion services. In these cases, the Supreme Court has stated that a government decision not to subsidize the exercise of a fundamental right does not infringe the right (Harris v. McRae [1980], Maier v. Roe [1977]).

RENÉE M. LANDERS

References and Further Reading

- Chemerinsky, Erwin. Constitutional Law: Principles and Policies. 2nd ed. New York: Aspen, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980)
Legal Services Corporation v. Velazquez, 531 U.S. 533 (2001)
Maher v. Roe, 432 U.S. 464 (1977)
Regan v. Taxation with Representation of Washington, 461 U.S. 540 (1983)
Rosenberger v. Rector of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995)
42 U.S.C., Sections 300 to 300a-6
42 C.F.R., Sections 59.8 to 59.10 (1989)

See also Abortion; Birth Control; Chemerinsky, Erwin; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Government Funding of Speech; Government Speech; Harris v. McRae, 448 U.S. 297 (1980); Privacy; Rosenberger v. Rector and Visitors of the University of Virginia, 515 U.S. 819 (1995); Unconstitutional Conditions

RUTAN v. REPUBLICAN PARTY OF ILLINOIS, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

Although Rutan was not the first case about political patronage to reach the Supreme Court, it was the most farreaching. In 1976, the Court had decided in Elrod v. Burns (1976) that it was unconstitutional to fire a public employee based upon political affiliation. Elrod arose out of the Democratic political machine in Chicago; ironically, Rutan was a suit alleging political hiring, promotions, and transfers by the Republican governor of Illinois.

The Court of Appeals found that the challenged practices in Rutan did not burden the First Amendment rights of a job seeker as severely as did the firing in Elrod and thus were not unconstitutional. The Supreme Court split five to four in overturning this decision. These practices placed an impermissible burden on free speech and association, it held, and were not necessary to further a vital governmental interest, as required to pass scrutiny under the very high level of review given to state actions interfering with First Amendment rights.

The majority opinion evoked a vehement dissent by Justice Scalia, on the grounds that patronage was as old as the United States and had played an important role in democratizing politics and maintaining the party system. The lower courts did not appear to like the majority holding in Rutan either, and many refused to extend its logic to the awarding of government contracts in return for political support and financial contributions. The Supreme Court held that practice to be unconstitutional as well in O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake (1996).

CYNTHIA GRANT BOWMAN

RUTLEDGE, WILEY BLOUNT, JR. (1894–1949)

References and Further Reading

Bowman, Cynthia Grant, The Law of Patronage at a Crossroads, Journal of Law and Politics 12 (1996): 2:341–63.
Freedman, Anne. Patronage: An American Tradition. Chicago: Nelson-Hall Publishers, 1994.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976)
O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake, 518 U.S. 712 (1996)

See also Elrod v. Burns, 427 U.S. 347 (1976); Political Patronage and First Amendment

RUTLEDGE, WILEY BLOUNT, JR. (1894–1949)

Born in Cloverport, Kentucky, the son of a Baptist preacher, Wiley Blount Rutledge, Jr. was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1943 by Franklin D. Roosevelt and became—most notably as a dissenter—one of the most far-reaching proponents of civil liberties and civil rights in the Court's history. Rutledge grew up in Tennessee, attending Maryville College; graduated from the University of Wisconsin in 1914; and began law school at Indiana University. He contracted tuberculosis, however, and, after treatment in North Carolina, married his Maryville Greek teacher, Annabel Person, and chased the cure by heading west to Albuquerque, New Mexico, to teach high school. In 1920, the young couple moved to Boulder, Colorado, where Rutledge completed law school, practiced law for two years, and joined the University of Colorado law faculty. (Years later, Roosevelt would exclaim, "Wiley, you have a lot of geography!")

Legal Educator

In 1926, Rutledge became a professor of law at Washington University in St. Louis and served as dean from 1931 to 1935. Well liked and respected by students and faculty, he taught business organizations and legal ethics, raised admission standards, reformed the curriculum, and promoted interdisciplinary studies, especially law and social work. Rutledge also was active in the community. He served on the Social Justice Commission of St. Louis and campaigned for reform of Missouri's criminal justice system, seeking to update the criminal code, make women eligible for jury duty, and establish a voluntary defender plan. His most dogged efforts, however, were on behalf of the Child Labor Amendment submitted to the states by Congress years earlier (and never adopted), authorizing Congress to set minimum ages and maximum hours for children in the workplace—a reform the Supreme Court had twice struck down as unconstitutional.

In 1935, Rutledge became dean of the College of Law at the University of Iowa, where again he reformed the curriculum and was highly regarded. He pressed the Association of American Law Schools to support legal aid for the poor, and, as an enthusiastic New Dealer, he supported Roosevelt's Court-packing plan in 1937. Earlier, while in St. Louis, he had caught the attention of Irving Brant, editorial page editor of the St. Louis Star-Times, who was particularly impressed by Rutledge's support of the Child Labor Amendment and by a speech Dean Rutledge gave in 1936 attacking the Supreme Court's decision eviscerating the Agricultural Adjustment Act. A friend and supporter of Roosevelt, Brant urged the president to consider Rutledge for the Supreme Court in 1938 if the favorite, Felix Frankfurter, were found unsuitable. Frankfurter was selected, so Brant pushed Rutledge for the next vacancy in 1939, filled by William O. Douglas. As runner-up, however, Rutledge was named to the U.S. Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia (later the District of Columbia "Circuit"). There, he established himself as a strong supporter of First Amendment rights and, upon the resignation of Justice James F. Byrnes, was appointed to the Supreme Court in 1943.

Supreme Court Justice: First Amendment Cases

Within a month of his investiture, Rutledge helped form a five-to-four majority in the Jones v. Opelika (1943) and Murdock v. Pennsylvania (1943) cases that struck down under the First Amendment's "free exercise" clause the requirement that Jehovah's Witnesses pay municipal taxes and licences when selling religious literature. He then joined the majority in West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette (1943), invalidating a West Virginia requirement that schoolchildren, objecting on religious grounds, salute the American flag. However, in writing for the majority in Prince v. Massachusetts (1944), another Jehovah's Witness case, Rutledge upheld a Massachusetts statute imposing criminal fines on adults who allowed children to distribute religious literature on the street—a statute Rutledge perceived as a child labor, not a "free exercise" regulation. Rutledge also stood firmly for separation of church and state under the First Amendment's establishment clause, dissenting in Everson v. Board of Education (1948) when the Court sustained five to four a New Jersey ordinance authorizing reimbursement of transportation expenses for children attending Catholic as well as public schools.

In other First Amendment decisions, Rutledge joined those who held that freedom of speech had a "preferred position" among the rights entitled to constitutional protection. Using perhaps the strongest language of his time to that effect, he wrote for the majority in Thomas v. Collins (1945), reversing five to four the criminal contempt conviction of a labor organizer who had disobeyed a court order forbidding him to address a mass gathering without obtaining a state-required organizer's card.

Wartime Decisions

In the 1940s, the Supreme Court overturned several lower court decisions that had revoked the naturalized American citizenship of alleged communists or Nazis. The Court concluded that the government had not met its burden of proving that citizenship had been illegally procured. Taking an absolutist position, however, Rutledge argued in Schneiderman v. United States (1943), Knauer v. United States (1946), and Klapprott v. United States (1949) that naturalized citizenship, once granted, could never be revoked for actions prior to naturalization, but only for actions "taking place afterward" (as also could happen to native-born Americans). He rejected "two classes of citizens, one superior, the other inferior" as if in "suspended animation" vulnerable to erasure.

In the more infamous cases arising out of World War II, Rutledge's record is mixed. He joined not only the unanimous Court in Hirabayashi v. United States (1943), upholding the West coast curfew imposed on persons of Japanese ancestry, but also the six-to-three majority in Korematsu v. United States (1944), sustaining the Japanese-American evacuation program, a vote he never really explained. On the other hand, in perhaps his most heralded opinion—citing the Articles of War, the Geneva Convention, and Fifth Amendment due process—Rutledge dissented from the Court's deference to the military commission conviction of Lieutenant General Tomoyuki Yamashita (In re Yamashita [1946]), the Japanese commander in the Philippines, who was sentenced to death for failure to prevent atrocities in Manila at the end of the war.

Rutledge also is known for three other wartime dissents. He voted to reverse the convictions of John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers (United States

v. United Mineworkers [1947]) for contempt of court in refusing to honor a federal court order enjoining a national coal strike. In Yakus v. United States (1944), he voted to declare unconstitutional a criminal price control statute that barred the accused from challenging the price ceilings while defending the accusation. Congress accepted Rutledge's analysis and amended the statute. Finally, in Ahrens v. Clark (1948), Rutledge dissented from an opinion by Douglas, who rejected petitions for writs of habeas corpus by German nationals awaiting deportation after hostilities had ceased. Douglas reasoned that the statute required the habeas petition to be filed in New York, the district where the prisoners were held, not in the District of Columbia, where the Ahrens petition had been filed. Rutledge stressed, to the contrary, that precedent called for filing the petition in a jurisdiction where the jailer could be found, which included the District of Columbia, home of the attorney general. Eventually, Ahrens was overruled. More recently, the Supreme Court's decision in Rasul v. Bush (2004)—holding that U.S. courts have jurisdiction over challenges to the legality of the detention of foreign nationals captured abroad while fighting for the Taliban and incarcerated at the U.S. Navy base at Guantánamo Bay, Cuba—is traceable to Justice Rutledge's dissent in Ahrens.

Criminal Cases

Rutledge sided with criminal defendants 80 percent of the time compared to the Court's 52 percent during his tenure there. Especially when the death penalty was involved, Rutledge would construe an ambiguous statute against the government, or grant the defendant a generous interpretation of due process, or even invoke the Court's inherent supervisory power over the administration of criminal justice to achieve what he deemed the just result. The justice also argued for an expanded right to counsel in criminal cases, in state as well as federal courts, and worked hard to achieve federal court review of state criminal proceedings. He deserves credit, through dissents in Parker v. Illinois (1948) and Marino v. Ragen (1947), for successfully pressing the Court eventually to mandate the reform of Illinois' byzantine criminal appellate system—a system so complex that no defendant could know for sure how to exhaust state court remedies, a requirement for seeking relief in the Supreme Court.

Rutledge also advocated broadening criminal due process in state as well as federal courts. He dissented in Foster v. Illinois (1947), for example, when the Court held, five to four, that Fourteenth Amendment due process did not guarantee an indigent criminal defendant the right to be informed that state law entitled him to a free lawyer upon request. Had Foster been tried in federal court, however, the Sixth Amendment would have guaranteed him the right to counsel, a situation presenting the question whether the entire Bill of Rights, not just some of them as previously held in Palko v. Connecticut (1937), should apply to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment due process and privileges and immunities clauses. In Adamson v. California (1947), the Court reaffirmed Palko, five to four, over the dissent of Justice Hugo Black, who opined that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the Bill of Rights fully, not selectively. Rutledge joined Justice Frank Murphy, who dissented separately, agreeing that the Fourteenth Amendment incorporated the entire Bill of Rights, but explaining that the amendment did not impose a Bill-of-Rights ceiling; due process might well guarantee additional rights in state courts. Rutledge also strongly supported the Fourth Amendment's "exclusionary rule," barring admission of unlawfully seized evidence in federal court. Dissenting in Wolf v. Colorado (1949), he argued that the rule was applicable in state courts as well (a view that eventually prevailed).

Equal Protection of the Laws

In his dissent (discussed above) concluding that the indigent defendant, Foster, had been denied due process, Rutledge added that Foster had been denied equal protection of the laws, one of the earliest pronouncements by a Supreme Court justice premising denial of equal protection on poverty. Later, dissenting in Goesaert v. Cleary (1948), Rutledge wrote the first modern gender discrimination opinion. He found a denial of equal protection when the majority upheld a Michigan statute forbidding any female to tend bar unless she was the "wife or daughter of the male owner." Rutledge also stood against discrimination based on blood line and race. In Kotch v. Board of River Port Pilot Commissioners (1947), he dissented from Black's opinion upholding a Louisiana system permitting a river pilots' association, required by law to guide Mississippi River boats near New Orleans, to choose all new pilots from among family and friends. And in Fisher v. Hurst (1948), he was the lone dissenter when the Court rejected Thurgood Marshall's petition for a writ of mandamus to compel Oklahoma's compliance with the Court's earlier mandate to provide the African-American petitioner a legal education "as soon as it does for applicants of any other group.” Rutledge interpreted the mandate to mean that the law school must be shut down entirely unless the petitioner was admitted, not left open to second- and third-year students as the Oklahoma courts were allowing. Only in voting rights cases did Rutledge balk at an equal protection remedy. In Colegrove v. Green (1946) and MacDougall v. Green (1948), he joined colleagues who concluded that unequal voting districts and discriminatory signature requirements for getting a political party onto the ballot violated equal protection. But in each case, Rutledge perceived that the proposed remedy—at-large election or last-minute access to the ballot—would create inequities of their own barring relief.

Commerce Clause Decisions

When Michigan prosecuted a charter boat company under its civil rights act for refusing to carry African-American schoolchildren upriver from Detroit to an island in Canada, Rutledge wrote for a majority that sustained Michigan’s action against a defense that the commerce clause, standing alone, forbade such regulation of foreign commerce (Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan [1948]). In other contexts, Rutledge had become the Court’s most thoughtful student of the commerce clause, writing expositions in Freeman v. Hewitt (1946) that maximized state taxation of interstate transactions and in Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin (1946) that maximized both federal and state actions affecting interstate commerce. Both rationales have survived.

Creative Constitutional Jurisprudence

When the Court considered a challenge to a federal statute expanding federal “diversity” jurisdiction to include suits not only between citizens of different “states,” as specified in Article III, but also citizens of the District of Columbia and the territories, the Court upheld the statute five to four in National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co. (1949). The majority cobbled together an opinion by Justice Robert Jackson finding authority in the “District clause” (Article I, Section 8, Clause 1) and an opinion by Rutledge, joined by Murphy, finding authority in Article III. Rutledge thus deemed the District of Columbia a “state” for this purpose, as in other instances (such as the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy criminal trial) where constitutional rights applicable to the “states” had been extended to the District of Columbia. Unlike the others, therefore, Rutledge and Murphy saw the availability of federal diversity jurisdiction as an access to justice—a civil rights—issue.

Wiley Rutledge had unswerving faith that law could deliver justice, but only if the Constitution, like the common law, received an evolving, not a static, interpretation and only if, as he once wrote, the Constitution “places the rights to life and to liberty above those of property.” His jurisprudence, ultimately, was derived from his love of people—regardless of station—with considerable depth of feeling. Significantly, on an acrimonious Court, he was the only justice who had both the personal and the intellectual respect of all his colleagues.

JOHN M. FERREN

References and Further Reading

- Ferren, John M. Salt of the Earth, Conscience of the Court: the Story of Justice Wiley Rutledge. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2004.
- Harper, Fowler V. Justice Rutledge and the Bright Constellation. Indianapolis: Bobbs-Merrill, 1965.
- Pollak, Louis H. “Wiley Blount Rutledge: Profile of a Judge.” In Six Justices on Civil Rights, edited by Ronald D. Rotunda, 177. London: Oceana, 1983.
- Rutledge, Wiley. “The Federal Government and Child Labor.” Social Service Review 7 (1933): 555.
- . “Social Changes and the Law.” Proceedings, American Association of Collegiate Schools of Business 88 (1934).
- . Significant Trends in Modern Incorporation Statutes, Washington University Law Quarterly 22 (1937): 305; University of Pittsburgh Law Review 3 (1937): 273.
- . A Declaration of Legal Faith. Lawrence: University of Kansas Press, 1947.
- Stevens, John Paul. “Mr. Justice Rutledge.” In Mr. Justice, edited by Allison Dunham and Philip Kurland, 177. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1958.
- A Symposium to the Memory of Wiley B. Rutledge (1894–1949)*, Indiana Law Journal 25 (1950); Iowa Law Review 35 (1950).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adamson v. California*, 332 U.S. 46 (1947)
- Ahrens v. Clark*, 335 U.S. 188, 193 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting) (overruled by Braden v. 30th Judicial Circuit of Kentucky, 410 U.S. 484 (1973); see generally Rasul v. Bush, 72 U.S.L.W. 4596 (U.S. June 28, 2004) (Nos. 03-334 and 03-043))
- Bob-Lo Excursion Co. v. Michigan*, 333 U.S. 28 (1948)
- Colegrove v. Green*, 328 U.S. 549, 564 (1946) (Rutledge, J., concurring in result)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1, 28 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
- Fisher v. Hurst*, 333 U.S. 147, 149 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)

Foster v. Illinois, 332 U.S. 134, 141 (1947) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
Freeman v. Hewitt, 329 U.S. 249, 259 (1946) (Rutledge, J., concurring) (cited with approval in Complete Auto Transit, Inc. v. Brady, 430 U.S. 274 [1977])
Goesaert v. Cleary, 335 U.S. 464, 467 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
Hirabayashi v. United States, 320 U.S. 81, 114 (1943) (Rutledge, J., concurring)
In re Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1, 41 (1946) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
Jones v. Opelika, 319 U.S. 103 (1943) (per curiam)
Klapprott v. United States, 335 U.S. 601, 616 (1949) (Rutledge, J., concurring in result)
Knauer v. United States, 328 U.S. 654, 675 (1946) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944)
Kotch v. Board of River Port Pilot Commissioners, 330 U.S. 552, 564 (1947) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
MacDougall v. Green, 335 U.S. 281, 284 (1948) (Rutledge, J., concurring in result)
Marino v. Ragen, 332 U.S. 561, 563 (1947) (Rutledge, J., dissenting) (followed in Lofthus v. Illinois, 334 U.S. 804 (1948) (per curiam) and Young v. Ragen, 337 U.S. 235 [1949])
Murdock v. Pennsylvania, 319 U.S. 105 (1943)
National Mutual Insurance Co. v. Tidewater Transfer Co., 337 U.S. 582, 604 (1949) (Rutledge, J., concurring)
Palko v. Connecticut, 302 U.S. 319 (1937)
Parker v. Illinois, 333 U.S. 571, 577 (1948) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944)
Prudential Insurance Co. v. Benjamin, 328 U.S. 408 (1946) (cited with approval in U.S. Dep't of the Treasury v. Fabe, 508 U.S. 491 [1993])
Rasul v. Bush, 72 U.S.L.W. 4596 (U.S. June 28, 2004) (Nos. 03-334 and 03-043)
Schneiderman v. United States, 320 U.S. 118, 165 (1943) (Rutledge, J., concurring)
Thomas v. Collins, 323 U.S. 516 (1945) (cited with approval in Watchtower Bible & Tract Society of New York, Inc. v. Village of Stratton, 536 U.S. 150 [2002])
United States v. United Mineworkers, 330 U.S. 258, 342 (1947) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)
West Virginia Bd. of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 524 (1943)
Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, 47 (1949) (Rutledge, J., dissenting) (overruled by Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 [1961])
Yakus v. United States, 321 U.S. 414, 460 (1944) (Rutledge, J., dissenting)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Bill of Rights: Structure; Capital Punishment; Children and the First Amendment; Citizenship; Common Law or Statute; Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause; Constitution of 1787; Criminal Law/Civil Liberties and Noncitizens in the United States; Denaturalization; Douglas, William Orville; Due Process; Due Process of Law (V and XIV); Equal Protection of Law (XIV); Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Everson v. Board of Education, 330 U.S. 1 (1947); Exclusionary Rule; Flag Salute Cases; Fourteenth Amendment; Frankfurter, Felix; Free Exercise

Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Incorporation Doctrine; Jackson, Robert H.; Japanese Internment Cases; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty; Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts; Marshall, Thurgood; Murphy, Frank; Prince v. Massachusetts, 321 U.S. 158 (1944); Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Right to Counsel; Right to Counsel (VI); Roosevelt, Franklin Delano; State Aid to Religious Schools; State Courts; Voting Rights (Compound); Wall of Separation; West Virginia Board of Education v. Barnette, 319 U.S. 624 (1943); World War II, Civil Liberties in

RYAN, GEORGE (1934–)

George Ryan was inaugurated as the thirty-ninth governor of Illinois on January 11, 1999 following a thirty-year career in public service. During a speech given at Northwestern University on January 11, 2003, a mere two days before leaving office, he commuted the sentences of all of Illinois' death row inmates while citing the "demon of error," the error in both determining guilt and deciding who among the guilty should die, inherent in the capital punishment system as his reason. His commutation affected 156 death row inmates in Illinois and eleven others sentenced to die as well. Ryan himself was the outgoing Republican governor, having not sought reelection in 2002.

Ryan joined the Illinois state legislature in the 1970s and fully supported the death penalty at that time. While running for governor in 1998, however, news of Anthony Porter made headlines in the state. Porter, with an IQ of 51, was spared execution two days before his death was scheduled. With the help of Northwestern University professor David Protess and his students, Porter's innocence was proven, and he was freed after spending nearly two decades in prison. This incident jolted Ryan, and while he wavered on backing a full-scale review of the Illinois justice system, he did support a fund that would ensure inmates such as Porter access to investigative resources. Within a few months, however, two more death-row inmates had been exonerated with conclusive evidence proving their lack of guilt. Calls for a state moratorium on executions rose as state judiciary officials began their own investigation. When the attorney general next called to schedule an execution, Ryan refused. Then, in fall 1999, sources at the Chicago Tribune revealed that since 1977, one-third of all capital punishment convictions had been reversed due to errors. Ryan then called for a moratorium in January 2000.

Capital punishment itself in Illinois had been under the microscope after journalism students at Northwestern University began researching specific death penalty cases in the state in the late 1990s. Ryan had first declared a moratorium on death row executions in Illinois in 2000. He appointed a panel to examine capital punishment in the state and to review the cases of all death row inmates. The panel concluded its findings in 2002, and reported that Illinois had applied capital punishment too often since its reestablishment in the state in 1977.

Ryan's commutations left all but three inmates with sentences of life imprisonment without parole. The three remaining individuals received forty years to life imprisonment. Ryan's actions were seen by some as the most significant statement questioning capital punishment in thirty years. Ryan stated that he was struck by Supreme Court justice Harry Blackmun's 1994 statement: "I no longer shall tinker with the machinery of death." Ryan was nominated for a Nobel Peace Prize in 2003.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

- Banner, Stuart. The Death Penalty: An American History. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Garvey, Stephen, ed. Beyond Repair? America's Death Penalty. Durham, NC: Duke University Press, 2003.
- King, Rachel. Don't Kill in Our Names: Families of Murder Victims Speak Out against the Death Penalty. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 2003.

See also Capital Punishment; Prejean, Sister Helen

S

SACCO AND VANZETTI

Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti were executed in Charlestown, Massachusetts, in 1927, having been tried and convicted for the 1920 robbery and murder of a payroll clerk and his guard. The crime was hardly newsworthy at the time. However, when Sacco and Vanzetti were arrested a few weeks later, the fact that they were Italian immigrants, active in anarchist circles, gave the case national and international political significance. Their 1921 trial was what we would call today a “media event.” There were demonstrations, protests, and even bombings, in the United States and around the world, from the time of the trial, through the long appeals process, until after their execution.

The controversy continues to this day about whether Sacco and Vanzetti were guilty or were unfairly convicted of a crime they did not commit because of prejudice against foreigners who held unpopular political beliefs.

The early years of the twentieth century were years of unrest and violence in the United States. Labor organizers and various radical groups agitated for causes such as workers’ rights, opposition of American involvement in World War I, and even overthrow of both the capitalist system and of the government. Many members of these movements were recent immigrants, a fact that furthered fueled prejudice against foreigners. State and federal Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Acts made some types of political protest illegal. Violators were subject to imprisonment, and foreigners could be deported. Government harassment of these radical groups reached a high point with the Palmer Raids in late 1919 and early 1920, when thousands were arrested and deported.

In the afternoon of April 15, 1920, a payroll clerk and his guard walked on a street in Braintree, Massachusetts, an industrial town near Boston, each carrying a box of payroll envelopes. Two men approached them and shot them. Several accomplices in a waiting getaway car picked up the killers, and they made a clean escape, with a total of nearly $16,000.

Although there were numerous eyewitnesses, their conflicting accounts gave the police little to go on. When the getaway car was discovered several days later, a series of pieces of circumstantial evidence led the police to watch for someone coming to claim a second car from a repair shop near where the getaway car had been found. Sacco and Vanzetti and two other men fell into this trap on the evening of May 5. The police arrested Sacco and Vanzetti. (The other two men had solid alibis for April 15 and were neither arrested nor charged.)

Sacco and Vanzetti did not tell credible stories about why they had gone to get this car or why they were carrying handguns when they were arrested. Although the police interrogation first focused on Sacco’s and Vanzetti’s political beliefs, the prosecutor decided to charge them with the payroll robbery and murders.

At the trial, a very aggressive prosecutor badgered reluctant witnesses to identify Sacco and Vanzetti as the culprits. He belittled alibi witnesses, many of whom testified in Italian, telling the jury that they could assume that Italians would lie to protect their friends. A state ballistics expert testified that one of the bullets removed from the body of the dead guard probably came from Sacco's gun. The defense presented an expert who testified to the contrary and later suggested that this bullet had been switched.

The prosecution said that the fact that Sacco and Vanzetti lied to police about where they were going the night they were arrested showed "consciousness of guilt"—they lied because they had something more serious to hide. Sacco and Vanzetti testified that they had lied because, with a new round of Palmer Raids coming, they feared deportation.

The most dramatic part of the trial was Sacco's testimony about his patriotism and his involvement in the anarchist movement. The prosecutor questioned Sacco at length about why, if he loved this country, he and Vanzetti had gone to Mexico during World War I to avoid the draft. Defense counsel objected that these questions were irrelevant and prejudicial. The trial judge showed his prejudice here by repeating each of the prosecutor's questions, saying he wanted to be sure he understood whether defense counsel was objecting to each of these inflammatory questions.

Although the trial lasted six weeks, the jury took less than three hours to return guilty verdicts. Motions for a new trial on the basis of later discovered evidence and the judge's prejudice were all denied. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court affirmed those decisions. Responding to the public's outcries about the case, the Governor convened a special committee to review the case and advise him whether the trial had been fair. When that committee supported the court decisions and several justices of the U.S. Supreme Court turned down petitions for that court's review, Sacco's and Vanzetti's fates were sealed.

ELI C. BORTMAN

References and Further Reading

Bortman, Eli C. Sacco and Vanzetti. Beverly, MA: Commonwealth Editions, 2005.

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Statutes; Race and Criminal Justice

SAENZ v. ROE, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)

The Supreme Court's decision in Shapiro v. Thompson (1969) ruled that welfare waiting period requirements were unconstitutional. However, residency requirements emerged again in the late 1980s as states experienced budget crises and dissatisfaction with the welfare system. States aiming to prevent the influx of welfare-dependent persons through residency requirements attempted to circumvent the Shapiro ruling by avoiding the specific provisions invalidated by the Court. In Saenz v. Roe, the Court reviewed a California statute under which new residents, for the first year of their residency, would be limited to the maximum amount of benefits received in the state of prior residence. This was challenged by recent residents claiming that their monthly Aid to Families with Dependent Children benefits would be substantially lowered under the statute. Also under review was the Personal Responsibility and Work Opportunity Reconciliation Act (PRWORA) of 1996, which in effect approved the statutory requirement.

The Court's seven-to-two decision held that California's statute violated the right to travel guaranteed under the Fourteenth Amendment and that PRWORA does not resuscitate the constitutionality of the statute. Central to the decision was the privileges and immunities clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, which prohibits differential treatment of citizens on the basis of length of residence—California's legitimate purpose in saving money did not justify discriminating among equally eligible citizens. The Court affirmed the right of all citizens to acquire and enjoy the benefits of citizenship on establishing residence in a state of their choice.

Saenz signaled a departure from the Court's reliance on the equal protection clause in reviewing welfare residency requirements. However, this change in the Court's approach did not affect its view of welfare residency requirements as unconstitutional.

DIANA H. YOON

References and Further Reading

Lashbrook, April D. Back from a Long Vacation: The Privileges and Immunities Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment in Saenz v. Roe. Capital University Law Review 29 (2001): 481–521.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Shapiro v. Thompson, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)

See also Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941); Right to Travel

SALVATION ARMY AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

No Gilded Age group fought more doggedly for open-air speech and assembly rights than did the Salvation Army, a religious and social welfare organization founded in response to the social and religious changes that accompanied urbanization.

As cities grew and neighborhoods split along class lines during the nineteenth century, many established churches abandoned poor neighborhoods and followed wealthy congregant uptown. Church services changed in tone as well as location, becoming increasingly exclusive. Poor and working-class city dwellers often felt alienated and drifted beyond the fold.

The Salvation Army, which began in England in 1865 and subsequently invaded the United States, sought to become “[t]he church of the churchless.” Aided by its evangelical fervor, its attention to the welfare needs of the urban down-and-out, its organizational efficiency, and its irrepressible zeal, the group flourished. By the mid-1890s, the Army’s American branch contained more than 500 local corps.

Military-style parades and energetic outdoor meetings were central to the group’s success. “[W]e do not wait for [the churchless masses] to come to us,” an Army officer explained, “but we go to them.” Although designed to spread religious feelings, these assemblies were so noisy and disruptive that they often provoked “the chief qualities of irreligion—wrath, profanity, and hatred of one’s fellow man.” To unappreciative ears, such Salvationist rites as the “Grand-hallelujah eye-opener” sounded less like devotional acts than like “preaching clap-jack” accompanied by “brayings from brass instruments blown by players who have received their only instruction from ‘the Spirit!’” As the Nation reported in 1897, “the noises of the Army are unpopular everywhere.”

The Salvation Army’s cacophonous ministry collided with the resolve of Gilded Age cities to keep order on their streets. The result of this clash, in the words of one Salvationist, was “Arrests! Arrests! Arrests!” Determined to “march to prison or anywhere Jesus would call them,” Salvationists purposefully violated open-air speech ordinances. One Ohio Salvationist put on old clothes before attending open-air meetings “so as to be ready for the lock-up.” Similarly anticipating arrest, members of a Jersey City corps marched with a reporter, a lawyer, and two men ready to furnish bail. Colorado Salvationists, when asked what they planned to do about a newly restrictive open-air assembly ordinance, replied that the local jail staff “may as well prepare supper for about fifty.”

The religious ardor that underlay the Salvationists’ willingness to break the law affected the way in which they thought about legal issues. Army members strongly believed that the nation’s constitutions protected their street preaching. Almost without exception, however, when discussing their cases in and out of court, they invoked the constitutional provisions regarding religious liberty, not ones pertaining to speech or assembly.

Judges were generally unsympathetic to the Army’s freedom-of-religion approach to open-air speech disputes. In 1889, a Massachusetts court held that: “The provisions of the Constitution which are relied on, securing freedom of religious worship, were not designed to prevent the adoption of reasonable rules and regulations for the use of streets and public places.” In the same year, after another Salvationist claimed that an open-air ordinance in Bloomington, Illinois, violated religious freedom, a unanimous state court “fail[ed] to see . . . that any such question is involved.”

In contrast to religious liberty, which appeared repeatedly and explicitly in Salvationist arguments, the liberties of speech and assembly were all but absent from Salvationist briefs, except (arguably) for occasional and vague assertions that city measures violated “private right,” were “oppressive,” or were generally “unconstitutional.” Because Salvationists did not make free speech claims, judges did not decide them. By the turn of the twentieth century, then, the American branch of the Salvation Army could claim an achievement that, in retrospect, seems rather unusual: it had fought vigorously, and in some cases successfully, for the right to speak in the open air, while making virtually no impression on the formal constitutional law of free speech.

Around 1900, Salvationists began to drop off of court dockets. By no means, however, did they disappear from street corners. Rather, cities opened enforcement loopholes large enough to accommodate Salvationist bass drums. By the early 1920s, the Army was allowed to conduct unlicensed open-air meetings “almost everywhere” in urban America. Later, even enclosed shopping malls, not known for First Amendment solicitude, often created special exceptions that permitted Salvationist bell-ringers to set up their kettles. Consequently, political activists and labor organizers replaced the Salvation Army on the front lines of the legal battle for open-air speech and assembly rights in the United States.

JOHN WERTHEIMER

References and Further Reading

- Booth-Tucker, Frederick. The Salvation Army in America: Selected Reports, 1899–1903. New York: Arno Press, 1972.
- McKinley, Edward H. Marching to Glory: The History of the Salvation Army in the United States of America, 1880–1980. San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1980.
- Taiz, Lillian. Hallelujah Lads and Lassies: Remaking the Salvation Army in America, 1880–1930. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2001.

Winston, Diane. "Living in the Material World: The Changing Role of Salvation Army Women, 1880–1918." Journal of Urban History 28:4 (2002): 466–487.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Commonwealth v. Plaisted, 148 Mass. 375 (1889)

Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)

Mashburn v. City of Bloomington, 32 Ill. App. 245 (1889)

SAME-SEX ADOPTION

Same-sex adoption, joint adoption, or second parent adoption as it is more commonly known is the adoption of a child by two partners of the same sex, each with full and equal rights and responsibilities as parent. The adopted child may be related to one of the couple; indeed, as advances in artificial insemination have been made, it has become more common for same-sex couples to have a child that is biologically related to one partner, but in most cases the child is not biologically related to either partner.

Opponents of homosexuals adopting children say that it is simply not in the best interests of a child to be placed in a homosexual household. Objections include concerns that the child would be potentially exposed to pedophilia in the home, that having homosexual adopted parents could expose the child to bullying and ridicule at school, that an openly homosexual environment might affect the child's sexuality, and that both a mother and father are needed for the development of the child.

Proponents of adoption by homosexuals characterize opposition as outmoded prejudice and cite numerous studies have shown no link between homosexual adoption and pedophilia or affect on the sexual orientation of the child. They stress that insisting on placing a child with both a mother and a father is both hypocritical, because single heterosexuals are able to adopt in almost every state, and cruel because there are simply not enough heterosexual couples willing to adopt to meet the demand, leading many children to be placed in state institutions or a succession of foster homes. They argue that same-sex couples can provide a supportive and loving environment for adopted children, a position supported by organizations such as the American Academy of Pediatrics, the American Academy of Family Physicians, the American Psychiatric Association, and the Child Welfare League of America.

Historically homosexuals have not been permitted to adopt children in the United States. For most of the history of the United States homosexual sodomy has been a crime, and homosexuals have been discriminated against. Homosexuals may have adopted children in the past, but the first recorded instance of an openly homosexual person successfully adopting a child in the United States was in California in 1982.

When considering whether to grant an adoption, the courts' paramount concern is the "best interests of the child." It is the interpretation of these best interests, rather than specific statutory language, that poses a problem to homosexuals adopting. As of 2004, only one state, Florida, had legislation prohibiting a homosexual from adopting a child as an individual (New Hampshire passed a similar provision in 1987, but this was repealed in 1999). In every other state an individual could theoretically adopt as a single person, irrespective of their sexual orientation. In practice, homosexuals in many states find it much harder to adopt children as a result of their sexuality, with some state court and welfare systems considering homosexuality to be a negative factor when considering the suitability of the would-be adoptive parent. In addition, private couples and some religious groups have fundamental moral objections to placing children with a homosexual adoptive parent. Homosexuals do experience more success when adopting severely handicapped and interracial children, groups that are traditionally shunned by those seeking to adopt.

All states allow and, indeed, prefer children to be adopted by a couple rather than an individual. Having two adoptive parents is thought to provide the child with a more stable home environment, although many argue that an equally stable environment can be created by a single parent or a parent and their unrelated spouse. No one disputes that a child is more secure when they have two parents however. If anything should happen to one parent, the child already has another that is fully recognized by the state. This recognition carries with it many extensive rights that cannot be replicated by other legal means, such as entitlements to benefits, health insurance, inheritance, child support, legal standing, and the ability to make medical decisions. The general rule with adoptions is that they can only be shared between married spouses; this creates a problem for a homosexual couple wanting to adopt and provide the same security as a married heterosexual couple.

Second parent adoptions began in California in 1986; in these cases the courts allowed children to be adopted by two people of the same sex, both with full and equal parental rights. This relatively novel idea has since spread to many other states and in 2004 was permissible across nine states and the District of Columbia as well as in some jurisdictions within a further fifteen states. Legislation barred second parent adoption in Florida, Mississippi, where same-sex couples were barred from adoption, and Utah, where only couples married according to state law could adopt as a couple, and appellate courts in Colorado, Ohio, Nebraska, and Wisconsin found such adoptions incompatible with state law. Most states had yet to formulate any widespread systematic response to demands for second couple adoptions. The situation was further complicated by the rise of same-sex unions and the status of those unions in determining eligibility to adopt as a couple.

Second parent adoptions are particularly problematic for those opposed to recognition of same-sex unions as marriage with all of its attendant benefits and responsibilities. One of the chief arguments for the state granting special privileges to married couples, such as tax breaks, rests on the time, money, and effort spent by parents raising the next generation of citizens. If same-sex couples are in civil unions with children adopted by both partners, then the argument for state recognition of same sex unions as marriage becomes stronger.

The fractured approach of states to same-sex unions and second parent adoptions is potentially most destructive when the relationship between the same-sex parents deteriorates: there are well-established procedures for dealing with issues of custody, support, and access after a divorce, both within and between states. How states that refuse to recognize same-sex unions and second parent adoptions would respond if one partner fled with the adopted child into their jurisdiction is unclear.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Ball, Carlos A. The Morality of Gay Rights: An Exploration in Political Philosophy. New York: Routledge, 2003.
- Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund. <http://www.lambdalegal.org>, (1997–2004).
- Mallon, Gerald P. Gay Men Choosing Parenthood. New York: Columbia University Press, 2004.
- “National Center for Lesbian Rights: Adoption by Lesbian, Gay and Bisexual Parents: An Overview of Current Law.” <http://www.nclrights.org>, (1999–2004).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Fla. Stat. § 63.042(3)

See also Child Custody and Adoption; Child Custody and Foster Care; Defense of Marriage Act; Family Values Movement; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Homosexuality and Immigration; Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund; Marriage, History of; Privacy; Reproductive Freedom; Same-Sex Marriage Legalization; Sodomy Laws

SAME-SEX MARRIAGE LEGALIZATION

Beginning in the 1970s, same-sex couples who had formed common households began to seek legal recognition for their relationships, and some sought marriage licenses from the state in which they resided. Legal recognition was deemed important not only for the vast array of rights and benefits and responsibilities that accompany legally married status but also as a sign of social recognition and acceptance of such relationships.

The Constitutional and Statutory Framework for Marriage

In the United States, the definition of marriage has traditionally been a matter of state law. States have restricted the choice of marital partners on the basis of age, closeness of genetic relationship, race, and penal status. The former two restrictions have generally not been questioned. The later two were challenged successfully on Constitutional grounds in Loving v. Virginia, 388 U.S. 1 (1967), concerning racial intermarriage, and Turner v. Safley, 482 U.S. 78 (1987), concerning the right of prisoners to marry. The Supreme Court made clear that the right to marry is one of the most basic rights of adults in our society, and the state must have a compelling justification, such as protection of minors or prevention of incest, to interfere with individual preferences in such matters.

When marriage is relevant for purposes of federal law, the federal government has traditionally treated as married any couple whose marriage was valid in the place where it was celebrated. Federal laws in which rights or responsibilities turn on marriage usually do not contain any definition of marriage. In 1996, however, Congress passed and President William J. Clinton signed the “Defense of Marriage Act,” which adopts the first federal statutory definition of marriage, providing that for all purposes of federal law, only marriages between one man and one woman will be considered valid, regardless of whether any state authorizes same sex marriages. The Act, commonly referred to as DOMA, also purports to excuse the states from having to recognize same sex marriages contracted in other states, which they might otherwise be obligated to do under the Constitution’s full faith and credit clause.

The Supreme Court has never addressed the question whether same sex couples would be entitled to marry, either as a matter of statutory construction or constitutional principle. When the Supreme Court ruled in Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003), that laws forbidding private acts of consensual sodomy between adults violate the liberty protected by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, dissenting Justice Antonin Scalia suggested that the Court's rejection of moral disapproval as a rational justification for sodomy laws would remove the principle argument against a constitutional right for same-sex marriage. Writing for a majority of the Court, Justice Anthony M. Kennedy, Jr., rejected the contention that the Court's decision necessarily decided the issue whether gay people are entitled to legal recognition for their relationships, and, writing only for herself in concurrence with the result, Justice Sandra Day O'Connor asserted that the state's desire to preserve traditional marriage might justify treating same-sex relationships differently from opposite sex relationships without violating Equal Protection requirements.

Before the 1990s, the statutory and common law of almost all states approached this issue through indirection. Same-sex marriage was not imagined and not mentioned. Traditional domestic relations statutes spoke of "husband" and "wife" or "man" and "woman" in referring to marital applicants and partners, and in specifying their rights and obligations. For much of our history, those rights and obligations differed depending on whether one was speaking of the husband or the wife, and the woman's legal identity was merged into her husband's identity. One of the struggles of the women's rights movement was to reform the law to provide equal rights and benefits to wives and husbands, and one result was a wave of legislative modernization resulting in the adoption of gender-neutral marriage statutes in many jurisdictions, but still at a time when legislatures were neither thinking in terms of same-sex marriage nor evidencing any direct intentions to make it available. Thus, although many modern domestic relations laws are gender neutral, they cannot be said affirmatively to authorize same-sex marriage, at least by virtue of their legislative history and the original intentions of their drafters.

Litigation by Same-Sex Couples for the Right to Marry: The First Wave

Since the 1970s, there have been two "waves" of same-sex marriage litigation, the first completely unsuccessful, the second notably more successful, at least to the extent of suggesting that same-sex marriage will probably become a reality in the United States.

Gay liberationists filed the early marriage cases in the first flush of excitement of the newly emerging militant gay rights movement of the 1970s. In Kentucky (Jones v. Hallahan, 501 S.W.2d 588 [1973]), Minnesota (Baker v. Nelson, 191 N.W.2d 185 [1971]), and Washington State (Singer v. Hara, 522 P.2d 1187 [1974]), appellate courts ruled that despite gender-neutral language, marriage laws did not authorize same-sex marriage, which was not within the contemplation of the legislatures, and that no federal constitutional right was violated by denying same sex partners the right to marry. Some courts treated the issue as one of traditional definition: a marriage was defined in American history and culture as the union of one man and one woman, so what the plaintiffs were seeking was not a marriage. The Washington court, in a jurisdiction that had banned sex discrimination by constitutional amendment, pointedly rejected the argument that forbidding same-sex couples to marry was sex discrimination, because men and women were equally forbidden from marrying members of their own sex.

These defeats discouraged further litigation. In addition, lesbian and gay rights public interest law firms, which were in the best position to mount test-case litigation, were notably uninterested in pursuing marriage, being then focused on challenging sodomy laws and establishing rights of association and non-discrimination in the workplace. Many leaders in these organizations had strongly felt ideological objections to marriage, which they saw as an inherently conservative institution that would stifle the creativity of gay relationships.

The Second Wave of Marriage Litigation

Beginning in the mid-1980s, the epidemic of acquired immuno deficiency syndrome (AIDS), coinciding with the widespread phenomenon of lesbians having children through donor insemination, sparked new interest in marriage in the gay community.

Opponents of same-sex marriage have usually grounded their overt opposition on concern for children, arguing that the elaborate legal structure of rights and responsibilities surrounding marriage has been built up to ensure the welfare of children being raised by married parents. Such a realization undoubtedly helped motivate lesbian mothers to be interested in obtaining marriage rights, even while ardent feminists in the gay academic and legal communities were arguing against marriage as a patriarchal institution. Patriarchal it may have been, but being married provided advantages for a family that included children.

Marriage is also crucially important during periods of illness and death, as the AIDS epidemic brought home to gay men and their lesbian caretakers in a wide range of circumstances. Lacking a legally recognized relationship proved detrimental to same-sex partners denied access to their hospitalized mates, excluded from medical information and decision making, sometimes evicted from their homes and treated as strangers or outsiders by the birth families of their dying or deceased partners. The lack of a marital relationship also caused problems for tax and inheritance purposes that could not necessarily be resolved through estate planning.

These two streams came together by the late 1980s in strong community agitation for the right to marry, symbolized during the National March on Washington for Lesbian and Gay Rights in October 1987 by a mass wedding ceremony performed in front of the Internal Revenue Service by the Rev. Troy Perry, founder of the gay-oriented Metropolitan Community Church of America. Although gay rights litigation groups continued to resist calls to file lawsuits, individual community members initiated their own litigation in Washington, D.C., New York, Hawaii, and Alaska. The Washington case, Dean and Gill v. District of Columbia, 653 A.2d 307 (D.C.App. 1995), suffered utter rejection in the courts of the District, and the New York case, Storrs v. Holcomb, 666 N.Y. S.2d 835 (N.Y. App. Div. 1997), foundered on procedural flaws, but the Hawaii and Alaska cases showed the first glimmerings of success.

In Baehr v. Lewin, 852 P.2d 44, the Hawaii Supreme Court ruled in 1993 that a trial judge erred in granting summary judgment to the state. Hawaii had adopted an Equal Rights Amendment, making all governmental classifications based on sex “suspect” in the eyes of the Supreme Court, and a majority of that court accepted the argument that government restriction on the gender of marital partners was a sex-based classification. The court’s ruling led to a trial in October 1996, at which expert witnesses for both sides focused on the state’s argument that its compelling interest in providing the best possible families for raising children justified denying marriage licenses to same sex partners. In an unofficially published opinion, Baehr v. Miike, 1996 Westlaw 694235 (Haw. Cir. Ct., 1st Cir. Dec. 3, 1996), the trial judge found for the plaintiffs, noting that many same sex partners were raising children, that studies showed that their children were not harmed by being raised in such households, and concluding that denial of marriage to their parents actually worked a disadvantage to the children, who were denied the panoply of rights and benefits that society bestows on families headed by legally married partners. Shortly thereafter, a trial judge reached a similar conclusion in the Alaska case, Brause v. Bureau of Vital Statistics, 1998 WL 88743 (Alaska Super. Feb. 27, 1998).

However, the politics of Hawaii and Alaska were not ready for same-sex marriage. In both states, the legislatures placed constitutional amendments before the public to remove this issue from the judicial forum, and both constitutional amendments were passed by comfortable margins. However, the 1993 Hawaii Supreme Court ruling created widespread concern by opponents of same-sex marriage that either Hawaii or another state would eventually authorize same-sex marriage, and that other states would then be required under the federal Constitution’s Full Faith and Credit Clause to recognize such marriages. Full Faith and Credit is a notably underdeveloped area of constitutional law, and its application to the issue of marriage recognition is a matter of considerable debate, as is the scope of Congress’s authority to legislate about the substantive operation of this constitutional doctrine. There was also a widespread belief that a state could escape the obligation to recognize same-sex marriages from other jurisdictions if it had enacted a clear statement of public policy opposing them. These views combined to fuel bipartisan passage of the federal Defense of Marriage Act (DOMA) during the 1996 presidential election campaign, and the “mini-DOMAs” passed by about two-thirds of the states beginning shortly after the Hawaii Supreme Court decision and continuing to the present, with a few pending as this is being written.

The Test Cases

The near success of the Hawaii litigation led the gay litigation groups to change course and consider affirmative test-case litigation for marriage. Lambda Legal Defense & Education Fund (Lambda Legal) joined the plaintiffs’ legal team in Hawaii to assist with the trial on remand. Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders (GLAD), the New England public interest firm, then devised a test case with carefully selected plaintiffs in Vermont, believed to be the state with the best legal and constitutional framework to advance this issue. At the time the lawsuit was filed, Vermont law prohibited sexual orientation discrimination, and state employees in Vermont enjoyed domestic partnership benefits for their non-marital partners. Vermont had repealed its sodomy law in 1977. Both the legislature and the governorship were under Democratic Party control, and key leaders were seen as receptive to same-sex marriage. Vermont was the only state with an openly gay statewide elected official, State Auditor Edward Flanagan. The state constitution had a unique equal benefits clause in which to ground the theory of the case.

The Vermont Supreme Court announced in Baker v. State of Vermont, 744 A.2d 864 (1999), that lesbians and gay men were entitled to the same rights and benefits accompanying marriage as other Vermonters. The court also concluded that the legislature should be given an opportunity to determine how such rights were to be afforded, with only one partially dissenting judge arguing that the court should simply open up marriage to same-sex partners. The result was an intense political struggle, culminating in passage of the Civil Union Act, which creates a “separate but almost equal” legal status for same-sex partners. Because the statute expressly states that marriage is reserved for opposite sex couples, it deprives same-sex partners of the ability to claim that they are entitled to any of the rights and benefits provided to married couples under federal law. The uniqueness of the civil union status also left considerable doubt about its portability or potential respect in other jurisdictions. But the Vermont Supreme Court saw it as sufficient to meet state constitutional requirements and ended the litigation.

GLAD took the next step of filing a test case in Massachusetts, Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, and Lambda Legal devised and filed its own test case in New Jersey, Lewis v. Harris. The American Civil Liberties Union of Indiana also filed a test case on same-sex marriage, Morrison v. Sadler.

The Massachusetts case was the first to be decided. In Goodridge v. Department of Public Health, 798 N.E.2d 941 (Mass. Sup.Ct., Nov. 18, 2003), the court voted four to three that exclusion of same sex couples from marriage violated the state constitution on equal protection grounds and gave the legislature 180 days in which to take action it deemed “appropriate.” The legislature, panicked, did nothing to adjust state law to accommodate the decision during the 180-day period, instead voting to recommend to the public an amendment to the state constitution banning same sex marriages and authorizing civil unions. The measure narrowly passed the legislature but would have to be approved in identical wording by a subsequently elected legislature before it could be placed on the ballot. (In September 2005, the subsequently elected legislature defeated the amendment by a decisive margin, but opponents of same-sex marriage received the go-ahead from the attorney general to begin circulating petitions to put their own measure on the ballot.) Meanwhile, the Supreme Judicial Court responded negatively to a certified question from the state Senate as to whether a Vermont-style civil union statute would satisfy state constitutional requirements, and the court’s decision went into effect on May 17, 2004. Thus, Massachusetts became the first jurisdiction in the United States in which same-sex couples could marry as a matter of state law.

However, the governor and attorney general insisted that out-of-state couples could not marry in Massachusetts because of an obscure, previously unenforced provision of the marriage law dating to 1913, under which nonresidents may not be issued a Massachusetts marriage license if their marriage would not be recognized as valid in their state of residence. After some initial resistance, local town clerks fell into line with this ruling, and a new lawsuit was initiated to challenge the constitutionality of the 1913 provision, which was pending before the Supreme Judicial Court as this is written.

Meanwhile, the Massachusetts ruling set off alarm bells around the nation. President George W. Bush included a call for a Federal Marriage Amendment to adopt a uniform national definition of marriage in his 2004 State of the Union Address. Attending that address was the newly elected mayor of San Francisco, Gavin Newsom, who found the president’s statement so offensive that he persuaded San Francisco city officials to announce in February that they had concluded that the exclusion of same-sex couples from the right to marry violated the California constitution, and the city began issuing marriage licenses to same-sex couples. Thousands were married at San Francisco City Hall before the courts put a stop to the activity at the behest of the state’s attorney general. (The California Supreme Court later ruled that none of those marriages were valid, holding that the mayor and city government did not have the authority to issue licenses that were contrary to state law without first getting a judicial invalidation of the state law.) However, the San Francisco activity was the tip of an erupting volcano, as local officials in New Paltz, New York, Multnomah County (Portland), Oregon, and Santa Fe, New Mexico, briefly took similar action before being reigned in by higher authority.

In the ensuing controversy, more than a dozen states enacted constitutional amendments banning same-sex marriage during 2004 election cycles (some going even further to ban civil unions and domestic partnerships), while marriage litigation ensued in California, Oregon, Washington State, New York, and Florida, as existing cases continued in New Jersey and Indiana. The results of the litigation were mixed, but as of the time of this writing, none of the cases had resulted in a final decision following the lead of Massachusetts, although a Supreme Court ruling was imminent in Washington State, and argument was to be held shortly in the New Jersey Supreme Court.

Perhaps more significant than the unfolding litigation, however, was the action of the California legislature during the summer of 2005. Although a legislative proposal to open up marriage to same-sex partners had initially been unsuccessful, and many had argued that it could not be enacted through normal legislation because of a popularly enacted ban on same-sex marriage just a few years before, Proposition 22, late in the summer of 2005 the proposal was revived and narrowly passed both houses of the state legislature. For the first time, a legislative body in the United States had affirmatively acted to make marriage available to same-sex partners. However, Governor Arnold Schwarzenegger, who had previously stated that he had “no problem” with same-sex marriage, promptly indicated his intention to veto the measure, on the ground that “the people” had spoken through Proposition 22 and that pending litigation challenging the constitutionality of that measure was the appropriate method to resolve the issue. Although at the time of writing the governor was expected to veto the bill, the very fact of its passage through the legislature signaled an important new stage in the developing story of same-sex marriage. What had been widely considered political poison, never to be achieved through a normal legislative process, had now become politically conceivable. This gave heart to same-sex marriage proponents in other jurisdictions as they plotted strategy toward the long-term goal of equality for same-sex partners.

During the summer of 2005, opponents of same-sex marriage in the federal Congress took two routes to advance their views, promoting the Federal Marriage Amendment and a bill that would strip federal courts of jurisdiction to hear constitutional challenges to the Defense of Marriage Act. Both of those efforts fell short, with many members saying that they were premature, especially because the few federal courts to confront the issue had rejected constitutional challenges to DOMA and refused to accord any recognition to same-sex marriages contracted in Canada or Massachusetts. However, general elections in 2005 and 2006 were expected to bring the enactment of more state constitutional amendments on the subject.

International Developments

The same-sex marriage litigation in the United States was unfolding against a background of increasing legal recognition for same-sex partners—and even the right to marry—abroad. The Netherlands and Belgium had legislated to open up marriage to same-sex partners, and most of Scandinavia provided registered partnerships that carried most of the rights and responsibilities of marriage. The Hungarian Constitutional Court had opened up the status of “common law” marriage to same-sex partners. The South African courts had required the government to provide recognition to same-sex partners in a variety of contexts, and informed speculation suggested that ultimately the court, ruling under a Constitution that expressly forbids discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, would mandate opening up marriage.

But the most immediate contribution to placing same-sex marriage in the center of political discussion in the United States came from Canada, where the highest appellate courts of two provinces—British Columbia and Ontario—ruled in the spring of 2003 that the Canadian common law definition of marriage must be immediately changed in compliance with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Responsibilities to allow same-sex marriages, and couples began marrying in those provinces immediately (Barbeau v. British Columbia [Attorney General], EGALE Canada Inc. v. Canada [Attorney General], 2003 BCCA 251, 13 B.C. L.R. [4th] 1, 2003 Carswell BC 1006 [May 1, 2003]; Halpern v. Canada [Attorney General], 2003 Carswell-Ont 2159 [June 12, 2003]). Because there was no residency requirement, same-sex couples from the United States began to travel to Canada to get married, just as many had traveled to Vermont after the Civil Unions Act went into effect in 2000. The ruling Liberal Party in the national Parliament then framed a statute to embody the new common law ruling for uniform application to all the provinces and to provide an exemption for objecting religious institutions who might not want to perform such marriages, and referred the draft legislation to the Supreme Court of Canada for advisory opinions on its constitutionality and potential application. After the Court ruled that such a law would be consistent with the constitution and binding on the provinces, but that no religious group could be required consistent with the Charter of Rights to perform any marriages inconsistent with their religious precepts, the government proceeded to put the measure to a vote, and it was enacted during the summer of 2005, thus making Canada the first country in the Western Hemisphere to authorize same-sex marriage on the national level.

But Canada was not the only country to endorse same-sex marriage during 2005. In 2004, after terrorist bombings in Spain led to the surprising defeat of the incumbent government and the election of a Socialist government that had pledged to support same-sex marriage, the attention of Europe turned to that country, traditionally considered a bastion of conservative Catholicism. Despite the fervent efforts of the Roman Catholic Church to stir up opposition to the proposal, public opinion polls showed a solid majority of the Spanish public in support of the government's proposal, and it was enacted and went into effect shortly before the Canadian legislation, making Spain the third country in the world (after the Netherlands and Belgium) to embrace same-sex marriage.

Conclusion

The spread of same-sex marriage in the United States seems inevitable. The Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court's 2003 decision inspired so much activity around the country, and spawned so many lawsuits, that it seemed inevitable that somewhere, perhaps in Washington State or New Jersey, a second state would join the ranks of same-sex marriage jurisdictions. Meanwhile, the California legislature's action in narrowly passing a statutory authorization for same sex marriage, although ultimately unsuccessful because of the governor's veto, signaled that the concept was becoming politically more palatable.

The main policy questions remaining are whether same-sex marriage will have a positive or a negative effect on society and particularly whether it would damage the existing institution of marriage. Evidence from the Netherlands, Belgium, Massachusetts, and Canada, although still early, suggests that a society can accept with equanimity the addition of same-sex married couples, and that little effect on traditional marriages has been seen in the short run, either in their number or their stability. (Indeed, the Massachusetts legislature's vote in September 2005 to reject the proposed anti-same-sex marriage constitutional amendment provided a prime illustration of this point, because many legislators who had previously supported the amendment now took the position that after same-sex couples had been marrying for more than a year without any adverse societal effect, there was no policy justification to pass the amendment.) Existing studies suggest that the impact on children being raised by same-sex partners will be to make them more secure and entitle them to more benefits, particularly crucial health insurance in cases in which their "non-biological" parent is the one whose job is the source of coverage.

Same-sex marriage has not been available long enough in modern times for one to identify its long-term impact, although one can speculate that the existence of same sex marriages is likely to contribute to the continuing evolution of marriage toward an equal partnership in which the roles of the spouses are not sharply defined or delimited by gender. In other words, same-sex marriage may be one of the inevitable effects of the direction in which the institution of marriage was already evolving before the first case was filed by a same-sex couple seeking a license.

ARTHUR S. LEONARD

References and Further Reading

- Cain, Patricia A. Rainbow Rights: The Role of Lawyers and Courts in the Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights Movement. Boulder: Westview Press, 2000.
- Eskridge, William N., Jr. Gaylaw: Challenging the Apartheid of the Closet. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press, 1999.
- Leonard, Arthur S. Sexuality and the Law: An Encyclopedia of Major Legal Cases. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Wardle, Lynn D., et al., eds., Marriage and Same-Sex Unions: A Debate. Westport, CT: Praeger Publishers, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Baehr v. Lewin*, 852 P.2d 44 (Haw. 1993)
- Baehr v. Muike*, 1996 Westlaw 694235 (Haw. Cir. Ct., 1st Cir. Dec. 3, 1996)
- Baker v. Nelson*, 191 N.W.2d 185 (Minn. 1971)
- Baker v. State of Vermont*, 744 A.2d 864 (Vt. 1999)
- Barbeau v. British Columbia (Attorney General)*, EGALE Canada Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), 2003 BCCA 251, 13 B.C.L.R.(4th) 1, 2003 Carswell BC 1006 (May 1, 2003)
- Brause v. Bureau of Vital Statistics*, 1998 WL 88743 (Alaska Super. Ct. Feb. 27, 1998)
- Dean and Gill v. District of Columbia*, 653 A.2d 307 (D.C. App. 1995)
- Goodridge v. Department of Public Health*, 798 N.E.2d 941 (Mass. Sup.Ct., Nov. 18, 2003)
- Halpern v. Canada (Attorney General)*, 2003 CarswellOnt 2159 (June 12, 2003)
- Jones v. Hallahan*, 501 S.W.2d 588 (Ky. 1973)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)
- Loving v. Virginia*, 388 U.S. 1 (1967)
- Singer v. Hara*, 522 P.2d 1187 (Wash. App. 1974)
- Storrs v. Holcomb*, 666 N.Y.S.2d 835 (N.Y. App. Div. 1997)
- Turner v. Safley*, 482 U.S. 78 (1987)

See also Gay and Lesbian Rights; Marriage, History of

SAME-SEX UNIONS

Beginning in the 1970s, same-sex couples in the United States began to seek recognition for their coupled status from employers, businesses, landlords, and the government. A similar movement began at about the same time in Western Europe, and by the 1980s, the issue had spread to South America, Australia, Israel, and New Zealand. Same-sex couples in South Africa began to look for legal recognition from the postapartheid government in the 1990s, as did couples in some of the postcommunist states in Eastern Europe.

The Emergence of Same-Sex Couples as an Element of Society

The emergence of this issue is a natural consequence of social developments making it more possible than previously for lesbians and gay men to live openly and establish households together. Principal among those developments has been the demise of sodomy laws penalizing homosexual sex acts, and the social disapprobation they reflected, which had provided strong incentives for lesbians and gay men to conduct their lives in a way that would hide their sexual orientation from public disclosure. Until 1962, private acts of consensual sodomy between adults were serious criminal violations in every state, but beginning in that year states began to decriminalize consensual adult sodomy as they adopted the Model Penal Code. By the time the Supreme Court rejected a constitutional challenge to a sodomy law in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), about half of the states had decriminalized, mostly through legislation, in a few cases through court invalidation. In 2003, the process was completed when the Supreme Court ruled in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558, that laws penalizing private, consensual adult sexual acts violate the due process clause.

The sodomy laws were a formal corollary of widespread moral disapproval of homosexual conduct and the resulting social stigma characteristic of American society for much of our history. By the early part of the twentieth century, this began to abate as the concept of homosexual orientation gained greater currency and some medical authorities began to argue that such an orientation was due to factors other than the free choice of the actor. A mental illness construction of homosexuality became the dominant mode of discussion by the time of World War II, when U.S. military authorities, considering homosexuality to be a symptom of mental instability, instituted methods to weed out homosexuals from among potential recruits and draftees. This medicalization of homosexuality reached its high point in American law with the 1954 enactment of an immigration exclusion that described homosexuality, based on the testimony of the Public Health Service, as “psychopathic personality,” and authorized Public Health officers to “diagnose” homosexuals as a prerequisite to excluding them from admission to the United States.

When the American Law Institute voted in 1955 to recommend that consensual sodomy carried out in private by adults not be subject to criminal penalties, part of its rationale was that symptoms of illness should not be criminalized. Supreme Court Justice William O. Douglas reflected this view in his dissent in Boutilier v. Immigration & Naturalization Service, 387 U.S. 118 (1967), in which the Court rejected a constitutional challenge to the exclusionary policy. By then, the statute had been amended to clarify that it applied to those “afflicted” with “sexual deviation.” But events were already transpiring to undermine the mental illness model. Publication of the “Kinsey Reports” on human sexuality in the immediate post-World War II period shook the public view that homosexuality was a phenomenon affecting insignificant numbers, as Kinsey asserted that a substantial minority of the population engaged in homosexual conduct at some point in their adult lives, and at least 10 percent for some sustained period of years. Then Dr. Evelyn Hooker published psychological research showing that a group of gay men and a control group of self-described heterosexual men did not differ in their responses to standard psychological tests, even though psychologists had confidently used such tests in the past to “diagnose” homosexuals. By the 1960s, voices had emerged in the medical literature arguing that the mental illness model was defective, and the American Psychiatric Association voted in the 1970s to remove “homosexuality” from its Diagnostic and Statistical Manual (DSM), the profession’s official list of mental illnesses. The American Psychological Association followed, and soon the American Bar Association had approved a resolution calling for the repeal of criminal sodomy laws.

The eruption of a publicly visible movement for lesbian and gay rights at the end of the 1960s, supplanting what had been a small, secretive gay rights movement begun after World War II, also contributed to changes in social attitudes, as gay “spokespeople” appeared on television and were quoted in the press, marched in annual Gay Pride Parades in major cities, and began lobbying municipal governments to amend their civil rights laws to include “sexual orientation” as a prohibited ground for discrimination. The first such laws were passed in the mid to late 1970s, and state laws followed in the 1980s. By the time of the Lawrence decision in 2003, more than a dozen states, including the largest by population, California, had banned such discrimination, as had most of the nation’s largest cities.

These legal and political changes were mirrored in the personal lives of gay people, as more and more found it possible to be open about their sexuality to family, friends, and coworkers. Under such circumstances, cohabiting with a same sex partner became increasingly viable. The 2000 national census, the first to make a determined effort to gather data about cohabiting nonmarital partners, discovered several hundred thousand households comprising biologically and legally unrelated same-sex partners, dispersed throughout virtually every census district in the nation.

A Movement for Legal Recognition of Same-Sex Partners

In the new social era of sodomy law reform and civil rights protection, same-sex couples began to be more open about their existence and the ability to live openly in same-sex relationships without incurring severe social and possible criminal sanctions fueled a movement for social equality. Some sought same-sex marriage legalization, and litigation seeking marriage licenses began in the 1970s. More commonly, however, beginning in the 1970s same-sex partners sought legal recognition for their relationships in the context of particular instances of inequality or unfairness where existing social and legal arrangements came together to disadvantage them.

Such disadvantage stems from the presumption underlying our traditional social and legal framework that the legally married couple is the basic social unit, and institutions evolved around that presumption. Population trends show that the presumption is shaky, inasmuch as a substantial portion of the heterosexual population is unmarried, some living with opposite sex partners and many living as singles. In many cases, unmarried partners or single individuals are also raising children. Households headed by married opposite sex couples constitute the largest demographic category, but the other categories are substantial, and family diversity became a ubiquitous characteristic of late twentieth-century America.

But the law's adjustment to these circumstances has been halting, not least due to strong moral objections to recognizing nonmarital partners by religious conservatives and the perception of legislators that the large religious voting blocs would refuse to support politicians who favored revising the laws to accommodate nontraditional families. Both the public and the private sector traditionally treat the married couple as the norm, imposing obligations and according rights and privileges with the expectation that such couples function as a single economic and social unit. (Indeed, for much of our history the legal entity of the married couple was assigned the husband's identity, and the wife's status was merged into the husband's.) When Congress was debating the Defense of Marriage Act in 1996, some members requested the Congressional Research Service to compile a list of all places in the federal statutes and regulations that invoke marriage as a qualification or basis for a right or obligation, and the resulting list exceeded 1,300 items. The implications of marriage under state laws generate hundreds of similar references. And, of course, marriage has many consequences outside the statutory law, as reflected in voluntary policies adopted by businesses and nonprofit organizations, and social attitudes held by the population at large.

Specific Legal Problems Stemming from Lack of Recognition

As more same-sex couples began to live together, legal issues emerged in specific instances. For example, in New York City, where gay men were hit hard by acquired immune deficiency syndrome (AIDS) in the early 1980s, lack of recognition for same-sex partners generated hardships and litigation. Hospitals excluded all but legal spouses and close relatives from visiting patients in intensive care units, so AIDS patients were excluded from contact with their partners (and vice versa) at critical times when contact was crucially important. Medical personnel refused to recognize the interest of a partner in being briefed about the patient's condition or participating in treatment decisions, where a spouse would be briefed and consulted. There were cases in which patients died and their partners were not notified (as a spouse automatically would be). Struggles ensued between legal family members and partners for access and control, even over rights to participate in funeral and memorial services and burial decisions. It is not surprising that the right most often accompanying domestic partnership registration, at the insistence of gay community lobbyists, was for spousal recognition of registered partners by hospitals.

In New York City, the lack of legal partner recognition caused serious hardship for surviving partners living in rent-regulated apartments at a time of tight housing and upward pressure on rents. Landlords were eager to reclaim vacated apartments, because substantial rent increases were authorized for vacancy turnovers. From early in the AIDS epidemic there were cases in which people died from AIDS and their surviving partners were threatened with eviction, in some cases from apartments where they had lived for years without having formal recognized tenant status. A state regulation provided that family members were entitled to succeed to the leasehold when a tenant in a rent-controlled apartment died, but landlords argued that surviving partners did not qualify. Litigation ensued, and the New York Court of Appeals ruled in Braschi v. Stahl Associates Company, 543 N.E.2d 49 (1989), that the family protection regulation should be interpreted to include financially and emotionally interdependent unmarried adult partners. This was possibly the first appellate ruling anywhere to provide legal recognition for same-sex unions, and it was soon codified by the state agency responsible for enforcing housing rights into regulations specifying eligibility standards for family recognition.

AIDS was not the only disaster that could generate problems for same-sex partners. A Minnesota couple, Sharon Kowalski and Karen Thompson, encountered difficulties when Sharon was rendered quadriplegic in a 1983 automobile accident. Although Sharon and Karen lived together and had celebrated a commitment ceremony, exchanged rings, and were considered a couple in their small college community in St. Cloud, Minnesota, they were not open about their relationship with Sharon's parents, conservative rural residents who thought Karen was Sharon's landlord. Sharon's father, who rejected the idea that Sharon was a lesbian and that Karen was her partner, was appointed guardian. The ensuing struggle between parents and same-sex partner lasted until 1992, and for a period of five years, Karen was barred from any contact with Sharon while Sharon's father exerted total authority. It was not until 1991 that the Minnesota Court of Appeals ruled in In re Guardianship of Sharon Kowalski, 478 N.W.2d 790, that Sharon and Karen comprised a "family of affinity which ought to be accorded respect," and Karen was appointed as guardian for Sharon in place of her father. Had Sharon and Karen been in a legally recognized relationship, years of emotional suffering might have been avoided, and there is evidence to suggest that Sharon's treatment and recovery were compromised by the battle between her parents and her partner.

Disputes over child custody and visitation provide another arena where the lack of legal recognition for same-sex unions became increasingly problematic. Beginning in the 1980s, it was increasingly common for same-sex partners to be raising children, either through adoption or through donor insemination in the case of lesbian couples or surrogacy in the case of gay male couples. Most reported legal disputes concerning custody and visitation arose from the breakup of lesbian relationships, when the birth mother wanted to sever not only her own ties with her former partner but her children's ties as well.

In the typical case, the same-sex partner was a full participant in the decision to have children, assisted and was supportive through pregnancy, was present at birth, and served an equal role as mother during the child's early years. (There were cases in which the partner who became pregnant was the one with the more prestigious job and better health insurance coverage, who then would return to work after giving birth leaving the other partner, referred to as a coparent, to be the main daily caretaker of the child.) Although some relationship breakups were amicable and coparents were allowed to maintain ties through visitation agreements, sometimes the opposite was the case and litigation ensued when a coparent sought joint custody or at least the right of regularly scheduled visitation.

Victories for lesbian coparents in such cases were scarce at first, because statutory and common law governing custody and visitation has evolved to shelter legal parents from claims by intermeddling relatives and unrelated third parties, typically limiting the right to seek visitation to legal spouses, adoptive parents, or persons with a close biological relationship to the child. Cases from many states show loving parents unable to maintain contact with children for whose birth they planned, and in whose early lives they played a part, cut off by a former partner who wished to make a new life free from entanglements of the old. A prime example is Alison D. v. Virginia M., 572 N.E.2d 27 (1991), in which New York's highest court labeled the coparent as a "legal stranger" who lacked standing to seek visitation, regardless of whether the child's best interest might be advanced by maintaining their relationship.

One solution would be to allow the coparent to adopt the child, but adoption statutes typically state that former parental rights are extinguished on an adoption. Thus, the birth mother would have to give up her parental rights to allow her same-sex partner to adopt. The only statutory exception in many jurisdictions was for adoption by a stepparent. Thus, when a mother remarried, her new husband could adopt her children without affecting her own parental rights. But if the children's birth father were still alive, his consent would be required unless his own parental rights were previously terminated, and his rights would be extinguished on an adoption. Under this legal regime, a child cannot have two fathers or two mothers. Many courts were reluctant to find exceptions to these standard practices without specific legislative guidance, and legislators proved unwilling to deal with the politically volatile topic of adoption of children by gay adults. (Indeed, the only state legislation directly on point, adopted in New Hampshire and Florida, specifically prohibited adoption by gay people. The New Hampshire law was subsequently repealed. The Florida law was challenged numerous times in court, but has withstood challenge numerous times, even after the Supreme Court's Lawrence v. Texas decision appeared to make the law quite vulnerable.) The issue is politically volatile because a substantial portion of the population continues to believe that homosexuality is a learned behavior and that a child will not be able to make an appropriate psychological adjustment to being raised by a gay parent. Many continue to believe that individuals become "homosexuals" as a result of seduction by gay adults. If same sex partners dissolved their relationship but the coparent was an adoptive parent of their child, of course, the adoptive parent would continue to have standing to seek joint custody or a visitation schedule. Furthermore, the adoption would cement a legal tie, albeit indirect, between the same-sex partners as legal parents of the same child.

However, toward the end of the twentieth century, courts began to perceive the disadvantage to children stemming from lack of ability of their coparent to adopt and the lack of standing for coparents to seek joint custody or visitation after a same sex relationship breaks up. There are now several states, including New York—Matter of Jacob, 86 N.Y.2d 651 (1995)—and California—Sharon S. v. Superior Court of San Diego County, 73 P.3d 554 (Cal. 2003)—where the highest court has found that the adoption statutes can be construed to allow a same sex coparent to adopt a child without affecting the other parent's continuing legal status. And there are several states (such as Massachusetts, E.N.O. v. L.M.M., 711 N.E.2d 886 [Mass. 1999], and New Jersey, V.C. v. M.J.B., 725 A.2d 13 [N.J. 1999]) that have found ways to accord standing to coparents to seek visitation, even when they had not been able to adopt before the break-up of the relationship. Furthermore, in Vermont, California, and Connecticut, state laws creating special legal statuses for registered same-sex partners now authorize joint adoptions and confer standing to seek visitation after a relationship terminates. However, in much of the United States the traditional legal stance prevails as to both of these issues, and there are jurisdictions in which only one of these solutions is available. For example, an Illinois appellate court ruled in In re Adoption of A.W., J.W., and M.R., Minors, 796 N.E.2d 729 (2003), that a coparent can seek to adopt, but if the relationship breaks up before adoption is finalized, the coparent cannot seek visitation, because she is still considered to be a legal stranger rather than a de facto parent by virtue of her actual experience with the child.

Under existing principles of tort law, if a person is the victim of negligence under circumstances where their spouse is also in the zone of danger or directly observes the incident, the spouse can maintain an action for infliction of emotional distress. If the incident deprives a spouse or child of the injured or defunct spouse's marital services, then the perpetrator may be held liable for loss of consortium. If a person dies as the result of another's negligence, a surviving spouse or child can sue for wrongful death and seek compensation for the ensuing financial losses. All of these legal rights stemming from injury to a spouse may not be available to a same-sex partner whose relationship is not recognized under the law. There is scant legal authority for extending such rights, apart from the Vermont Civil Union Act and provisions of the California Domestic Partnership Code. The California Code embraces legislative proposals stemming from a gruesome incident in San Francisco where a woman was mauled to death by a pair of pit bulls and her surviving same-sex partner sought to hold the caretaker of the dogs liable in negligence for wrongful death. Although there was contrary authority under state law, a trial judge found that she should be accorded standing in a case that was much debated in the press, drew expressions of support from the City Council, and eventuated in state legislation extending the right to sue for wrongful death to registered domestic partners. A New York trial court ruled in Langan v. St. Vincent's Hospital, 765 N.Y.S.2d 411 (Nassau County Sup. Ct. 2003), appeal pending, that a man could sue a New York hospital for medical malpractice on the death of his same-sex partner, although this ruling was premised on the prior Vermont civil union ceremony having created a "spousal" relationship between the men in that jurisdiction, which the court held should be recognized for this purpose.

In the field of employee benefits, the availability of health insurance, paid funeral leave, and family and medical leave is routinely expected by employees with legal spouses but is not routinely available in the case of same-sex partners. Most of the change in this area has come voluntarily from the private sector, as large corporations were convinced that the costs of including same-sex partners in such benefits plans were minor compared with the gains in employee satisfaction and the competitive advantage in attracting skilled labor. Private sector employees could not sue to obtain such benefits, because a federal law, ERISA, blocks the courts from considering entitlement claims to employee benefits based solely on state legal principles, such as a state law banning sexual orientation discrimination. However, ERISA does not apply to the working conditions of state and local government employees, so there has been litigation asserting that the failure of government employers to provide such benefits violates constitutional equality requirements. One such case, Tanner v. Oregon Health Sciences University, 971 P.2d 435 (Or. Ct. App. 1998), led the court to find that denial of such benefits constituted sex discrimination in violation of the state's constitution, and another, Gay Teachers Association v. Board of Education, 585 N.Y.S.2d 1016 (N.Y.A.D., 1st Dept. 1992), led the City of New York to negotiate benefits for same-sex partners of municipal employees with the relevant labor unions. However, many of these lawsuits have been unsuccessful when courts concluded that the same-sex partners were being treated the same as unmarried opposite sex partners, who were seen by these courts as the appropriate comparators for analyzing the discrimination claim.

Finally, in those jurisdictions where discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation is forbidden by law—seventeen states as of 2005—it is possible to argue that the failure of a covered entity to extend benefits or rights to same-sex partners may violate the law on a theory of disparate impact. The New York Court of Appeals embraced such a view in Levin v. Yeshiva University, 754 N.E.2d 1099 (2001), in which a private university provided subsidized housing for married students but refused to allow lesbian or gay students to have same-sex partners living with them in such housing. Although limiting the housing to married students established a requirement that on its face had no reference to sexual orientation, the court found that the obvious disadvantage that the policy imposed on lesbian and gay students could be actionable as discrimination, even if unintended as such.

Some municipalities and states have decided to extend legal recognition to same-sex unions through the mechanism of domestic partnerships. Typically, unmarried adult couples can register their partnership with a municipal official and will receive a certificate that can be used as evidence of their relationship. In some cases, the local law provides no other rights. In others, the partnership status may bestow visitation rights in municipal hospitals and jails, benefits for partners of municipal employees, and recognition under other municipal programs where eligibility or entitlement turns on marital status. The widest-ranging municipal domestic partnership law is in New York City. On the state level, the Vermont Civil Union Law, enacted in 2000 in response to a lawsuit, Baker v. State of Vermont, 744 A.2d 864 (Vt. 1999), affords same-sex couples the same rights under state law that are enjoyed by married couples. In 2003, California amended an existing domestic partnership registration law to extend most of the rights enjoyed by married couples under state law, the major exception being spousal status under the state's Tax Code. In 2005, Connecticut enacted a civil union statute as a compromise between proponents of same-sex marriage and those opponents of marriage who were willing to extend legal recognition to partners so long as the term "marriage" was not used. The Vermont, California, and Connecticut laws provide to those same-sex partners who register their relationships virtually all the rights under state law that are provided to married couples.

The tragedy of September 11, 2001, brought very limited recognition for same-sex unions under federal law, when the administrator of the settlement fund appropriated by Congress authorized some benefits payments to surviving partners of persons who had died in the tragedy at the World Trade Center. But the limitations of legal recognition were emphasized by the unequal treatment afforded a survivor of an employee of the Pentagon, because the administrator based his ruling on New York State's willingness to recognize same-sex partners for certain purposes contrasted with Virginia's unwillingness to do so.

Social and legal recognition of same-sex partners has advanced to the point where the general public appears to support such recognition in specified circumstances where failure to do so is readily seen to cause hardship, but a majority of the public in the United States continues to resist the idea of opening up legal marriage to same-sex partners, which would be the ultimate and complete legal recognition of their unions.

ARTHUR S. LEONARD

References and Further Reading

- Cain, Patricia A. Rainbow Rights: The Role of Lawyers and Courts in the Lesbian and Gay Civil Rights Movement. Boulder: Westview Press, 2000.
- D'Emilio, John, and Estelle B. Freedman. Intimate Matters: A History of Sexuality in America. New York: Harper and Row, 1988.
- Leonard, Arthur S. Sexuality and the Law: An Encyclopedia of Major Legal Cases. New York: Garland Publishing, 1993.
- Pinello, Daniel R. Gay Rights and American Law. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2003.
- Rubenstein, William B. Sexual Orientation and the Law. 2nd Ed. St. Paul, MN: West Publishing Co., 1997.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- A.W., J.W., and M.R., Minors, In re Adoption of*, 796 N.E.2d 729 (Ill. Ct. App. 2003)
- Alison D. v. Virginia M.*, 572 N.E.2d 27 (N.Y. 1991)
- Baker v. State of Vermont*, 744 A.2d 864 (Vt. 1999)
- Boutlier v. Immigration & Naturalization Service*, 387 U.S. 118 (1967)
- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Braschi v. Stahl Associates Company*, 543 N.E.2d 49 (N.Y. 1989)

SAME-SEX UNIONS

E.N.O. v. L.M.M., 711 N.E.2d 886 (Mass. 1999)
Gay Teachers Assoc.'s v. Board of Education, 585 N.Y.S.2d 1016 (N.Y.A.D., 1st Dept. 1992)
Jacob, Matter of, 660 N.E.2d 651 (N.Y. 1995)
Kowalski, In re Guardianship of Sharon, 478 N.W.2d 790 (Minn. App. 1991)
Langan v. St. Vincent's Hospital, 765 N.Y.S.2d 411 (N.Y., Nassau County Sup. Ct. 2003)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
Levin v. Yeshiva University, 754 N.E.2d 1099 (N.Y. 2001)
Sharon S. v. Superior Court of San Diego County, 73 P.3d 554 (Cal. 2003)
Tanner v. Oregon Health Sciences University, 971 P.2d 435 (Or. Ct. App. 1998)
V.C. v. M.J.B., 725 A.2d 13 (N.J. 1999)

See also Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986); Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003); Same-Sex Marriage Legalization

SANDSTROM v. MONTANA, 442 U.S. 510 (1979)

Along with In Re Winship and Mullaney v. Wilbur, Sandstrom, was one of a triumvirate of cases decided in the 1970s that strengthened protection for criminal defendants by strictly holding the government to its burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt in criminal cases. In Sandstrom the defendant had been convicted in Montana of deliberate homicide and appealed an instruction to the jury that the "law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." He argued that this instruction invited the jury to presume that the requisite intent existed rather than to find that the state had proven it. Justice William J. Brennan, writing for a unanimous Supreme Court, noted that even though the instruction did not involve a conclusive presumption, as was the case in Mullaney, the jury nevertheless could have interpreted it as shifting the burden to the defendant to prove that he had not acted voluntarily. Such burden shifting, the Court concluded, was unconstitutional, because it did not comply with due process. In so ruling the Court expanded the application of Mullaney to permissive as well as conclusive evidentiary presumptions. However, the due process protection extended in Sandstrom was later diminished by the Court's holding in Rose v. Clark that such an instruction, while unconstitutional, could nevertheless constitute "harmless error."

TAMARA R. PIETY

References and Further Reading

Leahy, William J., and Brownlow M. Speer, An End to Burden-Shifting Presumptions: The Signal Criminal Law Achievement of the Post-Warren Court, Dec. Boston Bar Journal 35 (1991): 10–14.

Mueller, Christopher B., and Laird C. Kirkpatrick. Evidence. 3rd Ed., New York: Aspen Publishers, 2003, pp. 130–149.

Cases and Statutes Cited

In Re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970)
Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975)
Rose v. Clark, 478 U.S. 570 (1986)

See also Due Process; In Re Winship, 397 U.S. 358 (1970); Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt; Self-Defense

SANGER, MARGARET HIGGINS (1879–1966)

Margaret Sanger is widely considered to be the founder of the American birth control movement and a driving force behind the development of modern contraceptives. Sanger emphasized birth control and family limitation as a means through which women could determine their own lives and protect their health, as well as an issue that was intrinsically linked to general public health social equality. Her campaigns to disseminate accurate information about and increase access to contraceptives often ran afoul of government censorship and social strictures of her time.

As a nurse and midwife on New York City's Lower East Side, Sanger was profoundly influenced by the destitution and high birth rates among the women with whom she worked. These experiences reinforced Sanger's childhood experiences. The sixth of eleven children in a working class Irish-American family, Sanger believed that the toll of so many pregnancies had contributed to weakening her mother's body and to her succumbing to an early death from tuberculosis. Sanger also observed as a child that local working-class and poor families were often larger than their well-off neighbors, a condition she believed perpetuated poverty, illness, and hunger. Frustrated by her inability to help her patients control their own fertility and, in some cases, avoid life-threatening pregnancies, Sanger resolved to leave nursing and in favor of advocacy.

In 1912, Sanger began writing for the socialist paper The Call. Her column on sex education, "What Every Girl Should Know," discussed contraception, sexually transmitted diseases, menstruation, and other traditionally taboo topics. In 1914, Sanger began publishing her magazine The Woman Rebel and soon was arrested on criminal charges for violating New York's Comstock law, which forbade sending "obscene" materials through the mail. To avoid a lengthy jail term and the interruption of her work, Sanger fled to England, where she continued researching birth control advances and policies. On her return to the United States in 1916, Sanger and others opened the nation's first birth control clinic, a direct challenge to the Comstock regulations. The clinic remained open for ten days before Sanger and her cofounders were arrested.

Although Sanger served jail time, the resulting case was a partial victory. On appeal, the state law was interpreted to allow doctors to give contraceptive advice to married women for whom pregnancy might endanger their health. Sanger focused subsequent lobbying on winning support for birth control from the medical profession, social workers, and the liberal wing of the eugenics movement. This increased emphasis on the medicalization of birth control was evident in her championing the medical prescription of the diaphragm and her helping to open a clinic in 1923 that not only dispensed information to individual women but also served as an educational venue for physicians. Physicians were among those who defended Sanger after her clinic was raided in 1929, criticizing the police for interfering with the privacy of the doctor-patient relationship.

In 1921, Sanger founded the American Birth Control League, which would later become the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, a national lobbying and educational clearinghouse organization. The league was often frustrated as it pressed for legislative change, although it saw measured success through litigation, as multiple cases over many years gradually eroded restrictions on the dissemination of birth control information in the United States. Sanger also consistently advocated for the development of simpler and more affordable contraceptives. She helped arrange for the American manufacture of diaphragms she had been smuggling in from Europe, and in subsequent years she helped arrange for funding of research efforts to develop spermicidal gels and hormonal contraceptives. After World War II, Sanger concentrated on international aspects of the birth control movement, helping to found the International Planned Parenthood Federation in 1952.

Sanger died in Tucson, Arizona, on September 6, 1966, only a few months after the Supreme Court's decision in Griswold v. Connecticut (1965) found that the right to privacy made birth control legal for married couples. Sanger was eighty-six years old.

ERIN ACKERMAN

References and Further Reading

Chessler, Ellen. Woman of Valor: Margaret Sanger and the Birth Control Movement in America. New York: Simon & Schuster, 1992.

Gordon, Linda. The Moral Property of Women: a History of Birth Control Politics in America. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 2002.

Sanger, Margaret. An Autobiography. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, Inc., 1938.

"Margaret Sanger Papers Project," <http://www.nyu.edu/projects/sanger/>, (1985-).

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)

See also Birth Control; Comstock, Anthony; Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Reproductive Freedom

SANTA CLARA PUEBLO v. MARTINEZ, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)

Julia Martinez sued the Santa Clara Pueblo in federal court, alleging that the Pueblo's membership ordinance violated the Indian Civil Rights Act. Martinez was an enrolled member of the Pueblo, but her daughter had been denied enrollment on the grounds that her father, a Navajo Indian, was not a member. The membership ordinance denied enrollment to the children of female members who married outside the tribe, but not children of male members who married outside the tribe. Membership rights included the right to vote in tribal elections, land use rights, hunting and fishing rights, rights to irrigation water, and the right to reside in the Pueblo.

At trial, the district court held that the Indian Civil Rights Act conferred federal court jurisdiction on the claim and that the Pueblo was not entitled to sovereign immunity. On the merits, however, the district court ruled in favor of the Pueblo, holding that the ordinance was traditional tribal law and did not violate the equal protection clause in the Act. The Tenth Circuit reversed on the merits, holding that the Pueblo's ordinance, enacted only in 1970, was not justified under the compelling interest test of the equal protection clause.

The Supreme Court, per Justice Marshall, reversed, holding that Congress did not intend to waive the sovereign immunity of Indian tribes through the enactment of the Act and further holding that the Act did not confer subject matter jurisdiction over claimed violations of the Act. The Court relied heavily on the notion that, although Congress had imposed certain constitutional limitations on Indian tribes, the federal policy in favor of tribal self-determination required that claims of alleged violations must be brought in tribal fora, such as tribal courts.

Martinez has far-reaching implications for Indian tribes. It is easily the most heavily cited Indian law case of the modern era and is one of the strongest judicial statements in favor of tribal self-determination and preservation of tribal culture. Although Martinez was undeniably an accurate statement of federal Indian law, many scholars are troubled by how it operated to legitimate sex discrimination in Indian Country. Many Indian women affected by its outcome have defended the decision, arguing that real change must come from within, not from Congress or the federal courts.

MATTHEW L. M. FLETCHER

References and Further Reading

- MacKinnon, Catharine A. "Whose Culture? A Case Note on Martinez v. Santa Clara Pueblo." In Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1987, pp. 63–69.
- Swentzell, Rina, Testimony of a Santa Clara Woman, Kansas Journal of Law & Public Policy 1 (2004): 14: 97–102.
- Valencia-Weber, Gloria. Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez: Twenty-five Years of Disparate Cultural Visions, Kansas Journal of Law & Public Policy 1 (2004): 14: 49–66.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Indian Civil Rights Act, 25 U.S.C. §§ 1301–1303
- Santa Clara Pueblo v. Martinez*, 436 U.S. 49 (1978)
- See also Indian Bill of Rights; MacKinnon, Catharine; Marshall, Thurgood

SANTA FE INDEPENDENT SCHOOL DISTRICT v. DOE, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)

Santa Fe Independent School District is an important case on the controversial subject of prayer in public schools. In it the Supreme Court reiterated that any state-promoted prayer in public schools is unconstitutional, even in arguably less intrusive settings. At the same time the Court clarified that truly voluntary student prayer in schools is constitutionally permissible.

Santa Fe involved a challenge to a school district policy governing prayer at football games. The policy, which was enacted as an attempt to shift the decision on whether to have a prayer from school administrators to students, provided for a bifurcated student election on prayer. Students would first vote by secret ballot on whether to have a prayer at games, and if the students chose to have a prayer, a second election was held to elect a student to pray. Pursuant to this policy the students elected to have a prayer at games and chose a student to say the prayer.

The Supreme Court, in a six-to-three decision, held the policy violated the Establishment Clause, primarily applying a two-part coercion analysis previously developed in Lee v. Weisman (1992). That test first examines whether the prayer can be attributed to the state, and second examines whether it results in substantial coercion of nonadherents. The Court found both prongs met.

The Court's analysis began with an extended discussion of why the prayers in question were not merely private student speech but were the result of significant state involvement. It rejected the school district's primary argument that having the students decide whether to pray acted as a "circuit breaker" that cut off any state involvement. It noted that even posing the question promoted prayer, because it initiated a process that in all likelihood would result in a decision to pray. In addition, the setting in which the pregame prayer was delivered, including being part of a school-sponsored function and use of the school's public address system, fostered perceptions of the state's involvement. The Court concluded that an "objective observer" would perceive the prayer as approved by the school.

After establishing that the pregame prayer was attributable to the government and not merely private student speech, the Court explained why it was coercive and therefore unconstitutional. It rejected the school's argument that football games were voluntary and therefore lacked state coercion, noting that many students, such as players, band members, and cheerleaders, were required to attend the games. More importantly, the Court noted the important role played by extracurricular activities in high school, which creates a strong desire to participate and even social pressure to be involved. The Court stated that the state cannot take advantage of this pressure to coerce those in attendance to participate in a religious exercise.

The Court concluded its opinion by giving two additional reasons why the prayer policy was invalid. First, the Court stated the clear purpose of the policy was to promote prayer, which violated the establishment clause requirement that government acts have a secular purpose. Both the terms of the policy and the history leading to its adoption left no doubt that the school district was endorsing the practice of prayer. Second, the Court said the policy was also invalid because the election process permitted a majoritarian view to be imposed on religious minorities.

The Court's decision in Santa Fe fits within the Court's previous establishment clause jurisprudence, but is important in several respects. First, it made clear that simply turning over to students the final decision on whether to pray at school functions does not negate broader concerns about state involvement. Second, the Court clarified that coercion concerns are not limited to mandatory or de facto mandatory activities, such as graduations, but also apply to activities of a more voluntary nature that can be viewed as a part of ordinary student life. Perhaps most important, Santa Fe affirmed that the state has no business promoting prayer in public schools and any attempt to do so will be unconstitutional. That message is not new, but Santa Fe illustrates just how far the principle applies, extending it to even more subtle forms of state promotion.

At the same time, the Court drew a distinction in its analysis between state-promoted prayer, which is unconstitutional, and voluntary student prayer, which is not only permitted but is protected speech. The Court came back to this distinction several times in its analysis, emphasizing that its decision was not meant to prohibit “any public school student from voluntarily praying at any time before, during, or after the schoolday.” This distinction between voluntary student prayer on the one hand and state-sponsored prayer on the other is the central consideration in analyzing school prayer cases and best balances the competing constitutional concerns that are present.

MARK W. CORDES

References and Further Reading

Cordes, Mark W., Prayer in Public Schools after Santa Fe Independent School District, Kentucky Law Journal 90 (2001–2002): 1–73.
Smith, Rodney K. Public Prayer and the Constitution. Wilmington: Scholarly Resources, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Lee v. Weisman, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)

See also Bible Readings in Public Schools; Establishment Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence; Prayer in Public Schools; Secular Purpose

SANTOBELLO v. NEW YORK, 404 U.S. 257 (1971)

A prosecutor must honor promises made in connection with a plea bargain. In Santobello v. New York, the United States Supreme Court protected defendants who plead guilty by requiring prosecutors to fulfill their promises.

Defendant Santobello pled guilty in exchange for concessions by the prosecutor. In addition to reducing the charge, the prosecutor promised to refrain from recommending a sentence to the court. A prosecutor newly assigned to the case at sentencing and unaware of the prior promise urged the court to impose the maximum sentence.

Without citing the due process clause or any other constitutional provision, the Supreme Court vacated the conviction and sentence to “safeguard” the defendant. Plea bargaining, the Court said, is not inherently wrong. On the contrary, it is essential. But when a defendant’s plea rests in significant part on a promise by the prosecutor, that promise must be performed. The Court clarified in a later decision, Mabry v. Johnson, that the defendant’s guilty plea must be made in actual reliance on the promise in the plea agreement.

If the prosecutor breaks a promise not to recommend a sentence, then the sentencing judge’s statement that he was not influenced by the prosecutor’s recommendation does not make the error harmless. Instead, the remedy is for the trial court either to require specific performance of the promise and resentencing by a different judge or allow the defendant to withdraw his guilty plea and proceed to trial on the original charges.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

Cases and Statutes Cited

Mabry v. Johnson, 467 U.S. 504 (1984)

See also Due Process; Guilty Plea; Plea Bargaining

SATIRE AND PARODY AND THE FIRST AMENDMENT

The relationship between satire, parody, and the First Amendment involves two different legal issues. First, can someone publicly attacked in a parody or satire silence the critic? Second, if the attack gains force by mimicking a well-known work, can the work’s copyright holder silence the mimic?

The short answer to the first question is no, at least if the person attacked is a public figure. The leading case concerns a series of advertisements for Campari Liqueur in the format of interviews with famous persons about their “first times.” While raising sexual inferences, the pieces described only the celebrities’ first time drinking Campari. Jerry Falwell is a nationally known minister and spokesperson for the so-called “Moral Majority.” Hustler Magazine is a nationally circulated publication with content leaning strongly toward the sexually explicit. Labeling the item “ad parody—not to be taken seriously,” Hustler Magazine used the format of Campari’s first-time series for a piece in which Falwell allegedly described his “first time” as being an incestuous encounter with his mother in an outhouse. Falwell sued Hustler and obtained a judgment for $150,000 on the state tort claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress. The elements of this tort are (1) intentional or reckless conduct by the defendant, (2) which offends generally accepted standards of decency, and (3) causes severe emotional distress to the plaintiff. The United States Supreme Court reversed, Hustler Magazine v. Falwell. While accepting the legitimacy of the tort, the Court held that it could not be used to silence “[t]he sort of robust political debate encouraged by the First Amendment,” including the caustic work of “political cartoonists and satirists.”

Turning to the second issue, American copyright law has always had an exception called “fair use.” This doctrine was first stated clearly in a case involving George Washington’s papers, Folsom v. Marsh. Without the fair use doctrine, copyright would be a government grant allowing an abridgment of free speech in violation of the First Amendment, Harper & Row Publishers v. Nation; Eldred v. Ashcroft. The current fair use doctrine is codified at Section 107, Title 17 of the United States Code and requires courts to consider multiple factors including:

- (1) the purpose and character of the use, including whether such use is of a commercial nature or is for nonprofit educational purposes; and
- (2) the effect of the use upon the potential market for or value of the copyrighted work.

The first factor includes whether the second author is creating something beneficial to the public but which the first author is unlikely to allow, even if paid, for example, something criticizing or laughing at the first author’s work. The Supreme Court clarified this doctrine in 1994, Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music. The rap group Two Live Crew recorded “Pretty Woman,” a raunchy take-off of the sentimental love song, “Oh, Pretty Woman” by Roy Orbison and William Dees. Despite being offered payment and credit, the copyright holder refused to give Two Live Crew permission. The Supreme Court said that the first fair use factor would be met if the Two Live Crew version was a parody, but not if it was a satire. The difference is that a parody makes fun of the underlying work, so it must reuse that work to exist. A satire laughs at society in general; therefore, it can exist without reusing someone else’s copyrighted work. The Court also clarified that parody (which helps the defendant) is more important in factor one than being a commercial use (which hurts the defendant). In addition, the Court said that factor four should not include the value of any works the copyright holder would not be inclined to allow, such as other parodies.

The parody/satire distinction has a chilling effect on free speech, because no one can be sure in advance how a court will decide. For example, a book about the O. J. Simpson trial using rhymes reminiscent of Dr. Seuss’ “The Cat in the Hat” was not a parody, Dr. Seuss v. Penguin Books. A novel telling the story of “Gone with the Wind” from the point of view of a slave was a parody, Suntrust Bank v. Houghton Mifflin. A series of photographs showing Barbie® dolls in suggestive poses with kitchen equipment was a parody, Mattel v. Walking Mountain Productions. Some of the pictures are posted at http://creativecommons.org/fc_1.htm.

If Campari Liqueur had sued Hustler Magazine for copyright infringement for its attack on Falwell, the fair use defense may not have protected Hustler.

MALLA POLLACK

References and Further Reading

- Kaplan, Benjamin. An Unhurried View of Copyright. New York: Columbia University Press, 1967.
- O’Neil, Robert M. The First Amendment and Civil Liability. Indiana University Press, 2001.
- Patry, William F. The Fair Use Privilege in Copyright Law. BNA, 1985.
- U.S. Copyright Office. In Answer to Your Query: Fair Use. (GPO 2004), available at <http://www.copyright.gov/fls/fl102.pdf>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Campbell v. Acuff-Rose Music, Inc.*, 510 U.S. 569 (1994)
- Dr. Seuss Enterprises, L.P. v. Penguin Books U.S.A., Inc.*, 109 F.3d 1394 (9th Cir. 1997)
- Eldred v. Ashcroft*, 537 U.S. 186 (2001)
- Folsom v. Marsh*, 9 F. Cas. 342 (No. 4,901) (CCD Mass. 1841)
- Harper & Row Publishers, Inc. v. Nation Enterprises*, 471 U.S. 539 (1985)
- Hustler Magazine v. Falwell*, 485 U.S. 46 (1988)
- Mattel Inc. v. Walking Mountain Productions*, 353 F.3d 792 (9th Cir. 2003)
- Sun Trust Bank v. Houghton Mifflin Co.*, 268 F.3d 1257 (11th Cir. 2001)
- See also Eldred v. Ashcroft, 537 U.S. 186 (2001); Fair Use Doctrine and First Amendment; Falwell, Jerry; First Amendment and PACs; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Hustler Magazine v. Falwell, 485 U.S. 46 (1988); Intellectual Property and the First Amendment

SAXBE v. WASHINGTON POST, 417 U.S. 817 (1974)

In Saxbe v. Washington Post, 417 U.S. 817 (1974) and Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 843 (1974), a five-to-four majority of the Supreme Court allowed Federal and California prison officials to ban all press interviews with specific individual inmates. Writing for the majority, Justice Potter Stewart ruled that because the members of the general public were not entitled to speak to specific inmates, neither could members of the press, citing Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972) for the proposition that journalists have no rights greater than the general public. He stressed that journalists were accorded substantial access in other ways to both the federal and California prisons to report on conditions.

The Court also relied on representations by prison officials that press attention might be concentrated on certain individuals. These inmates thereby became “big wheels,” acquiring great influence among prisoners and creating serious security problems.

Justice Powell wrote for the dissenters. While agreeing that the press had no constitutional rights superior to those of ordinary citizens, he argued that the First Amendment was intended to preserve free and informed public discussion of such vital governmental affairs as the condition and administration of prisons. Because the press served as agent for the general public, the blanket ban constituted an unconstitutional infringement of the public’s right to receive information and ideas. Problems with specific “big wheel” inmates could be handled on an individual basis.

A six-to-three majority of the Court, including Justice Powell, also ruled in Pell that inmates had no constitutional right to be interviewed.

HERMAN SCHWARTZ

References and Further Reading

Schwartz, Herman, ed. The Burger Years. Viking Press, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)
Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 843 (1974)

See also Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972); Pell v. Procunier, 417 U.S. 843 (1974)

SCALES v. UNITED STATES, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)

In Scales v. United States, the Court, in an opinion by Justice Harlan, affirmed a conviction for membership in the Communist Party under the Smith Act. The Court still turns to Scales to resolve issues of membership and free speech or association. Because the Act treaded “so closely upon protected rights,” the Court narrowly construed it to apply only to active membership accompanied by knowledge of the Party’s unlawful objectives and a specific intent to further those objectives. As so limited, prosecution did not impose vicarious guilt inconsistent with due process under the Fifth Amendment, nor did it violate free speech or association under the First Amendment. The Court followed precedents upholding prosecutions for advocacy of the overthrow of the government by force or violence. Chief Justice Warren and Justices Black, Douglas, and Brennan dissented. Black vigorously argued that the Court lacked power to rewrite a vague statute to impose limitations not enacted by Congress, and a prosecution under such a rewritten statute was ex post facto; he also reiterated his long-standing objection to balancing free speech and association against other interests. Accordingly, the prosecution was unconstitutional, because it suppressed belief and advocacy, not unlawful conduct. Douglas canvassed the history of writings on free speech and association; he, too, argued that the prosecution was an unconstitutional suppression of belief and advocacy. Brennan dissented for himself the Chief Justice and Justices Black and Douglas on statutory grounds. The Scales’ standards remain good law.

G. ROBERT BLAKEY

References and Further Reading

Chafee, Zecharia Jr. Freedom of Speech. 1st Ed. 1920.
 de Secondat Montesquieu, Charles. 1 Spirit of the Laws. 1949, pp. 192–193.
 Gellhorn, Walter. American Rights: The Constitution in Action. 1960, pp. 82–83.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1956)
 Smith Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2385

SCALIA, ANTONIN (1936–)

Antonin Scalia was appointed an Associate Justice of the Supreme Court in 1986 by President Reagan and in the years since has become the nation’s most powerful voice for the view that the Constitution should be interpreted as originally understood at the time of enactment. Justice Scalia has earned a reputation as a brilliant thinker, but his caustic lectures on constitutional theory often appear in dissent as his colleagues apply an ever-changing interpretation of the Constitution to adapt the document to modern society. Justice Scalia's talent for turning a phrase in his opinions is rivaled only by that of Chief Justice Marshall, Justice Holmes, and Justice Jackson, but Justice Scalia's quips are often personally directed at his colleagues, demonstrating his impatience with what he perceives as their lawmaking-concealed-as-constitutional interpretation.

Antonin Scalia was born March 11, 1936, in Trenton, New Jersey. For most of his youth he lived in Queens, New York, where he moved to at age five. After studying at Georgetown University and the University of Fribourg (Switzerland), he enrolled in the Harvard Law School, graduating there in 1960 having been an editor of the Harvard Law Review. After completing his schooling, Justice Scalia practiced law in Cleveland, Ohio, and then became a law professor, specializing in administrative law. In 1971, Justice Scalia entered government service as general counsel of the Office of Telecommunications Policy. He subsequently became chairman of the Administrative Conference of the United States and Assistant Attorney General for the Office of Legal Counsel. In 1982, President Reagan nominated Scalia to serve on the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit. He served in that position until 1986, when Reagan selected him for the position of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, filling the seat of William Rehnquist, whom Reagan elevated to Chief Justice to replace Warren Burger.

Justice Scalia's opinions reflect an abiding distrust of the capacity of judges to construct public policy; he believes the Constitution leaves choices of policy to the state and federal representatives elected for that purpose. Accordingly, where the Constitution does not directly address a claimed right, Justice Scalia is unlikely to find that the Constitution protects it. Notably, Justice Scalia would read the Constitution as not addressing issues of abortion rights, sexual privacy, or assisted suicide and has used some of his most strident rhetoric against the views of those of his colleagues who would assume the power to make these policy decisions. (See, for example, Planned Parenthood v. Casey; Stenberg v. Carhart; Lawrence v. Texas; Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dep't of Health.) In each instance, Justice Scalia has pointed to years of history that have accepted restrictions on the "right" as informing the meaning of the Constitution. That is, because restrictions on abortion, suicide, and so on have not been thought to be unconstitutional until recently, the Constitution does not authorize or require him to invalidate those restrictions now.

Applying his view that the original understanding of the Constitution is informed by historical practice,

Justice Scalia has pointed to the national government's frequent involvement with religion since 1791 and has been reluctant to find violations of the Establishment Clause when the government in some way expresses particular respect for religion. Sometimes his position has commanded a majority of the Court, as in some cases where the Court has allowed funding of nonreligious activities at religious locations. (See, for example, Zelman v. Simmons-Harris; Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District, 509 U.S. 1 [1993].) Other times he has not been so successful. He would allow public prayer at graduations and other public events, concluding that such exercises do not coerce nonbelievers to participate. Other members of the Court disagreed, however, and have held that such exercises can convey a message that only persons of a preferred faith are fully welcome in the political community (Lee v. Weisman; Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe). Responding to the majority of the Court's suggestion that graduation prayers were indeed coercive, Justice Scalia mocked their reasoning, calling it "psychology practiced by amateurs."

In contrast to the establishment clause, where Justice Scalia has found himself as often as not protesting from the sidelines, the free exercise clause was revolutionized by one of Justice Scalia's majority opinions, Employment Division, Oregon Department of Human Resources v. Smith. In that case, Justice Scalia held that a state need not make exceptions to "neutral laws of general applicability" for violators who were religiously motivated. In Smith, for example, Justice Scalia held that Oregon could punish an American Indian for ingesting peyote, a hallucinogenic drug, even when the individual took the drug as part of a religious ceremony. The policy against drug use was "neutral" and "generally applicable" in that it prohibited everyone from ingesting the drug—not just those who used it as part of a religious exercise. As a result, Oregon did not need to make any exception for Mr. Smith. Because of the Smith decision, states may exempt religious worshippers from some restrictions, but they are not forced to do so, as long as the restriction has not singled out religious worship and treated it worse than comparable secular actions.

Where a right does appear in the Constitution, however, Justice Scalia enforces the right, often with vigorous rhetoric, against legislative majorities. Particularly noteworthy in this regard is Justice Scalia's solicitude for certain rights of criminal defendants. Although certainly not a liberal in criminal cases, he sided with the defendant in only 25.3 percent of criminal procedure cases through the 2001 term. According to The Supreme Court Compendium, Justice Scalia has not hesitated to write strong opinions protecting the rights of those accused of crimes when the claimed rights are reflected in Anglo-American legal history and the text of the Constitution. As examples, the Justice has been at the forefront of the recent controversy in which the Court has held by five-to-four margins that the accused has the right to have a jury—rather than a judge—find every fact that determines the sentence to which he will be subject (United States v. Booker; Blakely v. Washington). In addition, Justice Scalia has protected criminal defendants' right to confront the witnesses against them, even as a majority of the Court was willing to make an exception to allow child abuse victims to testify by closed-circuit television (Maryland v. Craig). He has also written opinions protecting Fourth Amendment rights, although only so far as those rights find support in analogous historical practice. Compare, for example, his opinions in Kyllo v. United States (protecting the right against warrantless searches of the home); Arizona v. Hicks (same); and Thornton v. United States (opining that the Court should rethink its decisions allowing the police to search vehicles without probable cause after the suspects have been removed), with California v. Acevedo (arguing that the government should be able to make warrantless searches of personal effects carried in public) and California v. Hodari D. (holding that a suspect is not "seized" within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment until he is physically restrained or submits to authority).

Justice Scalia has also been open to claims based on the Free Speech Clause of the First Amendment, although the original understanding of the clause seems much less protective of speech than are many of the Justice's opinions. He has embraced doctrine forbidding the government from punishing speech with which it disagrees, as illustrated by his joining the majority in Texas v. Johnson, which reversed the conviction of a protestor who burned the American flag. He also supports free-speech rights in the area of campaign finance, causing him to dissent in a series of cases upholding campaign finance regulation, culminating in McConnell v. Federal Election Commission. On the other hand, Justice Scalia is occasionally accepting of government actions that burden speech if he can point to a tradition accepting such deprivations, as he has with regard to patronage-based personnel decisions, where the officials in power would reward supporters with jobs formerly held by political opponents (O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake; Rutan v. Republican Party). Although successive Supreme Court majorities have condemned discrimination on grounds of political affiliation in hiring, firing, and contracting decisions by state and local governments as inconsistent with the First Amendment, Justice Scalia would uphold it, because it has been practiced for centuries, apparently only recently being considered by many to be a constitutional violation.

In cases interpreting statutes, Justice Scalia is a "textualist." He interprets the statute based primarily on what the statute says (read in its context, to be sure), rejecting legislative history as an unreliable indicator of what the statute means. In Justice Scalia's view, legislative history—materials such as debates and committee reports—is often unread by the legislators themselves and in any event may represent only a minority position among those legislators who voted for the law. Justice Scalia points out that only the law as passed by Congress and signed by the president is law, and concludes from this that courts should rely on the text of statutes to discover statutory meaning.

Throughout his jurisprudence, Justice Scalia has sought to limit the discretion of courts. He wishes to limit judges to the text of statutes and the original understanding of constitutional provisions, so that they do not overreach into policymaking. Justice Scalia's distrust of the judiciary is evident most directly in his support for doctrines that prevent the courts hearing cases at all. In cases such as Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, he has championed the renaissance of the "standing" requirement, under which courts will not hear a case unless it is brought by a person who is personally harmed by the action he seeks remedied. He has also supported a vigorous use of the "political question" doctrine, according to which a court will not hear a case if there are no judicially manageable standards for deciding it (Vieth v. Jubelirer). In other words, if courts cannot create a remedy for a violation of law, then they have no business hearing the case.

If courts cannot hear cases under these theories, the result is that the executive has more discretion to act, because the judiciary will not be watching over his shoulder. And giving more power to the executive is something Justice Scalia has found very appealing. Most famously, he dissented when the rest of the Court upheld the constitutionality of the so-called independent counsel, whose job it was to investigate and, if appropriate, prosecute violations of the law by executive officials. Justice Scalia thought the independent counsel was an unconstitutional interference with the president's ability to execute the laws (Morrison v. Olson). Justice Scalia also dissented when the Court struck down the Line-Item Veto Act, which would have permitted the president to cancel certain items of spending from the budget, without having to obtain Congress's approval.

Through his tireless advocacy for originalism and textualism, Justice Scalia has been an incredibly influential force on American law. Judges and litigators now take arguments based on text and original understanding seriously, even in those areas where Justice Scalia is predictably in dissent. Only time will tell whether the justice will ultimately triumph in advancing his ideal of a Constitution whose principles are static and enduring.

MICHAEL DIMINO

References and Further Reading

- Brisbin, Richard A. Justice Antonin Scalia and the Conservative Revival. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1997.
- Farber, Daniel A., and Susanna Sherry. Desperately Seeking Certainty: The Misguided Quest for Constitutional Foundations. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2002, pp. 29–54.
- Leahy, James E. Supreme Court Justices Who Voted with the Government. Jefferson, NC: McFarland, 1999.
- Ring, Kevin A., ed. Scalia Dissents: Writings of the Supreme Court's Wittiest, Most Outspoken Justice. Washington, D.C.: Regnery, 2004.
- Rossum, Ralph A. "Text and Tradition: The Originalist Jurisprudence of Antonin Scalia," in Earl M. Maltz, ed., Rehnquist Justice: Understanding the Court Dynamic. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2003, pp. 34–69.
- Scalia, Antonin, The Doctrine of Standing as an Essential Element of the Separation of Powers, Suffolk University Law Review 17 (1983): 881–899.
- , Judicial Deference to Administrative Interpretations of Law, Duke Law Journal (1989): 511–521.
- , A Matter of Interpretation: Federal Courts and the Law. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press, 1997.
- , Originalism: The Lesser Evil, University of Cincinnati Law Review 57 (1989): 849–865.
- , The Rule of Law as a Law of Rules, University of Chicago Law Review 56 (1989): 1175–1188.
- Smith, Christopher E. Justice Antonin Scalia and the Supreme Court's Conservative Moment. Westport, Conn.: Praeger, 1993.
- Smith, Christopher E., and David A. Schultz. The Jurisprudential Vision of Justice Antonin Scalia. Lanham, Md.: Rowman and Littlefield, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Arizona v. Hicks*, 480 U.S. 321 (1987)
- Blakely v. Washington*, 542 U.S. ___, 124 S. Ct. 2531 (2004)
- California v. Acevedo*, 500 U.S. 565 (1991)
- California v. Hodari D.*, 499 U.S. 621 (1991)
- Clinton v. City of New York*, 524 U.S. 417 (1998)
- Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dep't of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- Employment Division, Oregon Department of Human Resources v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Kyllo v. United States*, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 588 (2003)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife*, 504 U.S. 555 (1992)
- Maryland v. Craig*, 497 U.S. 836, 860–70 (1990)

- McConnell v. Federal Election Commission*, 540 U.S. 93 (2003)
- Morrison v. Olson*, 487 U.S. 654 (1988)
- O'Hare Truck Service v. City of Northlake*, 518 U.S. 712 (1996)
- Planned Parenthood v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Rutan v. Republican Party*, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)
- Santa Fe Independent School District v. Doe*, 530 U.S. 290 (2000)
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
- Texas v. Johnson*, 491 U.S. 397 (1989)
- Thornton v. United States*, 541 U.S. 615 (2004)
- United States v. Booker*, 125 S. Ct. 738 (2005)
- Vieth v. Jubelirer*, 541 U.S. 267 (2004)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District*, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)

SCHAD v. BOROUGH OF MOUNT EPHRAIM, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)

Mount Ephraim's zoning ordinance prohibited all commercial uses except those specifically listed in the ordinance; one of these omitted uses was live entertainment including the commercial production of plays, musicals, and so forth, as well as nude dancing. Schad and his associates operated an adult bookstore and had an amusement license for coin-operated booths where patrons could watch films. When they added a booth for live and usually nude dancing, they were convicted and fined for violating the borough's zoning ordinance. The lower court relied on Stevens' majority opinion in Young v. American Mini-Theatres, Inc. (1976) that the "mere fact that the commercial exploitation of material protected by the First Amendment is subject to zoning and other licensing requirements is not sufficient reason for invalidating these ordinances." New Jersey's appellate courts upheld the convictions.

The Supreme Court voting seven to two reversed the convictions. White wrote the majority opinion. Brennan, Stewart, Marshall, Blackmun, and Powell joined White's opinion. Powell, joined by Stewart, wrote a concurring opinion. Stevens concurred with the judgment. Burger, joined by Rehnquist, dissented.

Because Mount Ephraim's zoning ordinance infringed on protected liberties, a higher standard of scrutiny or strict scrutiny is called for compared with when zoning only affects property interests. Thus, the law must be narrowly drawn and further a substantial government interest. Contrary to the lower courts' position, Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc. (1976) does not control this case, White declares, for three reasons. First, Detroit's ordinance restricted only the location of adult theatres and imposed minimal burdens on protected speech. Second, the restrictions did not affect the total number of adult theatres nor were they banned from the city. Third, the city provided evidence of the secondary effects of concentrations of adult theatres or bookstores. Mount Ephraim's ordinance, in contrast, fails on all three grounds.

The ordinance thus suffers from being overly broad; it bans all live entertainment, violating the strictures of the Court's overbreadth doctrine. Moreover, the borough's secondary effects argument is not internally consistent, because it does not show whether or how live nude dancing would produce more severe social problems than the films already being shown in the same establishment. Finally, its argument that the ordinance imposes reasonable time, place, and manner restrictions also falters. The borough did not explain why live entertainment would be "basically incompatible" with normal activities in a commercial zone; the initial question when determining the validity of time, place, and manner restrictions.

Blackmun writes in concurrence to emphasize that the customary presumption of validity granted zoning ordinances "carries little, if any, weight" where a zoning ordinance "trenches on rights of expression." Burger, in dissent, however, takes the position that an "overconcern about draftsmanship and overbreadth should not be allowed to obscure the central question" before the Court: the citizens of Mount Ephraim "meant only to preserve the basic character of their community."

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Schad v. Borough of Mount Ephraim*, 452 U.S. 61 (1981)
- Young v. American Mini Theatres, Inc.*, 427 U.S. 50 (1976)

SCHALL v. MARTIN, 467 U.S. 253 (1984)

In Schall v. Martin, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a New York statute allowing pretrial detention of juveniles presenting a "serious risk" that they may commit another crime before trial. Martin, a fourteen-year-old boy charged with robbery, assault, and weapons possession, was held pending trial because the court believed he might commit additional offenses in the interim. In essence, the court assumed that Martin was probably guilty.

Martin argued the law violated the U.S. Constitution's due process clause, because it authorized punishment without trial. He also noted that most children subject to preventive detention either had their charges dismissed or were released immediately on being found guilty.

The Court rejected Martin's claims, holding that preventive detention was not punishment. It held that such detentions were an appropriate component of a flexible juvenile justice policy. The Court stressed that states had wide latitude to craft policies protecting such children from themselves.

The decision was notable because it was the first time that the Court explicitly authorized "preventive detention"—the policy of denying a criminal defendant bail for the purpose of preventing future crime, rather than ensuring his or her presence in court. Although the decision itself was not radical—child detention was widely seen as appropriate in cases of poor parental supervision—the Court's analysis opened the door to the more expansive authorization of preventive detention for adults in United States v. Salerno, 481 U.S. 739 (1987).

DANIEL M. FILLER

Cases and Statutes Cited

- United States v. Salerno*, 481 U.S. 739 (1987)

SCHENCK v. UNITED STATES, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)

In 1917, Charles Schenck, General Secretary of the Socialist Party, was indicted for conspiring to violate the Espionage Act of 1917. The Espionage Act made it a federal crime to conspire to "cause or attempt to cause insubordination" in U.S. military or naval forces or to obstruct military recruiting when the country was at war, as it was in 1917; the United States entered World War I in April of 1917. The charge against Schenck was based on his having had circulars sent to men who had been drafted or were eligible for the draft; the Selective Service Act of 1917 had authorized drafting male citizens who were between twenty-one and thirty. The Socialist Party opposed the war and the draft and ordered the distribution of a circular encouraging opposition to both; Schenck had the circulars printed and sent out. The circulars claimed the draft was unconstitutional and the war was a capitalist plot and encouraged citizens to sign a petition to repeal the Selective Service Act. In a jury trial, Schenck was convicted; he appealed, arguing that the Espionage Act violated the First Amendment's guarantee of free speech.

Justice Holmes wrote the Supreme Court's opinion, which upheld Schenck's conviction. He began by noting that "the character of every act depends upon the circumstances in which it is done The most stringent protection of free speech would not protect a man in falsely shouting fire in a theatre and causing a panic." Holmes said the issue was whether the content of the circulars was "of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." He explained that when a country is at war "things that might be said in time of peace are such a hindrance to its effort that their utterance will not be endured." As to the case at hand, Schenck had apparently conceded that he could have been convicted of violating the Act if the circulars had actually interfered with the draft. Holmes concluded, therefore, that because Schenck could have been convicted if the circulars had actually obstructed the draft, he could be convicted of conspiring to achieve such results: "[W]e perceive no ground for saying that success alone warrants making the act a crime."

Instead of focusing on the content of the circulars, Holmes used the concept of "speech as attempt" to uphold the conviction. In some instances, the content of speech is criminalized; at common law, for example, seditious libel was a crime. Seditious libel is speech that defames the government and brings it into disrepute; the crime is attacking the government and it is complete as soon as the seditious words have been published. Seditious libel punishes what someone says, not what they do. In Schenck, Holmes focused not on the content of the circulars, as such, but on what they sought to achieve.

Criminal law recognizes two types of crimes: inchoate crimes and substantive crimes. A substantive crime is a "true," completed crime; substantive crimes target acts that result in the infliction of some kind of "harm." So if Schenck's circulars had actually obstructed the draft in Philadelphia, that would have been a substantive crime under the Espionage Act; the "harm" would have been interfering with the draft, which was needed for national security. Inchoate crimes, on the other hand, are incomplete; they target conduct that is intended to result in the commission of a substantive crime but does not, either because it is interrupted or because it fails. Attempt is an inchoate crime, as is conspiracy. The theory is that having inchoate crimes lets law enforcement stop would-be offenders before they commit substantive crimes. So if a husband puts poison in his wife's food, he can be arrested and prosecuting for attempting to kill her even though she did not eat the food.

In Schenck, Holmes treated speech (the circulars) as an attempt to commit a crime; the Espionage Act made it a crime to conspire either to obstruct the draft or to attempt to obstruct the draft. According to his analysis, by conspiring with others to encourage resistance to the draft, Schenck conspired to attempt to obstruct the draft. Had his efforts succeeded, Schenck could have been convicted of conspiring to commit the substantive crime, that is, of conspiring to obstruct the draft. Because they failed, it was reasonable to hold him liable for conspiring to attempt to obstruct the draft; his conviction, therefore, rested not on the content of the circulars but on what they sought to achieve.

Fifty years later, in Brandenburg v. Ohio, the Supreme Court adopted a version of Holmes' "clear and present danger" test. Brandenburg, a Ku Klux Klan leader, was convicted of violating a statute that made it a crime to advocate "unlawful methods" as "a means of accomplishing . . . political reform." The conviction was based on comments he made at a Klan rally; the comments advocated violent action against African Americans and Jews. The Court held that the statute violated the First Amendment because it criminalized the content of speech—"mere advocacy." According to the Brandenburg Court, "advocacy" cannot be criminalized unless it "is directed to inciting or producing imminent lawless action and is likely to incite or produce such action." Brandenburg is based on the same premise as Holmes' test but is more protective of speech because it demands a closer connection between speech and unlawful action. To establish incitement under Brandenburg, the government must prove that the defendant explicitly advocated immediate unlawful conduct that was likely to occur.

SUSAN W. BRENNER

References and Further Reading

Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969).
Greenawalt, Kent. Fighting Words. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1996.
Lewis, Anthony. Make No Law: The Sullivan Case and the First Amendment. New York: Random House, 1991.

See also Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Acts; Bill of Rights: Structure; Brandenburg Incitement Test; Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969);

Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Freedom of Speech and Press under the Constitution: Early History (1791–1917); Freedom of Speech Exclusions; Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Freedom of the Press: Modern Period (1917–Present); Incitement to Violence and Free Speech; Ku Klux Klan; Philosophy and Theory of Freedom of Expression; Seditious Libel; Self-Fulfillment Theory of Free Speech; Speech versus Conduct Distinction; Theories of Free Speech Protection; World War I, Civil Liberties in

SCHLAFLY, PHILLIS STEWART

Phyllis Stewart Schlafly, noted author, lecturer, attorney, and political and social activist, was born in St. Louis, Missouri. Raised a Roman Catholic, she graduated Phi Beta Kappa from Washington University in 1944 while working nights at a munitions factory to support her studies. On a scholarship, Schlafly received a master's degree from Radcliffe in 1945. After graduation, Schlafly worked as a researcher in Washington, D.C., and ran a successful congressional campaign for an Illinois Republican in 1946. In 1949, she married Fred Schlafly and embarked on what she has called the most important profession of her life, being a wife and mother to her six children.

While caring for her family, Schlafly continued her involvement in social and political matters. She wrote, lectured, and organized on behalf of issues that were of import to her, including politics, women's rights, national defense, education, family, and child care. In 1964, Schlafly published A Choice Not an Echo, chronicling the history of Republican presidential nominations, which many argue led to the nomination of presidential candidate Barry Goldwater. In addition to running for Congress twice, Schlafly began to publish the Phyllis Schlafly Report in 1967, a monthly conservative newsletter. In 1972, she founded the Eagle Forum, a conservative organization committed to influencing public policy and supporting limited government, capitalism, the right to life, traditional marriage, and the Second Amendment.

Schlafly gained greater prominence after Congress passed the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) in 1972. Supporters of the ERA contended that an amendment to the constitution was needed to create true social, economic, political, and legal equality between the sexes. Motivated by what she believed were attacks on women and their role in the traditional family by radical feminists, Schlafly took up the fight against the ERA. Recognizing that the ERA had garnered national support, Schlafly organized a grassroots, state-to-state campaign to block ratification of the amendment. In 1972, Schlafly founded the National Committee to Stop ERA, which promoted a pro-family, pro-life viewpoint. Schlafly tapped the resources of housewives, mothers, and nonfeminist career women who were not represented in the radical feminist agenda. With her well-organized forces, Schlafly argued in part that the ERA would destroy the traditional role of women and its benefits. She contended that the ERA would force eighteen-year-old women into the draft and wives and mother's into the workforce, thus compelling mother's to leave their children in daycare. Schlafly argued that the biological differences between men and women created natural roles for the sexes that should be embraced and honored. In 1978, in the midst of her battle against the ERA, Schlafly graduated from Washington University Law School. Schlafly's efforts proved successful. By 1982, the deadline for ratification, the Equal Rights Amendment failed to pass in all thirty-eight states needed for ratification.

To this day, Schlafly remains a political and social activist. As president of the Eagle Forum, Schlafly works tirelessly to promote a conservative agenda, still publishing the Phyllis Schlafly Report. She has testified before Congress and state legislatures numerous times, and she frequently lectures and debates on television and radio and at various political and social events.

MARY K. MANKUS

References and Further Reading

- Felsenthal, Carol. The Biography of Phyllis Schlafly: The Sweetheart of the Silent Majority. Chicago: Regnery Gateway, 1981.
- Mansbridge, Jane J. Why We Lost The ERA. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1986.
- Schlafly, Phyllis. Feminist Fantasies. Dallas: Spence Publishing Company, 2003.
- . The Power of a Positive Woman. New Rochelle, New York: Arlington House Publishers, 1977.
- "Phyllis Schlafly" <http://www.eagleforum.org/misc/bio.html>, downloaded July 22, 2003.

See also Equal Rights Amendment

SCHMERBER v. CALIFORNIA, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)

In Schmerber, the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of the compelled extraction of blood sample evidence from an arrestee. While hospitalized for injuries after an automobile accident, the petitioner was arrested for driving under the influence of alcohol. The police then instructed doctors to take a blood sample from the petitioner for chemical analysis of his blood alcohol content. Petitioner objected to the withdrawal of his blood and the chemical analysis as violations of his Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, and Fourteenth Amendments rights. The Appellate Department of the California Superior Court rejected the petitioner's challenges and affirmed his conviction.

The Court (five to four) found no violation of the petitioner's Fifth Amendment privilege against compelled self-incrimination because the taking of a blood sample was neither "testimonial" nor "communicative" in nature. Rather, the Court found the blood sample evidence similar to other "real or physical evidence" such as fingerprints, photographs, and handwriting or voice exemplars. The Court further found no Fourth Amendment violation because, although the extraction of blood was a search and seizure, it was justified by the officer's probable cause to arrest the petitioner and the need to prevent the destruction of physical evidence, and the means used to extract the blood (at a hospital, by a doctor) were reasonable. In addition, the Court found that there was no due process violation; and that the Sixth Amendment right to counsel was not implicated, because there was no privilege as to which the petitioner could seek counsel's advice.

JULIE A. BAKER

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Ronald J., and Kristin M. Mace, Note, Criminal Law: The Self-Incrimination Clause Explained and Its Future Predicted, Criminal Law & Criminology 94 (2004): 243.
- Amar, Akhil Reed, and Renee B. Lettow, Fifth Amendment First Principles: The Self-Incrimination Clause, Michigan Law Review 93 (1995): 857.
- Hardy, Julie A., Note, The Admissibility of Mental State Observations Obtained during Unlawful Custodial Interrogation: Drawing the Line on the Real or Physical Evidence Distinction, B. C. Law Review 30 (1989): 1029.
- Matz, Andrew L., Note, Significant Development: The Sounds of Silence: Post-Miranda Silence and the Inference of Sanity, B.U.L. Review 65 (1985): 1025.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Breithaupt v. Abram*, 352 U.S. 432 (1957)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Mapp v. Ohio*, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Preston v. United States*, 376 U.S. 364 (1964)

See also Arrest; Due Process; DWI; Exemplars; Forced Speech; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Probable Cause; Right to Counsel (VI); Rochin v. California,

342 U.S. 165 (1952); Search (General Definition); Seizures; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution; Tennessee v. Garner, 471 U.S. 1 (1985); Warrantless Searches

SCHNECKLOTH v. BUSTAMONTE, 412 U.S. 218 (1973)

Bustamonte clarified the prosecution's burden to demonstrate that consent to a search was voluntarily given under the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. Police stopped a car for traffic violations. Bustamonte was a passenger in that car. The owner of the car as well as the driver consented to a search of the car. The police found contraband, and Bustamonte was convicted.

On appeal, Bustamonte argued that the state had to show that not only did consent to the search voluntarily but that the person knew that he had the option not to consent. The Supreme Court (six to three) held that a voluntary search was determined by the totality of the circumstances and cannot be obtained through explicit or implicit threats. The Court rejected the idea that there should be a Miranda-like warning required before a consent to search could be validly given. It would not be practical for the police to issue a warning to each person before a search. Furthermore, knowledge of a right to refuse a search is not a prerequisite of a voluntary consent. Consequently, the prosecution only had to show that the consent was voluntary and not coerced. In this case, the prosecution met the burden of voluntary consent to a search—during the search, the atmosphere was friendly, there was no discussion of any crime, and the owner as well as the driver of the car assisted the police in that search, that is, opening various compartments.

Justices Douglas, Brennan, and Marshall dissented with the premise that a verbal assent to the police was not enough because that request was backed by the "force of law."

AUDREY I-WEI HUANG

References and Further Reading

- Barrio, Adrian J., Note, Rethinking Schneckloth v. Bustamonte: Incorporating Obedience Theory into the Supreme Court's Conception of Voluntary Consent, University of Illinois Law Review 1997 (1997): 215.
- Godsey, Mark A., Rethinking the Involuntary Confession Rule: Toward a Workable Test for Identifying Compelled Self-Incrimination, California Law Review 93 (2005): 465.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Boyd v. United States*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
- Bumper v. North Carolina*, 391 U.S. 543 (1968)

Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961)

Johnson v. Zerbst, 304 U.S. 458 (1938)

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Miranda Warning; Searches (General Definition); Warrantless Searches

SCHOOL DISTRICT OF THE CITY OF GRAND RAPIDS v. BALL, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)

In Grand Rapids School District v. Ball, the Supreme Court considered whether school sponsorship of two programs violated the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Both programs provided classes to nonpublic school students at public expense in classrooms located in, and leased from, the nonpublic schools. Central to this case was the fact that of the forty-one participating nonpublic schools involved in the programs, forty were religious schools. Moreover, the students attending both programs were the same students who otherwise attended the nonpublic schools where the programs were held.

In writing for the majority, Justice Brennan wrote that one of the few absolutes of the establishment clause is the prohibition of “government-financed or government-sponsored indoctrination into the beliefs of a particular religious faith” (473 U.S. at 385). The Court applied the three-part Lemon v. Kurtzman test to evaluate the propriety of the government action. Lemon requires that the statute or government action (1) must have a secular legislative purpose, (2) its principal or primary effect must be one that neither advances nor inhibits religion, and (3) it must not foster an excessive government entanglement with religion. In this case, because there was no dispute that the purpose of the two programs was secular, the Court focused on the “effect” test. Citing Meek v. Pittenger, which held that a state program located on campus of religious school “entails an unacceptable risk” that the state-funded personnel would “advance the religious mission of the church-related schools in which they serve” (421 U.S. 349, 370 [1975]), the Court found that the challenged programs may impermissibly advance religion in three distinct ways. First, the teachers participating in the programs may become involved in intentionally or inadvertently inculcating particular religious tenets. In this case, many of the teachers participating in one of the programs were also employed full time by the religious schools so the risk was significant. There is a substantial risk that the religious message these teachers are expected to convey during their regular school day “will infuse the supposedly secular classes they teach after school” (473 U.S. at 387). “The conflict of functions inheres in the situation” Id. (citing Lemon, 403 U.S. at 617). In the second challenged program, where the teachers were primarily hired by public schools, the risk remained that programs operating in this religious environment would be used for religious educational purposes.

Second, the programs may provide a “crucial symbolic link between government and religion,” suggesting that government supports the religious denomination operating the school. The concern is heightened when, as in this case, the children are of “tender” age because they are more likely to be influenced by this symbolic link. The presence of a “public school” sign in the classrooms was not sufficient to remove this symbolic link. “[E]ven the student who notices the ‘public school’ sign temporarily posted would have before him a powerful symbol of state endorsement and encouragement of the religious beliefs taught in the same class at some other time during the day” (473 U.S. at 391).

Third, the programs have the effect of directly promoting religions by impermissibly providing a subsidy to the primary religious mission of the institutions affected. Quoting Everson v. Board of Education, the Court stated that “[n]o tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion” (330 U.S. 1, 16 [1947]). The Court distinguishes between indirect support (for example, loans for secular textbooks for nonsecular students or bus transportation) and direct support, which although intended to promote a secular purpose, directly supports a religious institutions (for example, tuition grants and tax benefits for parents whose children attend religious schools). Thus, the mere possibility of subsidization is not sufficient to invalidate government aid. However, as in Meek, the programs at issue in Grand Rapids paid for teachers and instructional equipment and materials, providing direct aid to the educational function of the religious school. Thus, the Court held that the two programs had the “primary or principal” effect of advancing religion, and therefore violated the establishment clause.

This case is important, in part, because it further defines the types of permissible and impermissible government aid to religious institutions. It also is important because the Court found that the “tender” age of the children made the symbolic link more problematic, suggesting that such a link may be less of an issue when adults are impacted.

EMILY FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited*Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)Meek v. Pittenger, 421 U.S. 349, 370 (1975)SCHOOL VOUCHERS

For several decades, local, state, and national governments have considered the enactment of school voucher plans for elementary and secondary school students. The central idea that unites these plans is that government money—that would otherwise be given to public schools—is given to students and their parents, who can use this money to pay for attendance at the schools of their choice.

Eligible schools under school voucher plans may include public, private nonreligious, and private religious schools. If the participating schools are all public in nature, with students and their parents simply empowered to choose among them in disregard of usual attendance boundaries, there are usually few serious civil liberties issues involved. Under such plans, parents are simply given more public choices than they otherwise would have.

If the criteria for participating schools are broadened to include private nonreligious schools, more objections arise. For instance, concerns have been expressed that private voucher-funded schools may engage in discrimination in admissions on the basis of race, ethnicity, gender, or ability, or that the unique role of public schools in fostering a common civic culture will be lost. If a voucher-funded school engages in discrimination on the basis of race, ethnicity, gender, or other protected category, the guarantees of the equal protection clause of the Constitution may be implicated. Otherwise, the civil liberties and educational policy issues that are raised by the school's operation are weighed against the interests of students and parents in public funding for the schools of their choice.

The most difficult civil liberties questions arise when voucher plans permit the participation of religious or "sectarian" private schools. The central tension here is between the claim of religious-school students and their parents that they are entitled to public funding for religious education on a par with that afforded for secular education, on the one hand, and the claim of taxpayers to be free of coercion by government to fund the religions of others, on the other.

In its embodiment of this tension, the school voucher debate is part of a larger, historical struggle over taxpayer funding of religious schools. During the sixty years that the Supreme Court has wrestled with this issue, several background principles have emerged. First, the giving of substantial, unrestricted, cash grants to taxpayer funds to religious elementary and secondary schools has been consistently held to violate the establishment clause of the First Amendment. Such funding of religious schools has been treated as the equivalent of funding of churches, synagogues, mosques, and other religious institutions.

When public aid to religious schools is "in kind" or otherwise restricted, its constitutionality has traditionally depended on whether the aid was secular in nature and whether it could be "diverted" by the school to religious purposes or functions. For instance, in Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000), the Court upheld a federal program in which computers and other technical materials and services were purchased with federal money by local school districts and distributed as "loans" to public, private nonreligious, and private religious schools. The plurality opinion cited as important the facts that the program provided aid that was "secular, neutral, and nonideological," in nature, and that was used in public schools.

In cases involving "indirect aid" to religious schools—that is, aid given not to the schools themselves, but to attending children and their parents—different principles emerged. In early cases, such as Board of Education v. Allen, 392 U.S. 236 (1968), the Court upheld these programs if the aid was secular in nature and conferred only incidental benefit on religious schools. This approach remained prominent in "indirect aid" cases until the mid-1980s, when a new theory emerged. Under this new theory, "indirect aid" created no establishment clause problem because it was religious-school children and their parents—not government—who funded religious schools. As Justice Thomas stated in Mitchell v. Helms, "[i]f aid to schools . . . is neutrally available and, before reaching or benefiting any religious school, first passes through the hands (literally or figuratively) of numerous private citizens who are free to direct the aid elsewhere, the government has not provided [support to religious schools]." Critics responded that this view failed to consider that these individual parental decisions are in fact anticipated and authorized by the government program, and that they accomplish the goal—the public funding of (private and public) education—which the government has previously identified.

How vouchers would be treated under these conflicting rules was determined in Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002). In this five-to-four decision, the Court held that a voucher plan that included religious schools among eligible institutions did not violate the establishment clause. In reaching this decision, the Court did not remove the general constitutional prohibition on the payment of cash grants to religious institutions. Rather, it held that the passage of voucher money through the hands of parents removes the government from the transaction, for the purposes of the establishment clause. Since (in this view) it is parents (not government) who choose to fund religious schools, there is no establishment of religion by government.

The Court's decision in Zelman answers one constitutional question about voucher programs, but leaves others. After Zelman, the federal establishment clause presumably presents no barrier to a voucher plan's inclusion of religious elementary and secondary schools. However, beyond the removal of this obstacle, significant questions remain. For instance, many voucher programs purport to exclude schools that discriminate in admissions or hiring on religious grounds, or that advocate intolerance of the religion, race, or ethnicity of others. If a religious group wishes to discriminate in favor of coreligionists in staffing or admissions, can a voucher plan exclude that school without offending the free exercise clause of the First Amendment? Can a religious group whose beliefs are deeply offensive to others—indeed, whose beliefs deny the civil rights of others—be excluded from a public voucher program, without violating free exercise guarantees, free speech guarantees, and the guarantee of equal treatment of all religious groups?

In addition, many state constitutions prohibit public funding of religious institutions, including schools. These provisions, which may stand in the way of religious-school voucher funding, have been attacked as violative of federal constitutional equal treatment guarantees, as rooted in antireligious bias, and as otherwise illegal or unwise. In Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004), the Court upheld the ability of states to recognize antiestablishment interests in the religious-school funding context that are broader than those recognized under the federal Constitution's establishment clause. In Locke, the Court held that although a state could (under Zelman and other cases) give scholarship funds to college students for religious studies, it was not required by federal free exercise, antiestablishment, or equal protection guarantees to do so. Although Locke did not deal with an elementary or secondary school voucher program, its general principles seem to foreclose effective federal constitutional challenge of state no-funding provisions, absent additional evidence of particular, anti-religious bias in the enactment or enforcement of particular state laws.

LAURA S. UNDERKUFFLER

References and Further Reading

- Dwyer, James G. Vouchers within Reason: A Child-Centered Approach to Education Reform. Ithaca: Cornell University Press, 2002.
- Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279–370.
- Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle, Zelman's Future: Vouchers, Sectarian Providers, and the Next Round of Constitutional Battles, Notre Dame Law Review 78 (2003): 917–993.
- Shiffrin, Steven H., The First Amendment and the Socialization of Children: Compulsory Public Education and Vouchers, Cornell Journal of Law and Public Policy 11 (2002): 503–551.
- Underkuffler, Laura S. “Public Funding for Religious Schools: Difficulties and Dangers in a Pluralistic Society.” Oxford Review of Education 27 (2001): 577–592.
- , Vouchers and Beyond: The Individual as Causative Agent in First Amendment Jurisprudence, Indiana Law Journal 75 (2000): 167–191.
- Viteritti, Joseph P, Reading Zelman: The Triumph of Pluralism, and Its Effects on Liberty, Equality, and Choice, Southern California Law Review 76 (2003): 1105–1187.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Allen*, 392 U.S. 236 (1968)
- Locke v. Davey*, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

SCOPES TRIAL

The trial of John Scopes is perhaps the most famous case in American legal history. It was the inevitable conflict of two historical forces: the growing acceptance of modern science and evolutionary theory, and the desire of a fundamentalist religious minority to retain the Bible as the unerring word of God. At the same time, it was a clash of two of the most prominent public figures of the early twentieth century—the great populist and three-time Democratic candidate for president, William Jennings Bryan and Clarence Darrow, the most famous trial lawyer of the period.

The brouhaha began in 1925 when the Tennessee legislature passed the “Butler Bill,” which made it a misdemeanor for a public school teacher to teach any theories that deny the biblical stories of man's creation and to teach, instead, that humans descended from a lower order of animals. The fledgling American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU), looking for a test case to combat growing infringements on academic freedom, advertised to defend anyone willing to challenge the law. The offer was taken up by town boosters in Dayton, Tennessee, who saw a high-profile trial as an opportunity to bolster business. They, in turn, persuaded John Scopes, a twenty-four-year-old general science teacher and football coach, to act as plaintiff. Long-time antievolutionist Bryan quickly volunteered for the prosecution, which eventually included chief prosecutor Tom Stewart, retired attorney general Ben G. McKenzie, and Bryan's son, William Jennings Bryan, Jr. Bryan's entry enticed avowed agnostic Clarence Darrow to join the defense team of New York attorneys Dudley Field Malone and Arthur Garfield Hays, and local counsel John R. Neal.

During the trial, Judge John T. Raulston sided with the prosecution and barred the live testimony of experts in theology and numerous disciplines in natural science. The defense had hoped that their testimony would show that evolution was compatible with biblical teachings and that the statute was an unreasonable exercise of government power. Stymied, Darrow made the move that would jettison the trial into popular history; he called Bryan to the stand as an expert witness on the Bible. Darrow's persistent questioning about the miracles of the Old Testament—including the Genesis story that claims the earth was created in days of indeterminable length—exposed the inherent inconsistencies arising from a literal interpretation of the Bible. It was the defining moment of the trial.

Judge Raulston, however, ruled Bryan's testimony irrelevant and inadmissible. With no other proof or witnesses to offer, the defense gave up. The jury, which had been excluded for much of the trial, found the defendant guilty, and the judge imposed the minimum fine of $100. This would prove to be the ACLU's undoing. In the appeal, the Tennessee Supreme Court not only ruled the statute constitutional, they also overturned Scope's conviction on the grounds that it was the duty of the jury, not the judge, to set the fine. When the state attorney general dismissed the prosecution, the ACLU was left with nothing to appeal to the U.S. Supreme Court. The offending statute stayed on the books, largely unenforced, until it was repealed by the Tennessee legislature in 1967.

Although a clash between Biblical literalists and those who supported the teaching of evolution may have been inevitable, historians point to a number of reasons for an increase in antievolution legislation in the early 1920s. Urbanization, demographic changes caused by increased immigration, and the loosening of social mores were threatening the values and way of life of conservatives in rural America. Evangelical Protestants blamed Darwin's theory of natural selection, or "survival of the fittest," for German aggression in World War I and for the new, as yet undiscredited, science of eugenics, which advocated controlled reproduction as a way to improve the human race. In addition, evolutionary theory was making its way into public education at a time when more and more young people were attending high school. Religious fundamentalists saw Darwin's ideas as threatening the faith and moral values of their children.

The Scopes trial achieved notoriety not only because of its prominent protagonists but also because of the reporting of the hundreds of journalists who attended the "monkey trial." The most famous of these was H. L. Mencken, whose acerbic observations did much to influence popular opinion in favor of the defense. Later, the Scopes trial became better known as the inspiration for "Inherit the Wind," a play that portrays the prosecution of John Scopes as an allegory for the persecution of intellectuals during the McCarthy era of the 1950s.

DIANE BENJAMIN

References and Further Reading

- Adams, Leslie B. Jr., publisher. The Scopes Trial. Birmingham, Ala.: Legal Classics Library, 1984.
- Conkin, Paul K. When All the Gods Trembled: Darwinism, Scopes, and American Intellectuals. Lanham, MD: Rowan & Littlefield Publishers, 2001.
- Darwin, Charles. The Origin of the Species. New York: Gramercy Books, 1979.
- . The Descent of Man and Selection in Relation to Sex. New York: New York University Press, 1990.
- Frye, R. M., ed. Is God a Creationist? The Religious Case against Creation-Science. New York: Scribner's, 1983.
- Futuyma, D. J. Science on Trial: The Case for Evolution. Sunderland, Mass.: Sinauer Associates, 1995.
- Ginger Ray. Six Days or Forever?: Tennessee vs. John Thomas Scopes. London; New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- Larson, Edward J. Trial and Error: The American Controversy over Creation and Evolution. New York: Oxford University Press, 2003.
- . Summer for the Gods: The Scopes Trial and America's Continuing Debate over Science and Religion. New York: Basic Books, 1997.
- Marsden, G. W. Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism 1870–1925. New York: Oxford University Press, 1982.
- Moran, Jeffrey P. The Scopes Trial: A Brief History with Documents (The Bedford Series in History and Culture). Boston: Bedford/St. Martin's, 2002.
- Scopes, John T., and James Presley. The Center of the Storm, Memoirs of John T. Scopes. New York: Holt, Rinehart and Winston, 1967.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Scopes v. State*, 154 Tenn. 105, 289 S.W. 363 (1927). Decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee on appeal from conviction.

“An Act Prohibiting the Teaching of the Evolution Theory in all the Universities, Normals and all Other Public Schools of Tennessee . . . and to Provide Penalties for Violations Thereof.” Public Acts of the State of Tennessee, 1925, Chapter No. 27, at 50.

See also Academic Freedom; Accommodation of Religion; American Civil Liberties Union; Darrow, Clarence; Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968); Establishment of Religion and Free Exercise Clauses; Public School Curricula and Free Exercise Claims; Religion in Nineteenth-Century Public Education (Includes “Bible Wars”)

SCOTTSBORO TRIALS

On March 25, 1931, nine African-American boys and young men who had stowed away on board a freight train were arrested in Paint Rock, Alabama, and accused of raping two white women. The defendants were tried in the nearby town of Scottsboro, and their legal case became a cause célèbre of the American left during the Great Depression. The fate of the “Scottsboro Boys,” as they became known, reveals how civil liberties ironically have been advanced at times through the efforts of radical groups committed to the destruction of liberalism as a form of political organization, in this case the Communist Party.

The nine defendants were poor and uneducated, members of the army of the dispossessed, and they had boarded the Southern Railroad in search of work. Their names were Charlie Weems (aged twenty), Clarence Norris (nineteen), Haywood Patterson (nineteen), Andy Wright (nineteen), Olen Montgomery (seventeen), Willie Roberson (seventeen), Ozie Powell (sixteen), Eugene Williams (thirteen), and Roy Wright (twelve). Some were related by blood; others had known each other previously; others were strangers. The train also sheltered a number of poor white men, as well as two female millworkers, and sometime prostitutes, named Victoria Price (aged twenty-one) and Ruby Bates (seventeen).

As the train moved across northern Alabama, a fight broke out between the black and white vagabonds, probably as a result of white taunts. “We beat the hell out of them,” explained one of the Scottsboro defendants years later, recalling what took place when a group of whites jumped into one of the cars where the blacks had gathered. After being thrown from the moving train, seven of the bedraggled whites reported the incident to the stationmaster in Stevenson, who wired ahead to Paint Rock. There, the train was stopped and searched by a deputized group of whites with rifles, shotguns, and pitchforks. The blacks on board were arrested and taken to Scottsboro, the seat of Jackson County.

As the posse searched the train, it also discovered Price and Bates. The two women were from the lowest strata of white society, where poverty eroded the division between the races, and as such they typically would have been subject to the disdain of polite society. But to escape contempt and garner sympathy and attention, they made the false accusation that they had been raped by the black stowaways. The explosive charge almost invariably would have led to the death of those accused, through either legal or extra-legal means, so that Southern white honor could be reclaimed.

The trials began on April 6, 1931, before Judge Alfred E. Hawkins. More than 100 soldiers from the Alabama National Guard protected the courtroom from a crowd of thousands of spectators. The defendants offered widely conflicting accounts of what had happened, some pointing the finger at their codefendants, and the prosecution took advantage by dividing the case into four separate trials. In short order, all nine were found guilty, and eight were sentenced to death by electrocution. A mistrial was declared in the case of Roy Wright, a minor, because the all-white jury was deadlocked on whether he should be executed.

In the meantime, the case had attracted the attention of the Communist Party. Seeking to find a rallying cry for American radicalism and to increase its African-American membership, the party used political protest to bring the case to public attention, and shortly after the convictions its legal arm, the Industrial Labor Defense (ILD), edged out the liberal National Association for the Advancement of Colored People and secured the right to represent the defendants. Under ILD leadership, the case was brought to the U.S. Supreme Court, which in Powell v. Alabama (1932) reversed seven of the convictions, ruling that the careless way in which Judge Hawkins had appointed the original counsel for the defense had denied the defendants due process of law.

Haywood Patterson, the first to face retrial, came before the court of Judge James Edward Horton in Decatur in March 1933. Criminal defense attorney Samuel Leibowitz, who had been retained by the ILD, tried unsuccessfully to challenge the grand and petit juries on the ground that blacks had been systematically excluded from the jury rolls. At trial, he also challenged Price’s testimony (Bates had recanted her accusation) and presented the testimony of one of the original examining physicians that the two young women had not been raped. In his closing argument, County Solicitor Wade Wright urged the jury to show “that Alabama justice cannot be bought and sold with Jew money from New York.” The jury found Patterson guilty and sentenced him to die.

Fearing mob violence, Judge Horton postponed the trials of the other defendants. Next came a surprise: influenced by the advice of a second physician who had examined Price and Bates, and who also believed they had not been raped, Judge Horton set aside the decision of the jury and ordered a new trial (he was never again elected to public office). Two of the defendants were then tried and convicted before Judge William Washington Callahan beginning in November 1933. These convictions were later reversed by the U.S. Supreme Court in Norris v. Alabama (1935), based on Leibowitz’s challenge that the defendants had been denied equal protection of the laws because blacks had been excluded from the rolls of potential jurors.

After indictments were issued by a new grand jury, four of the Scottsboro defendants were once again tried and convicted. One was sentenced to death, the others for prison terms ranging from seventy-five to ninety-nine years. Another received twenty years for stabbing a deputy sheriff. Charges against the remaining defendants were dropped. Although the “Scottsboro Boys” eventually left the public eye, their ordeal left behind a body of law that advanced the rights of criminal defendants—a signal example of the paradoxical process in which antiliberal political movements have advanced liberal legal ideals—and a symbol of the struggle against racial injustice that nurtured a memory of 1930s political radicalism into the 1960s.

MARK S. WEINER

References and Further Reading

- Carter, Dan T. Scottsboro: A Tragedy of the American South. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1969.
- Goodman, James. Stories of Scottsboro. New York: Vintage, 1994.
- Norris, Clarence Norris, and Sybil D. Washington. The Last of the Scottsboro Boys: An Autobiography. New York: Putnam, 1979.
- Weiner, Mark S. Black Trials: Citizenship from the Beginnings of Slavery to the End of Caste. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Powell v. Alabama*, 287 U.S. 45 (1932)
- Norris v. Alabama*, 294 U.S. 587 (1935)

See also Capital Punishment: Lynching; Jury Trials and Race; National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP)

SEALED DOCUMENTS IN COURT PROCEEDINGS

Whether the media should have access to pleadings filed under seal in court proceedings has been a debated issue in many cases. The argument by media in court proceedings is that all filed court documents are presumptively open to the public. In many cases, for example United States v. McVeigh, 918 F. Supp. 1452 (W. D. Okla. 1996), Associated Press v. United States District Court for the Central District of California, 705 F.2d 1143, 1145 (9th Cir. 1983), and Seattle Times Co. v. United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, 845 F.2d 1513, 1517 (9th Cir. 1988), the media has based its claim on the common law right of access to court documents, the qualified First Amendment right of access to court proceedings, and the extension of this qualified First Amendment right to court documents. The media has maintained that in the event any proceedings or documents are to be sealed, the public should be given the opportunity to object (McVeigh, 918 F. Supp. 1452).

Defendants and parties on the side opposite the media have argued that unsealing court documents would divulge attorney work product, give insight to the strategy of the defense, and deprive a party of an opportunity to present a fair defense as guaranteed in cases such as Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14, 19 (1967) and Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683, 690 (1986). If, after the parties have been required to demonstrate justification for sealing or closure, the court, then, rules in favor of closure, the court will make a specific finding on the record to support its decision, as outlined by the Fourth Circuit in In re Washington Post Co., 807 F.2d 383, 390-91 (9th Cir. 1986). Although, historically, there has existed a general policy of openness at (criminal) court proceedings, the “experience and logic” test, as stated in Press Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986) (“Press Enterprise II”) has shown that publicity may threaten a defendant’s right to a fair trial, and, in those cases, the defendant’s rights will override the qualified First Amendment right of access.

Press Enterprise II recognizes a qualified right of access to court proceedings but holds this common law right subject to the supervisory powers of each individual court. Closure is also permitted in cases where it would be “essential to preserve higher values and is narrowly tailored to serve that interest” (United States v. McVeigh, 918 F. Supp. 1452, 1463 [W.D. Okla. 1996] [Oklahoma City bombing case trial]). Although the public possesses a legitimate interest in court proceedings, the timing of the disclosure to the public is a significant factor in the balancing of the affected interest. The stage of the proceedings may determine the questions of access (Id. at 1464).

The approach that has been adopted by courts to determine whether previously sealed documents should be unsealed and whether future documents should be sealed consideration of the following factors together. First, the court determines whether a matter involves an activity within the tradition of free public access to information concerning criminal prosecutions. Second, the court looks to see whether public access will play a significant positive role in the activity and in the functioning of the process. Third, the court decides whether there is a substantial probability that some recognized interest of higher value than public access to information would be prejudiced or adversely affected by the disclosure. Fourth, the court inquires whether the need for protection of that interest overrides the qualified First Amendment right of access. Finally, the court determines whether closure is essential to protect the interest considering all reasonable alternatives.

The debate of whether the media should have access to sealed documents in court proceedings has been answered by the courts in a way to try to achieve the correct balance of the interests of all parties. The general rule that has developed is that proceedings are presumptively open to the public, but are closed when cause is shown.

STEPHEN JONES and DEANNA JUHL

References and Further Reading

Jones, Stephen, McVeigh, McJustice, McMedia, The University of Chicago Legal Forum, Volume 1998: 53–108.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Associated Press v. United States District Court for the Central District of California, 705 F.2d 1143 (9th Cir. 1983)
Crane v. Kentucky, 476 U.S. 683 (1986)
In re Washington Post Co., 807 F.2d 383 (4th Cir. 1986)
Press Enterprise Co. v. Superior Court, 478 U.S. 1 (1986) (“Press Enterprise II”)
Seattle Times Co. v. United States District Court for the Western District of Washington, 845 F.2d 1513 (9th Cir. 1988)
United States v. McVeigh, 918 F. Supp. 1452 (W.D. Okla. 1996)
Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967)

SEARCH (GENERAL DEFINITION)

The Fourth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution states that “[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.” As construed by the U.S. Supreme Court, this language means that if a government action is considered a “search” or a “seizure,” it must either be authorized by a warrant issued by a magistrate, or—in emergency situations or for lesser intrusions—there must be some other reasonable justification for the action. However, if the government’s action is not a search or a seizure, then the Fourth Amendment is not implicated. Thus, the definition of these two words is crucial in determining the limitations on government efforts to investigate crime and other activities. This entry discusses the definition of search and the rules that govern searches.

The Property-Based Definition of Search

To the average person, a search is an attempt to find something. But the Supreme Court has never adopted this simple definition of the term in the Fourth Amendment setting. Instead, it has looked to property and privacy concepts in establishing the threshold for constitutional restrictions on government efforts to obtain information about its citizenry.

For some time, the Court relied on property law to determine whether a police action was a search. In Olmstead v. United States, (1928), for instance, the Court held that no search occurred when federal agents eavesdropped on a conversation using a tap of telephone wires, because the tap was located outside the premises of the defendants. Similarly, in Goldman v. United States, (1942), the Court held that the Fourth Amendment was not implicated when police used a “detectaphone” placed against an office wall to hear private conversations. In neither case was there a physical trespass on the defendants’ privacy. Conversely, in Silverman v. United States, (1961), the Court held that electronic bugging carried out with a “spike mike” inserted under the baseboard of a wall until it made contact with a heating duct running throughout the defendant’s house was a search, requiring a warrant. Even physical intrusion was not a search, however, if the defendant consented to it. Thus, in On Lee v. United States, (1952), police did not conduct a search when they overheard conversations through a “bug” concealed on an undercover agent, because even though the agent was on the defendant’s property at the time of the overheard conversation, he was there by invitation and no trespass occurred.

Most cases involving traditional, nontechnological police intrusions do involve trespass. Thus, police entry into homes, automobiles, and luggage was considered a Fourth Amendment search under the property-based approach. However, in Hester v. United States, (1924), police trespass on private property beyond the “curtilage” of the home was held not to be a search, because such “open fields” are not a “person, house, paper or effect” explicitly mentioned in the Fourth Amendment and thus are not a “constitutionally protected area.” On the other hand, business premises, which are also not mentioned in the Fourth Amendment, did receive its protections, apparently because they are analogous to homes.

The Reasonable Expectations of Privacy Definition of Search

Katz v. United States, (1967) seemed to change dramatically the Supreme Court’s approach to the Fourth Amendment. In that case, police used electronic means to eavesdrop on a phone call made from a phone booth. The government argued that this surveillance did not constitute a Fourth Amendment search both because a phone booth is not a “constitutionally protected area” identified in the Fourth Amendment and because the bugging device did not physically intrude into the booth. Based on precedent, these arguments should have won. But the Court stated that the Fourth Amendment “protects people, not places,” and found that Katz deserved its protections once he closed the door to the booth and excluded the uninvited ear. In a concurring opinion, Justice Harlan noted that, although the Fourth Amendment protects people, explaining how it does so will usually require reference to a place. Rather than using property law to describe which places are protected, however, Harlan suggested that a search should be said to occur when police infringe “expectations of privacy that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable.” It was this “reasonable expectation of privacy” language that the Court subsequently came to use in defining “search” for Fourth Amendment purposes.

Although the result in Katz suggested that the decision would broaden the scope of the Fourth Amendment beyond the constraints imposed by property law, in fact most of the Court’s post-Katz decisions are fully consistent with the Court’s earlier jurisprudence. Both Hester and On Lee have been affirmed since Katz, the first holding on the ground that people do not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in private property that is not adjacent to the home and the second because they assume the risk their acquaintances work for the police. The assumption-of-risk rationale was expanded in Smith v.

Maryland, (1979), which held that people have no reasonable expectation of privacy in the phone numbers they dial (because they know or should know the phone company records these numbers and may hand them over to authorities) and in United States v. Miller, (1976), which held that no search occurs when prosecutors subpoena information disclosed to a bank (because the “depositor takes the risk, in revealing his affairs to another, that the information will be conveyed by that person to the government”). Nor does a search occur when police use a dog to sniff luggage, an airplane to spy on a backyard or business cartilage, or an electronic beeper to trace the whereabouts of a car. Furthermore, police do not have to be concerned about the Fourth Amendment when they go through garbage left at curbside or look inside a barn from open fields. Probably none of these actions would have been searches under a trespass analysis either, but the point is that Katz changed nothing in these settings.

A few cases suggest that the expectation-of-privacy rubric is somewhat more expansive than property-based analysis. In Bond v. United States, (2000), the Court held that police engaged in a Fourth Amendment search when they tried to discern the contents of a soft bag by feeling its contours. Although no physical intrusion occurred and the bag was not moved, the touching of the bag made the police action a search. Similarly, in Kyllo v. United States, (2001), the Court concluded that use of a thermal imaging device to detect heat differentials inside a home was a search, even though no physical intrusion occurred and the police using the device were stationed on public property. However, the Kyllo opinion also indicated that if the spying of the home interior from a lawful vantage point had been with the naked eye, with a technological device that merely replicated what the naked eye could have seen, or with a technological device that is in “general public use” (a flashlight or binoculars), then no search would have occurred. Thus, even in connection with the most private enclave, the home, the Court’s assessment of “reasonable expectations of privacy” narrowly defines the privacy we can expect from government intrusion.

A reading of the Supreme Court’s cases and lower court cases applying the expectations of privacy test suggests seven factors that might be relevant in deciding whether a search has occurred: (1) the nature of the place observed (for example, a home v. a public park); (2) the steps taken to enhance privacy (for example, a curtained window v. an open porch a few feet from the street); (3) the degree to which the surveillance requires a physical intrusion onto private property (for example, viewing from a tree in the fenced-in backyard of a house v. viewing from the sidewalk); (4) the nature of the object or activity observed (for example, a conversation v. contraband or outdoor piping); (5) the degree to which any technology used to view the premises is available to the general public (for example, satellite photography v. a flashlight); (6) the extent to which any technology used “replaces” rather than merely “improves” the senses (for example, a device that can see through clothes v. binoculars); and (7) the extent to which the viewing is unnecessarily pervasive, invasive, or disruptive (for example, surveillance of hundreds of people v. surveillance of one person; week-long surveillance v. a brief viewing). Note that many of these factors, especially (2), (3), and (5), make it less likely poor people, who have fewer means of protecting their privacy, will benefit from the Fourth Amendment.

Other Perspectives on the Definition of Search

Because it establishes when the government must abide by the Fourth Amendment, the definition of search is a major determinant of the type of society in which we live. Many commentators disagree with both the property and the privacy approaches to that definition, at least as applied by the Supreme Court. One suggested alternative is to define search in terms of the “positive law,” that is, the law governing relationships between private citizens. That law includes not only the rules of trespass but also the tort and regulatory rules governing third-party access to bank records, phone numbers, garbage, and the like. Another suggested alternative is to base the scope of “expectations of privacy society is prepared to recognize as reasonable” on an empirical assessment of the expectations society actually has. Preliminary research in this vein indicates, not surprisingly, that most people do not expect acquaintances, banks, or phone companies to be government agents, and that most people think that investigative techniques such as binocular surveillance of homes and beeper tracking of cars is much more intrusive than the Court does. A third alternative is to base the definition of search on historical information about what the Framers of the Constitution considered intrusive. Each of these approaches has problems. Positive law may be over or under inclusive (compare laws making any presence on private property a trespass to the absence of laws governing spying into backyards), society’s views can be hard to discern and may be variable, and historical attitudes, even if they can be ascertained, may not have anything to say about modern-day surveillance.

A final approach is to define search as a layperson would: an attempt to find evidence of crime. The main reason the Court has avoided this simple definition is that, once a government action is labeled a search, precedent has usually required that the police have probable cause, a level of certainty akin to a more-likely-than-not finding. Because police look for evidence of crime not only in houses but also in public and quasipublic places, the “lay definition” of search, combined with the probable cause requirement, would severely hamper law enforcement. If, however, the Court were willing to permit less intrusive searches on less than probable cause (and permit the least intrusive searches on little or no suspicion), that tension would be mitigated considerably. However, as discussed later, the Court has been unwilling to adopt this “proportionality” approach to Fourth Amendment jurisprudence.

Rules That Apply When a Government Action Is a Search

As just noted, if a government action is a search, police usually must have probable cause to believe that evidence will be discovered in the place searched. Following is a more detailed summary of the rules governing searches, organized in terms of the Fourth Amendment’s “persons, houses, papers and effects.”

Searches of persons generally require probable cause, but there are several exceptions. A search of a person incident to arrest requires probable cause for the arrest but no independent suspicion for the search. A frisk, or patdown, that occurs after a stop (which is a brief detention short of an arrest) may be based on reasonable suspicion, a standard that requires articulable grounds but not at the probable cause level (Terry v. Ohio, 1968). Finally, an inventory search of an individual who has been arrested requires no suspicion as long as it is pursuant to a written inventory policy.

If the search is of a house or a private business, police must usually have a warrant, unless there are exigent circumstances. Such circumstances exist when police are in hot pursuit of a felon, when police have arrested a person inside the home or business and want to check the arrestee’s immediate surroundings for confederates, or when they have reasonable suspicion that a confederate is hiding somewhere else in the vicinity. If the search of the house or business is an administrative inspection (for example, a health or safety inspection), then the probable cause for the warrant need not be “individualized” but can consist of a showing that the structure is in an area or involved in a type of industry that is due for inspection. Furthermore, warrants are never needed to inspect “pervasively regulated industries” on the theory that owners of such enterprises are on notice they will be subject to search.

At one time searches of papers were prohibited unless they were considered instrumentalities of crime (that is, they were instrumental in carrying out the crime—accounts of bookmaking—rather than “mere evidence” of it). Today, virtually all papers, except perhaps private diaries and the like, may be searched in one of two ways. First, the government may proceed pursuant to a subpoena based on a finding that the papers are “relevant” to a criminal investigation (a level of certainty lower than both probable cause and reasonable suspicion). Second, the government may seek the papers pursuant to a warrant based on probable cause, a method likely to be used when police are concerned the possessor of the papers is likely to destroy them rather than respond to a subpoena, or where the fact that the papers exist is incriminating and thus compelling their production through a subpoena would violate the Fifth Amendment (see Fisher v. United States, 1976).

Finally, effects, or personal property, such as cars, luggage, clothing, and the like, can be searched if there is probable cause. If these items are in a house, they need to be listed in a warrant, found in a place where items listed in the warrant may be found, or found in plain view while a valid warrantless search is being carried out. With respect to searches of cars and other moveable vehicles, no warrant is required. But probable cause is, unless the occupants of the car have been arrested or police have reasonable suspicion that the occupants can reach a weapon in the car. Furthermore, if a car is lawfully impounded (because, for example, the occupants have been arrested or there are outstanding parking tickets), it may be inventoried under a written inventory policy.

Standing

Standing doctrine determines when a particular defendant can assert a Fourth Amendment claim. It is related to the definition of search because a criminal defendant’s standing to contest a given police action depends on whether it infringes the defendant’s own legitimate expectations of privacy. Thus, the Supreme Court has held that a defendant cannot challenge the government’s burglarization of a third party’s apartment and briefcase, even though the evidence discovered was used against the defendant, because the defendant had no expectation of privacy in the third party’s premises or effects. Similarly, the Court held that defendants could not challenge the search of a car that produced bullets and a gun subsequently used against them in court, because they neither owned nor were driving the car at the time of the search.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

- Amsterdam, Anthony G., Perspectives on the Fourth Amendment, Minnesota Law Review 58 (1974): 349.
 Slobogin, Christopher, The World without a Fourth Amendment, UCLA Law Review 39 (1991): 1–107.
 Slobogin, Christopher, and Joseph Schumacher, Reasonable Expectations of Privacy and Autonomy in Fourth Amendment Cases: An Empirical Look at “Understandings Recognized and Permitted by Society,” Duke Law Journal 42 (1993): 727–775.
 Sundby, Scott, “Everyman’s” Fourth Amendment: Privacy or Mutual Trust between Government and Citizen?, Columbia Law Review 94 (1994): 1752–1812.
 Stuntz, William J., Privacy’s Problem and the Law of Criminal Procedure, Michigan Law Review 93 (1995): 1016–1078.
 Whitebread, Charles, and Christopher Slobogin. Criminal Procedure: An Analysis of Cases and Concepts. 4th Ed. New York, NY: Foundation Press, 2000, chapters 3–14.
 Yeager, Daniel, Search, Seizure and the Positive Law: Expectations of Privacy Outside the Fourth Amendment, Journal of Criminal Law & Criminology 84 (1993): 249–309.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bond v. United States*, 529 U.S. 334 (2000)
Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)
Goldman v. United States, 316 U.S. 129 (1942)
Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924)
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747 (1952)
Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505 (1961)
Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)
Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968)
United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)

See also Amsterdam, Anthony G.; Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971); Drug Testing; Electronic Surveillance, Technological Monitoring, and Dog Sniffs; Exclusionary Rule; Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976); Florida v. Riley, 488 U.S. 445 (1989); Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924); Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966); Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Kyllo v. United States, 533 U.S. 27 (2001); Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Open Fields; Privacy; Probable Cause; Search Warrants; Seizures; Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968); United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976); Warrantless Searches

SEARCH WARRANTS

A warrant is a document issued by judicial officers that authorizes law enforcement officials to make an arrest or carry out a search for evidence of crime. Warrants are an important protection against government abuse of power because, as expressed by Justice Jackson in Johnson v. United States, (1948), they require that inferences about criminal activity “be drawn by a neutral and detached magistrate instead of being judged by the officer engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime.” The warrant also assures the individual who is searched or seized that the officer has authority to do so and makes clear the limits of that authority.

When Warrants Are Required

The most important source of law concerning warrants and their use is the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution, which states that “[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.” The second part of the Fourth Amendment clearly sets out the characteristics of a valid warrant: it must be based on information obtained from a sworn applicant that shows there is probable cause to believe a suspect or evidence of illegal activity will be found. It must also describe with particularity the place to be searched and things to be seized. What the language of the Fourth Amendment does not make clear is when such a warrant is required.

The debate over this issue has been vigorous. One stance, which could be called the “warrant presumption” view, was forcefully advanced by Justice Potter Stewart. In Katz v. United States, (1967), he stated that searches and seizures should be authorized by a warrant “subject only to a few specifically established and well-delineated exceptions.” In contrast, the “reasonableness” approach, advocated by Chief Justice Rehnquist, among others, is that warrants are only necessary when failing to obtain one would be unreasonable. As Rehnquist stated in Michigan v. Clifford, (1984), there are times when “the utility of requiring a magistrate to evaluate the grounds for a search . . . is so limited that the incidental protection of an individual’s privacy interests simply does not justify imposing a warrant requirement.” The first view emphasizes the second clause of the Fourth Amendment, whereas the second view relies more heavily on the Amendment’s reasonableness language.

The second view is probably more consistent with the history of the Fourth Amendment. The primary, if not the only, concern of those who drafted the Amendment was the “general warrant.” General warrants were usually issued by executive officers of the British Crown rather than judges, could be based on a “bare suspicion,” and rarely identified a specific place to be searched, thus allowing fishing expeditions by British agents in search of evidence of sedition or possession of uncustomed goods. As Professor Davies states, “the historical concerns were almost exclusively about the need to ban house searches under general warrant[;] the evidence indicates that the Framers understood ‘unreasonable searches and seizures’ simply as a pejorative label for the inherent illegality of any searches or seizures that might be made under general warrants.” Thus, the Fourth Amendment was designed to regulate warrants when they were used, not declare warrantless searches presumptively unreasonable. Indeed, during colonial times most searches for evidence of street crime were warrantless, carried out by constables and ordinary citizens as part of a “Hue and Cry” against persons suspected of a felony.

Whether or not grounded in history, today’s Fourth Amendment jurisprudence recognizes a large number of situations (well over twenty) in which warrants are not required. These “exceptions to the warrant requirement” can be divided into four categories (for cites to the cases see the entries for Search and for Seizure). First, and most numerous, are the exceptions based on exigent circumstances that purportedly make obtaining a warrant impossible or impracticable. Among these are the “hot pursuit” exception (when police are chasing a felon); searches incident to arrest; the “vehicle exception” that allows warrantless searches of moveable vehicles such as cars and boats; the “evanescent evidence” exception that permits warrantless seizure of evidence that is in danger of imminent destruction; and the doctrine that police may stop and frisk suspicious individuals. A second set of exceptions rests on the assumption that the police action does not infringe a substantial privacy interest. Thus, warrantless searches are permitted when the subject voluntarily consents, when the entity being searched is a “heavily regulated industry,” or when the person searched is a parolee, and warrantless stops are permitted in connection with roadblocks for the purpose of detecting illegal immigrants or drunk drivers. Third, there are numerous “special needs” situations—a phrase coined by the U.S. Supreme Court—where a warrant requirement might frustrate legitimate purposes of government other than crime control (for example, school searches; drug testing of government workers and students; business searches). Finally, there are situations where warrants are considered unnecessary because other devices already curb police discretion (for example, inventory searches of cars or people based on written inventory policies).

As a result of these various exceptions, only about 5 percent of all searches are based on a warrant, and an even smaller proportion of seizures (arrests and stops) are authorized by warrant. Warrants are most often sought in connection with searches of homes. Under U.S. Supreme Court case law, arrest warrants are required to make an arrest in the home, and search warrants are required to search the home for evidence or for a suspect. However, here as elsewhere exigent circumstances permit dispensing with a warrant. Exigency exists when police are pursuing a fleeing felon, evidence of a felony is in imminent danger of being destroyed, or the police or a third party is in imminent danger. Lower courts have permitted warrantless entries when pursuit is not particularly “hot,” when police are responsible for creating the exigency (for instance, when the police make their presence known rather than go to seek a warrant), and even when police only have reasonable suspicion (a level of certainty below probable cause) that a suspect will escape or evidence be destroyed.

The Usefulness of Warrants

The courts’ unwillingness to impose a rigorous warrant requirement may result in part from the concern described by Chief Justice Rehnquist: a warrant requirement may undermine law enforcement efficiency yet not provide appreciable protection beyond the stipulation that searches and seizures be based on probable cause (or reasonable suspicion), a stipulation that is amply enforced through post-search exclusion of illegally seized evidence. A seven-city study of the warrant process found that police often take at least half-a-day to draft a warrant application. Yet magistrates spend, on average, less than three minutes assessing the application and deliberating on whether to issue a warrant. The process often seems to be rubber stamp in nature, with police seeking out those magistrates known to be sympathetic to law enforcement. Less than 10 percent of warrant applications are rejected.

The same research also suggested, however, that the process of justifying a search or seizure before it takes place forces police to be more careful. Many departments require that warrant applications be reviewed by a prosecutor or supervising officer. Magistrates often require police to amend their applications. In light of these facts, a 5 to 10 percent rejection rate may be reasonable. Although the warrant application process can be cumbersome, it can also be streamlined considerably through the telephonic warrant option. Under this option, the police, often with the prosecutor online, contact the judge by phone and recite the relevant facts; if probable cause is found, the magistrate signs the “original” warrant, and the officer is authorized to sign and serve a “duplicate original warrant.” Research indicates that this process inhibits judge-shopping (because judges rotate through the “duty judge” position), reduces the time needed to obtain authorization from an average of three or four hours to one and one-half hours, and usually produces more information than written affidavits in similar cases.

The question remains whether a warrant is necessary when police know a serious sanction (exclusion of evidence and perhaps a damages action against them) will be imposed if they violate the Fourth Amendment. Professor Stuntz has suggested two reasons for maintaining an ex ante (before-the-fact) warrant requirement despite the existence of ex post (after-the-fact) sanctions. First, police have been known to lie about the facts relevant to determining whether probable cause existed at the time of the search or seizure. Such lying is more difficult to pull off successfully if ex ante review, through a warrant, is required, because police do not yet know what they will find or how they will find it. Ex post, on the other hand, shaping the story to fit the facts is much easier. Second, judges deciding whether to exclude evidence are likely to be affected by the fact that the police found the evidence. This hindsight bias makes a neutral determination about probable cause difficult. During ex ante review, on the other hand, the judge does not know what the police will find and thus is likely to be more critical of police assertions.

The Elements of a Valid Warrant

To be valid, a warrant must meet several requirements. First, it must be issued by a “neutral and detached” magistrate. The Supreme Court has held that this requirement is not met when the magistrate is also a prosecutor, is paid only when a warrant is issued (but not when one is not issued), or accompanies police to the scene of a search to determine what items should be seized. On the other hand, magistrates need not be legally trained, and many are not.

The Supreme Court held in Shadwick v. Tampa (1972) that court clerks may issue arrest warrants for violation of city ordinances.

A second requirement is that the warrant be based on probable cause. Probable cause to arrest exists when the facts and circumstances are sufficient to warrant a prudent person in believing that the person to be arrested has committed or is committing a crime, and probable cause to search exists when the same prudent person would believe that the evidence or persons to be seized are located at the place to be searched. Most courts equate probable cause with a level of certainty akin to a more-likely-than-not standard. A much-litigated issue is the extent to which the probable cause may be based on hearsay. The Supreme Court has held that an application that relies on statements by another police officer or an ordinary citizen generally should be considered credible. However, if the application is based on the assertions of a “confidential informant,” often a criminal himself, the magistrate must generally make further inquiry into the basis of the allegation and the credibility of the informant. This inquiry, outlined in cases such as Aguilar v. Texas, (1964), Spinelli v. United States, (1969), and Illinois v. Gates, (1983), considers whether the application makes clear that the informant personally observed the criminal activity (or at least describes the criminal activity in sufficient detail that the assertions are unlikely to be casual rumors), whether the informant has a record of reliable informing, and whether the informant makes self-incriminating disclosures (which are thought to make the informant’s other assertions more reliable). The magistrate may also consider the extent to which police have corroborated the informant’s assertions, which can include police knowledge of the suspect’s reputation. All of these factors are to be considered in the “totality of the circumstances” in determining whether the informant is sufficiently credible. Although police have been known to doctor warrant applications and even fabricate the existence of confidential informants, courts have rarely required police to produce informants in front of the magistrate, out of fear that a valuable law enforcement resource would thereby be compromised.

To avoid the general warrant of colonial infamy, the warrant must also describe with particularity the place to be searched and the person or thing to be seized. However, in Maryland v. Garrison (1987), the Court held that a mistake as to the description of the place to be searched would not invalidate the warrant unless the requesting officers knew or should have known about the error. It has also upheld against a particularity challenge a warrant that listed several items to be seized, but ended with the phrase, “together with other fruits, instrumentalities and evidence of crime at this [time] unknown” (Andresen v. Maryland, 1976).

Finally, the warrant must be executed properly. Federal and most state laws require that warrants be executed during the daytime or early evening unless there are good grounds for executing the warrant at some other time. The warrant must also be executed before it goes stale (see, for example, Sgro v. United States, 1932, finding that a delay of three weeks in executing a warrant for search of intoxicants rendered the search invalid). To avoid unnecessary panic, protect the police, and enhance dignity and privacy, police must knock and announce their presence when executing a warrant, unless there is reasonable suspicion to believe knocking and announcing would endanger them or evidence (Richards v. Wisconsin, 1995). Police may only search those areas where items in the warrant may be found, although if they see an unlisted item in “plain view” in such an area they may seize it; thus, police with a warrant authorizing only seizure of a rifle may not search in kitchen drawers, but if they come across drugs while looking for the rifle in a closet, they may seize them (Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 1971). Finally, federal and most state laws require police to file an inventory of the seized evidence, which is to be given to both the magistrate and the searched party. However, under the USA Patriot Act, § 213(2)(b), police are allowed to undertake “sneak and peak” searches that allow the police to delay notification if they believe notice will compromise an investigation.

When a Warrant Is Insufficient

There are several situations in which even a warrant that meets all the requirements just described is insufficient. Under Title III of the federal Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 18 U.S.C. § 2518, which applies to state officials as well, when the government wants to conduct electronic surveillance, it generally must not only obtain a warrant based on probable cause but show that the surveillance is the only way it can obtain the evidence. When the government wants to obtain evidence located inside someone’s body (for example, a bullet), an adversarial hearing may have to be held at which the court considers the extent to which the procedure threatens the health, safety, and dignity of the individual and the extent to which prohibiting the procedure would affect the community’s interest in fairly and accurately determining guilt or innocence. Similarly, large-scale seizures of pornographic books and films constituting a prior restraint must be preceded by an adversary hearing on the question of obscenity.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

- Davies, Thomas Y., Recovering the Original Fourth Amendment, Michigan Law Review 98 (1999): 547–750.
 Grano, Joseph D., Probable Cause and Common Sense: A Reply to the Critics of Illinois v. Gates, Michigan Journal of Law Reform 17 (1984): 465.
 Greenhalgh, William W., and Mark J. Yost, In Defense of the “Per Se” Rule: Justice Stewart’s Struggle to Preserve the Fourth Amendment’s Warrant Clause, American Criminal Law Review 31 (1994): 1013–1098.
 Stuntz, William J., Warrants and Fourth Amendment Remedies, Virginia Law Review 77 (1991): 881–943.
 Van Duizend, Richard, L. Paul Sutton, and Charlotte A. Carter, The Search Warrant Process: Preconceptions, Perceptions and Practices. Williamsburg: National Center for State Courts, 1985.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Aguilar v. State of Texas*, 378 U.S. 108 (1964)
Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976)
Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971)
Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983)
Johnson v. United States, 333 U.S. 10 (1948)
Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
Maryland v. Garrison, 480 U.S. 79 (1987)
Michigan v. Clifford, 464 U.S. 287 (1984)
Sgro v. United States, 287 U.S. 206 (1932)
Shadwick v. City of Tampa, 407 U.S. 345 (1972)
Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969)
Richards v. Wisconsin, 520 U.S. 385 (1997)

See also Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964); Arrest Warrants; Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925); Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969); Connally v. Georgia, 429 U.S. 245 (1977); Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971); Exclusionary Rule; General Warrants; Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983); Jailhouse Informants; Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967); Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980); Search (General Definition) Seizures; Warrant Clauses (IV); Warrantless Searches

SECONDARY EFFECTS DOCTRINE

The secondary effects doctrine is an important principle in current First Amendment jurisprudence. A court applies the doctrine if it finds that the regulation of speech is aimed at the “secondary effects” of the speech and not at the content of the speech itself. Under the doctrine, a court may treat a seemingly content-based speech regulation, which normally is entitled to strict scrutiny, as a content-neutral regulation, and thus apply the less rigorous intermediate scrutiny. Because content-based regulations are rarely upheld under strict scrutiny and content-neutral regulations are much easier to sustain, the application of the secondary effects doctrine may determine whether a law is constitutional.

The Supreme Court laid the foundation for the secondary effects doctrine in two cases upholding restrictive zoning of adult entertainment. In Young v. American Mini-Theatres, a plurality of the Court found that a zoning law that prevented adult theatres from operating within 1,000 feet of any each other or within 500 feet of any residential area was passed to prevent a secondary effect of the speech—avoiding the crime associated with adult entertainment—and not to prevent the dissemination of offensive speech. In City of Renton v. Playtime Theatres, Inc., a majority of the Court embraced the secondary effects doctrine, finding that an ordinance that prohibited adult theatres from being located within 1,000 feet of any residential zone, church or park, or within one mile of any school was not aimed at the content of the films shown at adult motion picture theatres but at the secondary effects of such theatres on the surrounding communities. Thus, the test applied to the zoning regulation was the traditional intermediate scrutiny test: Does the ordinance serve a substantial governmental interest and allow for reasonable alternate avenues of communication?

The secondary effects doctrine has been criticized as being unprincipled and unwise. If the application of a law depends on its content—which it clearly did in Renton and Young—why should it be treated as content neutral? Moreover, the notion of secondary effects could potentially apply to all speech regulation: the government could always point to some secondary effect of the speech and thus claim that they had no motive to suppress the content of the speech.

Some critics took solace in the fact that the Court seemed to apply the doctrine only to low value, or sexually explicit speech. Since Renton, however, the Court has indicated a willingness to expand the doctrine beyond the area of zoning and adult entertainment. For example, in Boos v. Barry, the Supreme Court considered whether a District of Columbia law that prohibited the display of signs criticizing foreign governments within 500 feet of their respective embassies violated the First Amendment. The government argued that the ordinance was not based on the content of the speech but rather to protect our international law obligations by preventing speech that offends the dignity of foreign diplomats. Although the Court struck down the law, it accepted the possible application of the secondary effects doctrine even applied to political speech. The emotive impact of the speech on the audience, however, was not the type of secondary effect referred to in Renton. The Court has since applied the secondary effects doctrine to nude dancing and to hate speech regulations.

MARCY STRAUSS

SECULAR HUMANISM AND THE PUBLIC SCHOOLS

Secular humanism can be taught about in the public schools, but not as a preferred way of belief or living. This is the same rule as is applicable to all religions. With this important limit, the decision is for local school boards whether it should be taught about, and if it is, what should be included. There are substantial arguments that there should be education in public schools about religion in general, and perhaps using examples from a few religions. Because of the plurality of religious views and commitments in the United States and around our world, what can be taught about religion will inevitably be controversial.

What can be taught related to religion in the public schools is restricted by the First Amendment establishment clause, which makes clear that government may neither promote nor discourage religion. "Government" is viewed as composed of organizations, agencies, and the people comprising them, that do the work that governments do. Thus not only are legislatures, courts, and executive officers parts of government, but also police, school boards, and public school principals and teachers.

Whether "secular humanism" is deemed a religion or not makes no difference with respect to the First Amendment. Although sometimes referred to as a religion, secular humanism is generally considered to be a belief system that negates religion. Indeed, secular humanism typically views those systems customarily referred to as "religions" as actually inhibiting the best of human learning, activity, and experience. But the Supreme Court has consistently ruled that government actions may neither advance nor inhibit religion.

The most important word in the First Amendment religion clauses is the word "religion." Surely the framers must have thought protection of religion was of exceptional importance to put it first in the Bill of Rights. Not only was it important in the eighteenth century, but obviously it is highly important in the totally different context of the twenty-first century. Yet the Supreme Court has never defined this word for First Amendment purposes. To be sure, definitions are available in dictionaries. But in deciding what is to be protected from government actions, and how, delineations are generally considered unhelpful.

Not only does "religion" defy a limiting definition, the Supreme Court has made it clear that the truth or falsity of a religious claim is an issue courts cannot litigate. This restriction was made in a case involving mail fraud, but clearly it is applicable in other contexts including public schools. Common religious claims and positions are understood to be matters of "faith," which by definition signifies they are not subject to proof or disproof either by objective evidence, that is, evidence limited to the five senses (sight, sound, touch, smell, taste), or by circumstantial evidence. Yet an obviously sensible lower court judge held that use of marijuana could not be justified as an exercise of religion (any more than could human sacrifice).

As for teaching about religion in the public schools, language from Justice Brennan's concurring opinion in the 1963 case invalidating a state's daily Bible-reading requirements is generally deemed controlling: "The holding of the Court today plainly does not foreclose teaching about the Holy Scriptures or about the differences between religious sects in classes in literature or history. Indeed, whether or not the Bible is involved, it would be impossible to teach meaningfully many subjects in the social sciences or the humanities without some mention of religion." Because of its clarity, this statement has often been referred to and never seriously disputed.

The importance of teaching about literature and history is essential in learning about how best to live usefully and enjoyably. The need for teaching about religion also may be viewed as similar to teaching about music and art. Although not engaged in or appreciated by everyone, these are among the variety of activities and pursuits that enrich many people's lives.

The methods of teaching about a particular religion or religions in general are many and varied. Nonverbal communication by a teacher can be as significant as verbal communication. The issue is whether what the teacher says and/or does promotes or advances or discourages or inhibits. In one lower court case, an elementary school teacher was found to have violated the establishment clause by keeping his Bible on his desk, frequently silently reading from it during the class regular silent reading period, and displaying on the wall a poster that read, "You have only to open your eyes to see the hand of God." Indeed, the Supreme Court has made it clear in several contexts that nonverbal communication by symbols can be as significant in First Amendment cases as verbal communication. An example of the power of nonverbal communication is exemplified in television commercials.

Although secular humanism generally disdains any formal organization, there is an organization known as “The Council for Secular Humanism,” in existence since at least 1980, that claims to serve “secular humanists, atheists, agnostics, freethinkers, rationalists, skeptics, and all those . . . who find meaning and value in life without looking to a god.” Among their themes is “emphasiz[ing] reason and scientific inquiry, individual freedom and responsibility, human values and compassion, and the need for tolerance and cooperation.”

Secular humanists have given particular attention to the issue of teaching about the origin of life, which has been controversial since the famous 1927 Scopes trial, in which a public school teacher was convicted for teaching the theory of evolution in violation of a state statute. The origin of life issue was addressed by the U.S. Supreme Court in the 1987 decision in Edwards v. Aguillard. The Court struck down a Louisiana statute because the Louisiana legislature made clear the statute was designed to promote religion. The decision did not prohibit teaching about religious views on creation in a nonscientific (neutral) context.

Surely questions such as “What are we doing here” and “Where did we come from” should be raised and discussed—even though there are no indisputable answers—as matters intrinsic to human curiosity. The focus has been on teaching about “creationism” and “intelligent design,” which are essentially religious explanations, and thus nonscientific—in opposition to evolution and “big bang” theories, which are supportable by scientific evidence. Because secular humanists reject supernatural beliefs, they have been adamant in rejecting nonscientific attacks on science-supported theories. Generally they are not opposed to teaching about religion in a nonscientific context other than being concerned about “the foot in the door.”

DANIEL G. GIBBENS

References and Further Reading

The Council for Secular Humanism website, www.secularhumanism.org (last visited Dec. 14, 2005).
Oxford English Dictionary. 2nd Ed. 1989.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987).
Engel v. Vitale, 370 U.S. 421 (1962).
McGinley v. Houston, 361 F.3d 1328 (11th Cir. 2004).
Roberts v. Madigan, 921 F.2d 1047 (10th Cir. 1990).
School District v. Shempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963).
Torcaso v. Watkins, 367 U.S. 488 (1961).
United States v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78 (1944).
United States v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 167 (1965).
Welsh v. United States, 398 U.S. 333 (1970).
Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 122 S.Ct. 2460 (2002).

SECULAR PURPOSE

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that, to withstand challenge under the establishment clause of the First Amendment, a statute “must have a secular legislative purpose” (Lemon v. Kurtzman). The Supreme Court has relied on the secular purpose requirement four times to invalidate a state statute.

In Epperson v. Arkansas, the Court struck down an Arkansas statute that prohibited the teaching of evolution in public schools and universities. The absence of a secular purpose was fatal to the law:

The overriding fact is that Arkansas’ law selects from the body of knowledge a particular segment which it proscribes for the sole reason that it is deemed to conflict with a particular religious doctrine; that is, with a particular interpretation of the Book of Genesis by a particular religious group.

In Stone v. Graham, the Court invalidated a Kentucky statute that required public schools to post in each classroom a copy of the Ten Commandments. Because the Commandments included unquestionably religious edicts (for example, avoiding idolatry), the principal purpose of the law was “plainly religious.”

In Wallace v. Jaffree, the Court declared unconstitutional an Alabama law that mandated a period of silence in public schools “for meditation or voluntary prayer.” The Court held that the law “was not motivated by any clearly secular purpose—indeed, the statute had no secular purpose.” The statute’s principal sponsor had said that the bill’s only purpose was religious, and no evidence to the contrary had been offered by the state. Moreover, Alabama law already mandated a moment of silence for “meditation.” The only conceivable purpose of the new law, therefore, was to endorse religion. “The addition of ‘or voluntary prayer’ indicates that the State intended to characterize prayer as a favored practice.”

Edwards v. Aguillard invalidated a Louisiana statute that mandated equal treatment for evolution and “creation science” in public schools. Neither theory was required to be taught, but if a teacher presented one theory, he or she had to give equal attention to the other theory. As in Epperson, the Court noted the “historic and contemporaneous link between the teachings of certain religious denominations and the teaching of evolution.” The legislative history revealed a purpose “to change the science curriculum of public schools in order to provide persuasive advantage to a particular religious doctrine that rejects the factual basis of evolution in its entirety.”

These cases are atypical. Two examples show how deferential the Court has usually been to the state’s recitation of a secular purpose. When Sunday closing laws were challenged in McGowan v. Maryland, the Court acknowledged that these laws originally had a religious purpose and that Sunday remains a day of religious significance to many citizens. But “[t]he present purpose and effect of most of [these laws] is to provide a uniform day of rest for all citizens; the fact that this day is Sunday, a day of particular significance for the dominant Christian sects, does not bar the State from achieving its secular goals.” In Lynch v. Donnelly, the Court rejected an establishment clause challenge to a municipality’s inclusion of a traditional nativity scene as part of a larger display depicting various observances of the Christmas holiday. “The evident purpose of including the crèche in the larger display was not promotion of the religious content of the crèche but celebration of the public holiday through its traditional symbols.” In both cases, the state’s justification for its law was a thin secular rationalization for an obviously sectarian action, but the rationalization was enough to satisfy the Court.

Four major objections have been raised against the secular purpose requirement. The rubber stamp objection holds that nearly anything can satisfy the secular purpose requirement, because a secular rationale can be imagined for almost any law. The evanescence objection claims that the “purpose” that the rule seeks either does not exist or is not knowable by judges. Who can know for certain what lawmakers had in mind when they enacted a statute? The participation objection argues that the rule makes religious people into second-class citizens by denying them the right to participate in the legislative process. Should a law to shelter the homeless be deemed unconstitutional, this objection asks, if religious people supported it for religious reasons? The callous indifference objection holds that the secular purpose requirement, if taken seriously, would forbid the humane accommodation of religious dissenters, such as the exemption of Quakers from military service.

Whether these objections are fatal depends on how the Court resolves an ambiguity in the doctrine: does it concern the subjective purpose of the lawmakers or the objective purpose that is apparent from a reading of the statute? The latter understanding prohibits laws that have no conceivable secular purpose.

The secular purpose requirement, thus understood, follows directly from a principle at the core of the establishment clause: that government may not declare religious truth. Some laws signify government endorsement of a particular religion’s beliefs, and this significance is clear without any inquiry into the authors’ subjective intentions. An easy example is the Ten Commandments statute in Stone v. Graham.

This approach answers all four objections. The first three may be disposed of easily. The answer to the rubber stamp objection is that it is sometimes clear what a law is saying, and what is being said may be a claim about religious truth. The evanescence objection also fails, because the secular purpose requirement does not seek subjective legislative intent. The answer to the participation objection is that the secular purpose requirement looks at legislative outcomes rather than political inputs, so that a statute’s constitutionality is not impugned by the mere fact that some people supported it for religious reasons. The callous indifference objection is more complex, but it can be answered. Government can accommodate religion so long as it does so without favoritism, in a way that does not take any position on questions of religious truth.

ANDREW KOPPELMAN

References and Further Reading

Koppelman, Andrew, Secular Purpose, Virginia Law Review 88, no. 1 (2002): 87–166.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Abington Township v. Schempp, 374 U.S. 203 (1963)
Edwards v. Aguillard, 482 U.S. 578 (1987)
Epperson v. Arkansas, 393 U.S. 97 (1968)
Lemon v. Kurtzman, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Lynch v. Donnelly, 465 U.S. 668 (1984)
McGowan v. Maryland, 366 U.S. 420 (1961)
Stone v. Graham, 449 U.S. 39 (1980)
Wallace v. Jaffree, 472 U.S. 38 (1985)

SEDITIONOUS LIBEL

Seditious libel is the crime of publishing material that brings the government into contempt. At common law, truth was no defense to a charge of seditious libel. Because of “the tendency which all libels have to create animosities, and to disturb the public peace,” William Blackstone wrote, “it is immaterial with respect to the offense of a libel, whether the matter of it be true or false.” The crime of seditious libel had only two elements. First, did the defendant publish the writing in question. That was for the jury to determine. Second, did the writing defame the government. That was for the judge to determine. In practice, however, some juries that approved the defamatory content of a writing would refuse to convict.

English law during then Tudor and Stuart periods gave the government numerous means for restricting the press. The most popular during most of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were licensing laws that prohibited publication of any printed material unless approved by the king's censor. As licensing laws became unpopular and increasingly hard to administer, public ministers began turning to the common law of defamation to suppress political criticism. A crucial precedent was established when the Star Chamber in 1606 decided de Libellis Famosis. Lewis Pickeringe was brought to trial after he had insulted an archbishop. Lord Coke's opinion in that case suggested that defamation of a public official was not only a personal insult, but a threat to public order. A libel directed at a government official, he wrote, "concerns not only the breach of the peace, but also the scandal of Government; for what greater scandal of Government can there be than to have corrupt or wicked magistrates." Over the next century, these words gradually became interpreted as justifying prosecutions for defaming the government as well as for defaming public officials.

The eighteenth century was the heyday for seditious libel. Licensing was abandoned in 1695, and shortly thereafter a series of favorable decisions made seditious libel the tool of choice for those concerned with political criticism. Led by Lord Holt, English judges made clear that truth was not a defense to a charge of seditious libel and that the judge decided whether the publication in question was defamatory. After 1700, all the jury was legally expected to do was determine publication. Holt justified his aggressive use of libel law by claiming, "if men should not be called to account for possessing the people with an ill opinion of the government, no government can subsist; for it is very necessary for every government, that the people should have a good opinion of it."

Seditious libel had a rough reception in the American colonies. The official law in books or as articulated by judges continued to maintain any defamation of government was a crime, but many American printers behaved as if no law of libel existed, and juries could not be counted on to convict even when they were instructed that their sole responsibility was to determine publication. The famous Zenger trial highlighted both the official and unofficial status of seditious libel before the American Revolution. Zenger was a printer whose newspaper published criticisms of William Cosby, then governor of New York. Zenger was imprisoned for seditious libel, even though he was not personally responsible for writing the criticisms but had merely printed what the owners of the press had delivered. Confronting the charger of publishing "false, scandalous, malicious, and seditious" work, Zenger's lawyers emphasized the word "false" in the indictment and insisted that falsehood was a necessary element of seditious libel. Although the judge instructed the jury that they should find Zenger guilty if they determined that he "printed and published those papers," the jury verdict in favor of Zenger was interpreted as demonstrating colonial antipathy toward seditious libel. Whether this antipathy reflected a more general commitment to free speech is doubtful. Cosby was a notoriously unpopular governor, and the jurors in the Zenger case agreed with the sentiments that his newspaper published. Printers were far less protected when they attacked popularly elected legislatures and were charged with breaching legislative privilege then they were when they attacked English appointed governors and were charged with seditious libel.

Whether the First Amendment prohibited the federal government from charging people with seditious libel has been the subject of ongoing historical controversy. Leonard Levy insists that the legal meaning of the First Amendment in 1791 was probably limited to a ban on licensing laws. Press practice was free, he asserts, even though press legal freedom was quite limited. Other scholars disagree. Some claim that the Zenger trial and colonial support for Whig proponents of press rights in England demonstrate that "freedom of the press" at the end of the eighteenth century was not limited to a ban on prior restraints, but at a very minimum made truth a complete defense to criminal libel. Other scholars, most notably William Mayton, insist that the Constitution of 1787 did not vest the federal government with the power to prosecute seditious libels. "Speech was protected from suppression by the national government," Mayton writes, "because the Constitution granted this body no power over speech."

The actual intentions of the framers are probably impossible to discern with complete accuracy. One problem is that the persons who drafted and ratified the First Amendment did not define its precise meaning in 1791. Nor did the persons who drafted and ratified the Constitution indicate whether no power over speech meant that the federal government could never regulate speech even when exercising another power or merely that the federal government could not regulate speech for the purpose of suppressing criticism. If the latter is the correct view, then speech restrictions intended to protect the public peace might be constitutional. Moreover, different framers quite frequently articulated broad understandings of free speech when their speech was being restricted and narrow understandings of free speech when they sought to restrict the speech of others.

The turn of the nineteenth century witnessed, by and large, the demise of seditious libel. Parliament in 1792 passed Fox's Libel Act, which authorized jurors to decide whether a publication was defamatory and made truth a defense. Over the next few years, sedition libel prosecutions petered out in Great Britain. The Federalist party in the United States adopted both reforms when passing the Sedition Act of 1798. Even so, that measure provoked substantial controversy, both for the way it was implemented and for its use of federal power. Madison in his "Report of 1800" declared both that "the federal government" is "destitute of every authority for restraining the licentiousness of the press," and that freedom of the press meant freedom to published opinion as well as truth.

Jefferson's election in 1801 largely ended efforts to enforce variations on the crime of seditious libel in the United States. An attempt to renew the Sedition Act was made, but in a remarkably principled vote, Jeffersonians voted against giving Jefferson this power, whereas Federalists favored the measure. Several Jeffersonian officials attempted to use the common law to prosecute seditious libels, but the Supreme Court declared this unconstitutional in U.S. v. Hudson and Goodwin (1812). Almost 150 years later, the Supreme Court in New York Times v. Sullivan (1964) officially held that neither the federal government nor the states had the power to pass laws prohibiting seditious libel.

MARK A. GRABER

References and Further Reading

- Hamburger, Philip, The Development of the Law of Seditious Libel and the Control of the Press, Stanford Law Review 37 (1985): 661–765.
- Levy, Leonard W. Emergence of a Free Press. New York: Oxford University Press, 1985.
- Mayton, William T., Seditious Libel and the Lost Guarantee of a Freedom of Expression, Columbia Law Review 84, no.1 (1984): 91–142.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- New York Times Co. v. Sullivan*, 376 U.S. 254 (1964)
- United States v. Hudson & Goodwin*, 11 U.S. 32 (1812)

SEGREGATION

Segregation is separating an individual on the basis of a characteristic or trait. Within the United States, segregation has often been based on racial classification. Segregation has been imposed by legal and governmental action, known as de jure segregation, and by habit or custom, or de facto. Although most de jure segregation has been eliminated by government action in promoting civil rights for racial minorities, de facto segregation is still prevalent in today's society.

Segregation: Colonial Era to the Civil War

The practice of segregation in the United States can be dated back to the colonial period and, after the American revolution, was prevalent in both the North and the South. Both sides of the Mason–Dixon line had de facto and de jure segregation in numerous areas of life, from barring blacks from entering hotels, inns, and restaurants to requiring blacks to sit in reserved sections of theaters and worship in designated pews in white churches.

In addition to restrictions on everyday venues, many northern schools frequently segregated their classrooms on the basis of race, sometimes within the same school building. For example, the state of Ohio, from its inception to 1848, excluded all non-white children from their public school systems. This prompted many blacks, along with whites, who were sympathetic to educational opportunities for black children, to create private schools for black children. This drive for public versus private education lay at the heart of a conflict within the black community, most notably over "the importance of assimilation into the dominant white culture" (Douglas 2005, 19).

In New England, black school children did enroll in public schools, but many were racially separated schools. One notable example was in the Boston school system, where blacks sought a separate school for their children because of prejudice shown by whites, and in 1798, the first all-black school was privately established. After this, other all-black schools were established, and soon the city had separate educational facilities based on race. This system would be challenged by Sarah Roberts and her father, who sought to attend a closer all-white school rather than a school for blacks.

Led by attorney Charles Sumner, a leading abolitionist and future U.S. senator, the lawsuit argued that the "separation of children in the public schools of Boston, on account of color or race, is in the nature of caste, and is a violation of equality." Although the Massachusetts State Supreme Court recognized that separate schools based on color created a system of separation based on people's prejudices, the court's majority in Roberts v. City of Boston held that "this prejudice, if it exists, is not created by law, and probably cannot be changed by law." The court denied Roberts' request to enroll at an all-white school and set a precedent for a future national case that would accept state-sanctioned segregation on the basis of race (Plessy v. Ferguson). Six years later, the state of Massachusetts would overturn the Roberts decision by abolishing, through a legislative act (Mass. Acts 1855, c. 256), the practice of segregated schools.

Imposing Segregation: 1865–1909

After the Civil War and the end of slavery in the United States, southern states sought to reaffirm a segregated society for blacks and whites through the adoption of “Black Codes” in 1865. In response, Radical Republicans won passage of the Civil War Amendments to the U.S. Constitution, particularly the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments. Some Republicans, most notably U.S. Senator Charles Sumner, believed that these amendments would prevent discrimination against blacks. To implement these amendments, the Radical Republicans subsequently passed a series of civil rights acts in 1866, 1870, and 1871. The last piece of legislation, the Civil Rights Act of 1875, sought to protect all Americans, regardless of race, from discrimination in all forms of public accommodations, such as theaters, trains, and restaurants. The 1875 act was aimed at both government action and private individuals’ actions; however, the U.S. Supreme Court would later rule (in The Civil Rights Cases of 1883) that Congress had overstepped its power to affect private acts.

During the era of Reconstruction, southern states segregated blacks from whites, most notably in areas of education. After the end of Reconstruction in 1877, southern states implemented “Jim Crow” laws; Jim Crow was a term from minstrel shows with a character who portrayed an uneducated and inferior black. Both constitutional requirements and statutes required that blacks and whites be kept separated in the schoolhouse, railroad cars, train station waiting areas, residential areas, restrooms, on the job, and even separate entrances on entering some public and private buildings. In North Carolina and Florida, textbooks used in white and black schools had to be kept separated, and some state courtrooms often had two Bibles for witnesses to swear on: one for white and one for black witnesses. Laws also sought to deny the right to vote by blacks through the use of literacy tests, property requirements, educational requirements, and “understanding clauses.” In addition, many nonsouthern states had laws imposing segregation as well, with 22 percent of all Jim Crow laws passed from the late 1800s to the mid-1900s. Only fifteen states did not have any Jim Crow laws.

Although many of these laws were challenged in court, the Jim Crow era found legal sanction by the U.S. Supreme Court in two notable cases. The first was the 1883 Civil Rights Case, in which the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Fourteenth Amendment’s equal protection clause did not extend to private individuals or organizations that discriminated on the basis of race. This decision overturned the Civil Rights Act of 1875. The second case upheld a Louisiana law mandating separate railroad cars for whites and blacks. In the 1896 case of Plessy v. Ferguson, the court used the logic of the Roberts case to declare that a state law using separate but equal facilities did not violate the federal equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. These cases, along with several other notable cases, gave federal judicial sanction to state laws mandating segregation.

Attacking Jim Crow and De Jure Segregation: 1910–Present

With the establishment of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP) in 1909, the blacks organized themselves to fight against Jim Crow laws and racial segregation. Early on, the NAACP contested segregation in Buchanan v. Warley, which successfully challenged residential segregation by cities, and Moore v. Dempsey, which overturned a conviction of a black after a trial dominated by a mob. It was during the period of 1890 to 1920 that more than 3,100 Americans, predominately blacks, were murdered by acts of lynching. Along with a focus on preventing or seeking prosecution against those who used lynching as a weapon against blacks, the NAACP established the Legal Defense Fund (LDF) in 1939. Under the leadership of Charles Hamilton Houston and Thurgood Marshall, the LDF attacked the concept of separate but equal, by first suing state and local governments to uphold the concept, then attacked the doctrine as being inherently discriminatory.

Although there were unsuccessful challenges to the principle of “separate but equal” (Gong Lum v. Rice), the LDF did prevail in attacking segregated education, through such cases as Pearson v. Murray, in which the Maryland Court of Appeals held that the University of Maryland’s Law School must grant admission to blacks, and Missouri ex rel Gaines v. Canada, in which the U.S. Supreme Court required the state of Missouri to offer equal legal education to its residents, regardless of race. By first challenging graduate and then postsecondary education, the LDF culminated its challenge of “separated but equal” educational policy in the 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision, Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, KS, in which a unanimous court held that “separate but equal was inherently unconstitutional.”

The LDF also challenged segregation in other venues, such as housing. In 1948, the U.S. Supreme Court held (in Shelley v. Kraemer) that restrictions on who could own private housing violated the Fifteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. That same year, the California Supreme Court struck down a state ban on interracial marriages (Perez v. Lippold). In 1950, the U.S. Supreme Court held, in Henderson v. U.S., that separate railroad dining cars violated the Interstate Commerce Act, which made it unlawful for interstate trains to place a passenger in "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage." Additional cases, such as 1960's Boynton v. Virginia, held that blacks had a federal legal right to be served without discrimination in an interstate bus terminal's restaurant.

After the U.S. Supreme Court's Brown ruling, Congress began to attack segregation as well, passing civil rights acts in 1957, 1960, and 1964, a voting rights act in 1965, and the 1968 Fair Housing Act that banned discrimination in housing. These acts, particularly the 1964 civil rights and 1965 voting rights acts, were most effective in eliminating segregation laws in many states because of the pressure of the modern civil rights movement and leaders such as the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr. However, southern officials, like Alabama's governor George C. Wallace (who declared in his first inauguration "segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever") used the issue to rally Southern white conservatives to resist federal attempts to dismantle segregation practices.

In 1971, these federal attacks on segregation practices culminated with the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education that busing could be used as a tool to achieve desegregation. Subsequent court cases, however, began to scale back the impact of judicial challenges to segregation. In 1973, the U.S. Supreme Court held, in San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez, that education is not a fundamental constitutional right under the U.S. Constitution. Later that same year, the Supreme Court ruled that absent intentional discrimination, de facto segregation based on living patterns did not amount to an equal protection violation. Subsequent court action has dealt with such issues as affirmative action in higher education and for federal contracts. Although the U.S. Supreme Court upheld the use of affirmative action in the 1978 case of Bakke v. Regents of the University of California, it did not allow the use of quotas in higher education. Most recently, in 2003, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld affirmative action, which used race as part of an admissions plan within a law school to achieve a diverse student body (Grutter v. Bollinger). However, the same court struck down an affirmative action plan at the undergraduate level where points were awarded on the basis of race in admissions (Gratz v. Bollinger).

It is notably, however, that although de jure segregation has been all but eliminated, de facto segregation is still present within American society. Some argue that the most segregated hour of the week still remains during the Sunday morning church hour, and that residential patterns still indicate separation of the races on the basis of housing. In addition, questions regarding policies such as affirmative action and legislative redistricting using factors such as race indicate that racial classifications are still present in American society.

J. MICHAEL BITZER

References and Further Reading

- Chafe, William H., Raymond Gavins, and Robert Korstad, eds. Remembering Jim Crow: African Americans Tell About Life in the Segregated South. New York: The New Press.
- Dailey, Jane, Glenda Elizabeth Gilmore, and Bryant Simon. Jumpin' Jim Crow: Southern Politics From Civil War to Civil Rights. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 2001.
- Douglas, Davison M. Jim Crow Moves North: The Battle over Northern School Segregation, 1865–1954. New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005.
- Fireside, Harvey. Separate and Unequal: Homer Plessy and the Supreme Court Decision that Legalized Racism. New York: Carroll & Graf, 2004.
- Graham, Hugh Davis. The Civil Rights Era: Origins and Development of National Policy 1960–1972. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Hale, Grace Elizabeth. Making Whiteness: The Culture of Segregation in the South, 1890–1940. New York: Vintage, 1998.
- Klarman, Michael J. From Jim Crow to Civil Rights: the Supreme Court and the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Oxford University Press, 2004.
- Kluger, Richard. Simple Justice: The History of Brown v. Board of Education and Black America's Struggle for Equality. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 2004.
- Kotz, Nick. Judgment Days: Lyndon Baines Johnson, Martin Luther King, Jr., and the Laws that Changed America. New York: Houghton-Mifflin, 2005.
- Lawson, Stephen F. Black Ballots: Voting Rights in the South, 1944–1969. New York: Columbia University Press, 1976.
- Litwack, Leon F. Trouble in Mind: Black Southerners in the Age of Jim Crow. New York: Vintage, 1998.
- Loevy, Robert D. Civil Rights Act of 1964: The Passage of the Law that Ended Racial Segregation. Albany: State University of New York Press, 1997.
- Mann, Robert. The Walls of Jericho: Lyndon Johnson, Hubert Humphrey, Richard Russell and the Struggle for Civil Rights. New York: Harcourt Brace, 1996.
- Murray, Pauli, ed. States' Laws on Race and Color. Athens, GA: University of Georgia Press, 1997.
- Smith, J. Douglas. Managing White Supremacy: Race, Politics, and Citizenship in Jim Crow Virginia. Chapel Hill: The University of North Carolina Press, 2002.
- Smith, John David. When Did Southern Segregation Begin? New York: Bedford/St. Martins, 2002.

- Smith, Jessie C., and Carrell Peterson Horton, eds. Historical Statistics of Black America. New York: Gale Group, 1995.
- Tushnet, Mark V. The NAACP's Legal Strategy against Segregated Education, 1925–1950. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 2005.
- Woodward, C. Vann. The Strange Career of Jim Crow. New York: Oxford University Press, 1974.
- www.brownvboard.org.
- www.jimcrowhistory.org.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bakke v. Regents of the University of California*, 438 U.S. 265 (1978)
- Boynton v. Virginia*, 364 U.S. 454 (1960)
- Brown v. Board of Education of Topeka, KS* 347 U.S. 483 (1954)
- Buchanan v. Warley*, 245 U.S. 60 (1917)
- Civil Rights Cases*, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
- Gong Lum v. Rice*, 274 U.S. 78 (1927)
- Gratz v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 244 (2003)
- Gutter v. Bollinger*, 539 U.S. 306 (2003)
- Henderson v. United States*, 339 U.S. 816 (1950)
- Missouri ex rel Gaines v. Canada*, 305 U.S. 337 (1938)
- Moore v. Dempsey*, 261 U.S. 86 (1923)
- Pearson v. Murray*, 182 A. 590 (Md. 1936)
- Perez v. Lippold*, 32 Cal. 2d 711 (1948)
- Plessy v. Ferguson*, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)
- Roberts v. City of Boston*, 59 Mass. 198 (1849)
- Shelley v. Kraemer*, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)
- Swann v. Charlotte-Mecklenburg Board of Education*, 402 U.S. 1 (1971)
- San Antonio Independent School District v. Rodriguez*, 411 U.S. 1 (1973)

SEIZURES

The Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution states that “[t]he right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.” As construed by the U.S. Supreme Court, this language means that if a government action is considered a “search” or a “seizure,” it must either be authorized by a warrant issued by a magistrate, or—in emergency situations or for lesser intrusions—there must some other reasonable justification for the action. However, if the government’s action is not a search or a seizure, then the Fourth Amendment is not implicated. Thus, the definition of these two words is crucial in determining the scope of protection from government efforts to investigate crime and other activities. This entry discusses the definition of seizure and the rules that govern seizures.

The Definition of Seizure

According to the Supreme Court, a person is seized for purposes of the Fourth Amendment if a reasonable innocent person, under the same circumstances, would not feel free to terminate the encounter (Michigan v. Chesternut, 1988; Florida v. Bostick, 1991). Applying this test, the Court has held that a seizure occurs when police stop and frisk an individual (Adams v. Williams, 1972), when plainclothes officers confront someone at an airport, ask for the person’s identification and plane ticket and do not return them (Florida v. Royer, 1983), and when cars are stopped at a roadblock, even momentarily (United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 1976). On the other hand, no seizure occurs when a person agrees to accompany an officer to where his colleagues are being questioned by another officer (Florida v. Rodriguez, 1984), when persons are briefly questioned at their place of work by armed officers (INS v. Delgado, 1984), or when a person is briefly questioned by armed officers on a bus and asked if his or her luggage can be searched (United States v. Drayton, 2002). In each of these last three cases, the Court viewed the encounter as consensual.

Most people probably do not feel free to leave when confronted by an identified police officer, even if the encounter is casual. The Court has nonetheless held to the contrary to avoid unduly restricting the police. The Court seems to agree with the commentary to the American Law Institute’s Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure, which states that police should be allowed to undertake brief suspicionless detentions “to seek cooperation, even where this may involve inconvenience or embarrassment for the citizen, and even though many citizens will defer to this authority of the police because they believe—in some vague way—that they should.”

Arrest

The requirements imposed by the Fourth Amendment when a seizure occurs vary depending on the nature of the seizure. If the action is an arrest, then probable cause must exist. Probable cause is akin to a more-likely-than-not finding, but does not require proof beyond a reasonable doubt, the standard the prosecution must meet to secure conviction at trial. If the arrest is in the home, a warrant is required, and if it occurs in a third party’s home, then both an arrest warrant and a search warrant (based on probable cause to believe the suspect is in the third party’s home), are required, unless exigent circumstances exist. The best example of exigent circumstances is when the police are in hot pursuit of a suspect. If the arrest is not authorized by a warrant, the police must promptly bring the arrestee in front of a magistrate, normally within forty-eight hours of arrest.

Sometimes it is not clear whether police have made an arrest. Obviously, a statement that “You are under arrest,” accompanied by handcuffs and transportation to the station, constitutes an arrest. The Court has also held that an arrest also occurs when police ask an individual to come to the police station and subject him to an hour-long interrogation preceded by Miranda warnings, as well as when police take a seventeen-year-old boy from his house at 3:00 a.m., barefoot and in his underwear, after telling him “we need to go and talk.” Detentions outside the station house can also constitute an arrest. For instance, questioning a suspect for fifteen minutes in a small room off an airport concourse requires probable cause, as does detaining the occupants of a house for forty-five minutes.

On the other hand, a twenty-minute detention of the suspect and his car on a public thoroughfare does not require probable cause, at least when the length of the detention is partly due to the defendant’s attempts to evade police. Nor is probable cause required for a sixteen-hour detention, designed to wait out a suspected “drug balloon swallower” who refused to defecate, at least when it occurs at the international border, where constitutional protections have historically been diminished. The Court has also intimated that if the purpose of removing someone from his or her home is to obtain fingerprints rather than interrogate, probable cause is not necessary, although a judicial order may be.

Stops

A seizure that falls short of an arrest usually requires reasonable suspicion, a level of certainty below probable cause, but one that still requires an articulable suspicion that criminal activity is afoot, rather than a mere hunch (Terry v. Ohio, 1968). Thus, the detentions in the three cases just described all required reasonable suspicion. The most common type of detention authorized on reasonable suspicion is the investigative stop, which involves police attempts to investigate suspicious activity that has not yet resulted in criminal action.

A number of Supreme Court cases help clarify the difference between probable cause, reasonable suspicion, and situations in which the police have insufficient suspicion for a seizure of any type. In Terry v. Ohio, (1968), an officer saw two men pausing to stare in a store window roughly twenty-four times, consult with one another after passing by the store, and on one occasion consult with a third person who left swiftly and then rejoined them a few blocks away. The Court indicated that, although probable cause to arrest did not exist on these facts, the officer’s suspicion that criminal activity was afoot was reasonable, and thus a stop and frisk could take place. Similarly, in Illinois v. Wardlow (2000), the police had reasonable suspicion, but not probable cause, when they saw the defendant standing on a corner in an area known for heavy drug trafficking look in their direction and begin running away from them. In United States v. Arvizu (2002), reasonable suspicion, but not probable cause, existed when the driver of a van registered to a residence known for its association with drug smuggling was seen driving on a dirt road often traveled by drug smugglers, along a route that made little sense for normal travelers; the agent also noted that the driver failed to acknowledge him and that the children in the van waved oddly and had their knees in a raised position as if resting on something.

In contrast, in Sibron v. New York, (1968), the Court held that the “mere act of talking to a number of known addicts” and reaching into one’s pocket does not give police reasonable suspicion that would justify a stop and a frisk of the pocket. Nor did police have reasonable suspicion when they observed an individual and another man in a “high crime” area walking away from one another when they saw the police, or when they received an anonymous tip that a young black male, standing at a particular bus stop and wearing a plain shirt, would be carrying a gun. In Reid v. Georgia, (1980), the Court found that reasonable suspicion did not exist when agents saw a person get off a plane from Ft. Lauderdale (a supposed drug source) with no luggage other than a shoulder bag, apparently make efforts to conceal he was traveling with someone else, and occasionally looked back at that person. In contrast, the Court found reasonable suspicion (but not probable cause) when, in addition to the types of facts that existed in Reid, agents noted that the individual paid for his ticket with cash and that he was traveling under an assumed name (Florida v. Royer, 1983).

There is no easy way to summarize the Court’s decisions in this area, which are all very fact specific. Although the Court is quite willing to provide the police significant leeway in engaging in preventive and investigative stops, it also has tried to avoid holdings that would allow seizure of large numbers of innocent individuals on the basis of hunches, random guesses, or highly suspect information. Thus, in addition to the decisions just discussed, it has struck down on vagueness grounds a number of loitering and vagrancy statutes that allow seizures of individuals who are standing in or frequenting a place police think they should leave.

Unfortunately, research suggests that, despite these types of decisions, arbitrary seizures take place on a routine basis. Members of minority communities seem to be particularly likely targets of “aggressive patrolling” strategies that attempt to prevent and inhibit criminal activity, to the point where “driving while black” and “walking while black” have become popular phrases for describing the focus of frontline law enforcement. The laxness of the reasonable suspicion standard may be partly to blame. But also contributing to this state of affairs is the fact that the primary means of enforcing the Fourth Amendment is exclusion of illegally seized evidence, a remedy that comes into play only when prosecution occurs and that has only an indirect effect on police. Very often the intent of police making stops is simply to inhibit criminal activity and seize weapons or drugs, not to charge, so the threat of exclusion does not affect them. If and when they do press charges, the failure to obtain a conviction because of the exclusionary rule hurts the prosecutor much more than it affects the police.

Profiling

Another way of controlling police discretion is to formalize the grounds for stops through reliance on empirically based profiles that indicate the type of behavior most likely to be predictive of criminal behavior. Law enforcement agencies have developed airplane hijacker, drug courier, and terrorist profiles in an attempt to aid identification of criminals. For instance, agents purported to be relying on a drug courier profile in both Reid and Royer, the airport cases described previously. The Drug Enforcement Administration claims that its profile results in discovery of drug-related crime in connection with more than 30 percent of the stops made pursuant to it, a “success rate” that might be sufficient for reasonable suspicion (but not for probable cause, which presumably would require a success rate closer to 50 percent).

These profiles are problematic for a number of reasons, however. First, they seem to be ad hoc; the profile factors used by agents in drug courier cases, for instance, seem to change from case to case. Second, even assuming the factors are consistent, they are not always all present in a given case, meaning that the statistical justification for their use, which is based on the presence of all the factors, disappears. Third, use of the profiles allows stops of large numbers of people at airports, on the highways, and in other public places, a large percentage of whom, by definition, are not engaged in criminal activity. Although the definition of reasonable suspicion suggests that a substantial proportion of “misses” is permissible, profiles expose dramatically the amount of discretion that standard affords police.

Seizures Short of a Stop

Sometimes a detention is considered so minor that, even though it is a seizure, neither probable cause nor reasonable suspicion is required. For instance, in United States v. Martinez-Fuerte (1976), the Court held that roadblocks set up to detect illegal immigration effect seizures both at the initial stop and at the referral to a secondary checkpoint to scrutinize citizenship documents. But it also held that neither seizure requires reasonable suspicion, because the initial stop generally lasts only a few seconds, long enough for an immigration official to survey the occupants of the car, and the document check takes approximately five minutes. Similarly, stopping motorists at a sobriety checkpoint is permissible without any individualized suspicion, because of the “magnitude of the drunk driving crisis” and the minimal intrusion associated with the roadblock. However, a roadblock away from the border, set up solely for the purpose of implementing “a general interest in crime control” and not involving an “immediate, vehicle-bound threat to life and limb,” is impermissible in the absence of individualized suspicion of each driver stopped.

Police may also order the driver of a car validly stopped for a violation of traffic laws to exit the vehicle. Although such an order effects a seizure, the Supreme Court held that the intrusion is de minimus, because a restriction of liberty will occur whether or not the individual stays in the car, and exiting the car exposes little more of the individual. For the same reasons, police can order passengers out of a validly stopped car. Similarly, a brief detention of a driver who has been given a ticket and had his license handed back is permissible to ask him whether he has illicit items in his car.

Finally, the Court has held that there are certain “special needs” situations, where the primary purpose of the government is something other than enforcement of the criminal law, that permit a seizure on less than reasonable suspicion. For instance, the seizure necessary to carry out drug testing at workplaces or in schools is permissible on a random basis, as long as the government can show that there is a significant drug problem that needs to be addressed and the drug testing procedure is otherwise reasonable.

Seizures of Property

The Fourth Amendment also governs seizures of property. The Court has held that a seizure of property occurs when there is some “meaningful interference” with an individual’s possessory interest. Putting a tracking device in a can of ether belonging to a suspect is not a seizure, but destroying a portion of a suspect’s drugs is. Generally, a seizure is permissible if there is probable cause, which will usually exist if the search that allows discovery of the item is valid (because a valid search usually requires probable cause).

Occasionally, however, a seizure of property will occur independently of a search. Again, probable cause is usually required for such a seizure, although a warrant is usually not. Cars may be seized under a lawful impoundment policy, luggage may be seized when there is probable cause to believe it contains evidence, and even a residence may be “seized” if the police have probable cause to believe it contains criminal evidence and need time to obtain a warrant.

A number of states have also passed statutes requiring forfeiture of property that has a nexus to criminal activity. For instance, the federal forfeiture statute, 21 U.S.C. § 881(a), permits government confiscation of drugs, drug paraphernalia, and any personal or real property used to carry out drug sales and manufacture, as well as any money obtained in its sale. The Supreme Court has generally upheld such statutes, although confiscation of assets far out of proportion to the crime committed may be a violation of the “excessive fines” clause of the Eighth Amendment.

CHRISTOPHER SLOBOGIN

References and Further Reading

- American Law Institute. A Model Code of Pre-Arrest Procedure. Philadelphia: American Law Institute, 1975.
- Cloud, Morgan, Search and Seizure by the Numbers: The Drug Courier Profile and Judicial Review of Investigative Formulas, Boston University Law Review 65 (1985): 843.
- Harris, David A., Particularized Suspicion, Categorical Judgments: Supreme Court Rhetoric versus Lower Court Reality Under Terry v. Ohio, St. John’s Law Review 72 (1998): 975–1023.
- LaFave, Wayne, “Seizures” Typology: Classifying Detentions of the Person to Resolve Warrant, Grounds, and Search Issues, University of Michigan Journal of Law Reform 17 (1984): 409–463.

Maclin, Tracey, The Decline of the Right of Locomotion: The Fourth Amendment on the Streets, Cornell Law Review 75 (1990): 1258–1337.

———, “Black and Blue Encounters”—Some Preliminary Thoughts about Fourth Amendment Seizures: Should Race Matter, Valparaiso Law Review 26 (1991): 243.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Adams v. Williams*, 407 U.S. 143 (1972)
- Florida v. Bostick*, 501 U.S. 429 (1991)
- Florida v. Rodriguez*, 469 U.S. 1 (1984)
- Florida v. Royer*, 460 U.S. 491 (1983)
- Illinois v. Wardlow*, 528 U.S. 119 (2000)
- INS v. Delgado*, 466 U.S. 210 (1984)
- Michigan v. Chesternut*, 486 U.S. 567 (1988)
- Reid v. Georgia*, 448 U.S. 438 (1980)
- Sibron v. New York*, 392 U.S. 40 (1968)
- Terry v. Ohio*, 392 U.S. 1, 88 S.Ct. 1868 (1968)
- United States v. Arvizu*, 534 U.S. 266 (2002)
- United States v. Drayton*, 536 U.S. 194 (2002)
- United States v. Martinez-Fuerte*, 428 U.S. 543 (1976)

See also Arrest; Arrest without a Warrant; Calero-Toledo v. Pearson Yacht Leasing Co., 416 U.S. 663 (1974); Chicago v. Morales, 527 U.S. 41 (1999); Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979); Exclusionary Rule; Gerstein v. Pugh, 420 U.S. 103 (1975); Kolender v. Lawson, 461 U.S. 352 (1983); Michigan v. Summers, 452 U.S. 692 (1981); Michigan Department of State Police v. Sitz, 496 U.S. 444 (1990); Papachristou v. City of Jacksonville, 405 U.S. 156 (1972); Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980); Probable Cause; Profiling (including DWB); Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980); Reid v. Georgia, 448 U.S. 438 (1980); Search Warrants; Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives’ Association, 489 U.S. 602 (1989); South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975); United States v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 (1990); Vernonia School District v. Acton, Inc., 445 U.S. 208 (1980)

SELECTIVE DRAFT CASES (1918), SELECTIVE SERVICE ACT OF 1917

Shortly after his message asking Congress to declare war on Germany in April 1917, Wilson sent Congress a measure providing for the drafting of young men into the army. There had never been national conscription of this sort before, and although Congress enacted the measure, opponents, quickly took the issue to the courts, where it was upheld under the government’s war powers.

Despite their resentment at Wilson’s high-handedness, members of Congress recognized that conscription would be necessary, and on May 17, 1917, Congress enacted Wilson’s draft law, which opponents of the war immediately challenged. Lower courts expedited the various draft cases; men could not be allowed to die should the law be unconstitutional, nor could the government's mobilization be derailed if it were valid. Six suits, grouped together as the Selective Draft Law Cases came before the Supreme Court for argument in December 1917. All involved convictions for obstructing or resisting conscription.

Harris F. Taylor, the chief counsel for the defendants, berated Congress for expanding the executive power. Wilson had already become a political dictator, Taylor charged, and his decision to commit American troops abroad—a power nowhere found in the Constitution—had plunged the country into a military dictatorship as well. Taylor claimed that the militia clause (Article I, Section 8) limited their use “to execute the Laws of the Union, suppress Insurrections and repel Invasions.” Militia troops could not be used, therefore, to prosecute foreign conflicts.

The Court handed down its decision the first week of January 1918; in almost summary fashion, it unanimously dismissed all the arguments raised against the law. Chief Justice Edward White noted Congress's explicit powers in Article I to “provide for the common Defence,” “to raise and support Armies,” “to provide and maintain a Navy,” and “to declare War.” “As the mind cannot conceive an army without the men to compose it,” White asserted, “on the face of the Constitution the objection that it does not give power to provide for such men would seem too frivolous for further notice.” The Court also made short shrift of the argument that the Constitution only allowed a volunteer army and did not authorize conscription. The Chief Justice noted that just as the government owed certain obligations to its citizens, so the people had reciprocal duties to the state, including rendering military service, which the government could compel. Beyond that, Congress could deploy the army anywhere it deemed necessary, even overseas.

Most Americans had expected the Court to sustain the draft law. Yet even if the antidraft arguments failed to persuade a single member of the Court, they did raise at least two issues that would eventually receive more serious attention.

First, the act allowed the president to delegate nearly all the tasks involved in selecting and processing the conscripts to local draft boards. The Court had held laws involving delegation of powers constitutional ever since the question first came before it in Field v. Clark (1892), but none of the previous statutes had been as vague in prescribing guidance or oversight. In the various war statutes Congress merely set out general goals and gave the president carte blanche to carry them out. At some point, the Court would have to determine how much power Congress could delegate and how much discretion the president could exercise.

A second issue involved the generous exemption from the draft that Congress allowed ordained ministers and theology students, as well as exemption from combat granted to members of some sects that opposed war on religious grounds. The Court shrugged off a challenge that this provision violated the First Amendment because it amounted to an establishment of religion. White casually derided the unsoundness of the claim as well as a collateral argument that the limited exemptions violated the free exercise clause. In the future, the Court would wrestle with the problem of conscientious objectors in a number of cases.

MELVIN I. UROFSKY

References and Further Reading

Chambers, John Whiteclay, II. To Raise an Army: The Draft Comes to Modern America. New York: Free Press, 1987.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Field v. Clark, 143 U.S. 649 (1892)
Selective Draft Law Cases (Arver v. United States), 245 U.S. 366 (1918)

SELF-DEFENSE

Although unfettered in the state of nature, an individual's right to use force on another individual is largely ceded to the state. But the state's monopoly on the legitimate use of force is not absolute. Because the state cannot always prevent aggression, an individual retains the right to use force in self-defense. But this right is also not absolute, because the state owes a duty to protect the autonomy of all its citizens, aggressors and defenders alike. The law of self-defense reflects the attempt to balance the competing interests of aggressor and defender as well as the state's goals of preventing crime and suppressing vigilantism.

Although jurisdictions will vary as to how this balance is best struck, self-defense is widely accepted where: (1) an innocent victim, (2) uses minimally necessary, (3) proportional, and (4) nonlethal force, (5) with the purpose of self-protection, (6) against what the innocent victim reasonably believes, (7) is a wrongful aggressor, (8) posing a present or imminent unlawful threat, (9) from which a safe retreat cannot be effected, and (10) the victim's defensive force does not endanger any innocent bystanders. Although jointly sufficient in nearly all jurisdictions, none of these are necessary conditions for self-defense in all jurisdictions. Which particular conditions a jurisdiction will require is a function of the subjective assessment of the optimal balance between maximally protecting the autonomy of innocent defenders while minimally disrupting the state's near monopoly on legitimate force. This subjective assessment varies over time and is shaped by changing tides of cultural, geographical, social, racial, and gender-based perceptions of crime and violence.

Although seemingly a fundamental and inalienable right, self-defense is curiously not an express constitutional right. Recent attempts to argue that self-defense is an implicit, even if unenumerated, constitutional right have been rebuffed in two federal appellate decisions. In both cases, prisoners sought to defend against charges of violating prison rules prohibiting fighting among inmates by claiming their use of force was only in self-defense. While conceding the possibility of the validity of their claims of self-defense, the courts cited the overriding imperative of maintaining discipline in prison and ruled that there was simply no constitutional right to self-defense.

Perhaps the most currently contested aspect of self-defense law is implicated in the plight of women battered by their husbands. Typically smaller and weaker than their husbands, battered women's ability to use effective self-protection is hampered by the traditional limitations that defensive force be proportional and used only against an imminent attack. When nonlethal attacks are imminent, the proportionality requirement limits the wife to also using nonlethal force. But because of a size and strength disparity, nonlethal defensive force may be ineffective in thwarting the attack. But if a battered woman waits until such force might be effective, for example, when the husband is sleeping, the woman's defensive force runs afoul of the imminence requirement. Although most states have recognized battered women's syndrome evidence to partially alleviate the difficulty, many states continue to strictly construe the right of self-defense.

RUSSELL L. CHRISTOPHER

References and Further Reading

- Dressler, Joshua. Understanding Criminal Law. 3rd Ed. Newark: LexisNexis, 2001.
- Fletcher, George P. A Crime of Self-Defense: Bernhard Goetz and the Law on Trial. New York: The Free Press, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Rowe v. DeBruyn*, 17 F.3d 1047 (7th Cir. 1994)
- State v. Norman*, 378 S.E.2d 8 (N.C. 1989)

See also Domestic Violence; Martin v. Ohio, 480 U.S. 228 (1987); Patterson v. New York, 432 U.S. 197 (1977); Proof beyond a Reasonable Doubt

SELF-FULFILLMENT THEORY OF FREE SPEECH

Scholars and jurists have offered many theories to explain why freedom of speech is an especially important constitutional right. The "marketplace of ideas" metaphor, which justifies freedom of speech on the notion that competition in the marketplace of ideas is the best test of truth, is perhaps the most famous example. The "self-governance" rationale, which links the importance of freedom of speech to the democratic process, is another. A third prominent rationale is the "self-fulfillment" theory. This may also at times be described as the "human dignity" rationale, or the "self-realization" theory.

Under the "self-fulfillment" theory, free speech may be justified as an end itself, an end intimately intertwined with human autonomy and dignity. In Procunier v. Martinez, for example, the Supreme Court noted that—"The First Amendment serves not only the needs of the polity but the needs of the human spirit—a spirit that demands self-expression." The self-fulfillment rationale justifies the protection of freedom of speech for reasons that are not connected directly to the collective search for truth or the processes of self-government, or for any other conceptualization of the common good. As Professor C. Edwin Baker thus explains the theory, "Speech is protected not as a means of a collective good but because of the value of speech conduct to the individual." Freedom of speech is thus deemed a right to defiantly, robustly, and irreverently speak one's mind just because it is one's mind. The fulfillment that comes from speech is bonded to man's capacity to think, imagine, and create. The linkage of speech to thought, to man's central capacity to reason and wonder, justifies placing it beyond the routine jurisdiction of the state. As the Supreme Court explained in Stanley v. Georgia, the "right to think is the beginning of freedom, and speech must be protected from the government because speech is the beginning of thought."

RODNEY A. SMOLLA

References and Further Reading

- Baker, C. Edwin, Scope of First Amendment Freedom of Speech, U.C.L.A. Law Review 25 (1978): 964, 966.
- Smolla, Rodney. Free Speech in an Open Society. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1992.
- . Suing the Press: Libel, the Media, and Power. New York: Oxford University Press, 1986.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396 (1974)
Stanley v. Georgia, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

SELF-GOVERNANCE AND FREE SPEECH

The free speech clause of the First Amendment is not self-defining. Although Congress is required to “make no law” that “abridges the freedom of speech,” a principle that also applies to state and local governments through the process of incorporation, precisely what this prohibition includes is open to debate. Despite what might seem to be its plain textual meaning, the clause cannot signify that government is incapable of making any law that limits or penalizes expressive communication. Such a view would void many widely accepted criminal statutes, such as those proscribing child pornography, blackmail, and incitement to violence, or many common civil regulations, such as truth-in-advertising rules and other limits on commercial speech, or tort actions for defamation. The First Amendment is not a charter for total government inaction in the communicative context, nor was it intended to be, as early constitutional history makes clear, notably the Sedition Act of 1798. Indeed, on its own terms, the Amendment prohibits government from abridging not “speech” but rather “the freedom of speech,” a phrase that embraces only a limited subset of all possible expression—and that requires a principled framework of interpretation to give it content.

Some scholars and jurists have sought to develop this framework by defining “the freedom of speech” in relation to the underlying aims free speech can be said to serve. In this approach, one among many theories of free speech protection, defining the positive constitutional value of speech can help determine as a negative limit what the First Amendment protects against government infringement. Over the course of the twentieth century, three main views on the subject have emerged: that free speech is indispensable for individual autonomy and self-fulfillment; that it facilitates the search for various forms of truth, especially in social and political matters; and that it is essential for democratic deliberation and self-governance. These positions often overlap in legal advocacy and judicial reasoning, and they are not mutually exclusive, but they are distinct and, whether in a First Amendment jurisprudence of absolutism or balancing, they suggest that different levels of judicial protection should be afforded to different types of speech. Before turning to the justification for protecting speech based on the goal of self-governance—the rationale most widely accepted but, at the same time, generally viewed as too narrow in its protective reach—it is necessary to consider in turn the other two commonly asserted values of free expression.

The view that free speech is necessary for self-fulfillment would grant the widest possible scope of judicial protection for expressive activity. Under this approach, grounded in the value of speech to individuals, the Constitution protects expression to provide the conditions necessary for individuals to decide how to live for themselves, according to their own lights. Only a fully libertarian speech community, the argument runs, will enable as many individuals as possible to achieve their desired ends. Such libertarian openness is especially significant for those whose views about the proper conduct of life require dissident forms of personal expression; but whether or not individuals actually choose to engage in speech frowned on by majorities, having the chance to do so without the sanction of law affirms the general moral ideal of individual liberty on which republican principles of the pursuit of happiness are based. Moreover, from the perspective not of individual speakers but rather of listeners, a fully open expressive environment enables individuals to shape their lives most effectively by facilitating the widest possible range of views and personal styles to take as their standard, from the politically weighty to the aesthetically frivolous. The self-fulfillment argument for free speech thus provides a strong basis for protecting not only political speech, literature, and the arts, and radical, nonideational forms of expression such as nude dancing, pornography, or obscenity, but also commercial speech, an important source of information and opinion.

The argument that free speech is necessary for the effective search for truth is rooted in John Milton’s assertion in Aeropagitica (1644) that prior restraint of dissenting religious views was based on a misperception of the ability of Christian truth ultimately to triumph over error: “Let her and Falsehood grapple; who ever knew Truth put to the worst, in a free and open encounter?” This principle of Protestant dissent was easily adapted to secular utilitarian approaches to speech in Victorian Britain—in his classic On Liberty (1859), John Stuart Mill argued that dissident opinions be protected so that society could derive the benefit that comes from engaging with them—and to judicial arguments concerning political radicalism in the early-twentieth-century United States, as in the dissent of Justice Holmes in Abrams v. United States (1919). Under this truth-based model, the First Amendment protects speech not so much to advance the moral autonomy of the speaker or listener but rather to ensure the correct outcome of serious debate about society and politics. This view would protect a narrower range of speech than the self-fulfillment rationale—fewer modes and subjects of expression contribute to the search for Truth than are necessary for the full exercise of individual autonomy (for instance, from a truth-based rationale, it would be difficult to justify the absolute protection of commercial speech or of expression that does not contain ideas per se, such as pornography), but some forms of highly controversial speech would receive notable judicial solicitude, especially the antiliberal political advocacy of subversive organizations.

The third position, whose core arguments are widely acknowledged to be consistent with American constitutional principles, although not coextensive with them, asserts that speech has constitutional value especially when it contributes to the orderly discussion of government affairs. From this perspective, the Constitution protects two different types of speech based on two distinct legal mandates. Speech that contributes to democratic decisionmaking, soberly advancing views about political issues, receives absolute judicial protection under the First Amendment; other speech is subject to a greater degree of regulation according to the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment principle of due process. In the view of Alexander Meiklejohn, the most prominent modern champion of the argument, the pedigree of this valuation of speech is ancient, extending back to Socratic ideals of public discourse about virtue and obedience to the law (“if the Apology had not been written . . . the First Amendment would not have been written”). The argument also has a distinctive basis in the democratic principles inaugurated by the American constitutional experiment. As Cass Sunstein has asserted, the popular sovereignty that grounds the United States as a republic presupposes the fully open discussion of issues of public concern. The speech protected by the First Amendment thus is that which makes possible the functioning of the government the Constitution itself established; the free speech clause is that part of the Constitution that safeguards its foundations. As an axiom of democratic government, the view that political speech lies at the core of constitutional protection is broadly accepted.

Meiklejohn famously illustrated his understanding of the value of speech through a portrait, often criticized as an idealization, of the American town meeting, one that also resembles a university seminar in its dialogic principles. “What, then, does the First Amendment forbid?” Meiklejohn asks in Free Speech and Its Relation to Self-Government (1948). “[The town meeting] is called to discuss and, on the basis of such discussion, to decide matters of public policy. For example, shall there be a school? Where shall it be located? Who shall teach? What shall be taught? The community has agreed that such questions as these shall be freely discussed and that, when the discussion is ended, decision upon them will be made by a vote of the citizens. Now, in that method of political self-government, the point of ultimate interest is not the words of the speakers, but the minds of the hearers. The final aim of the meeting is the voting of wise decisions. The voters, therefore, must be made as wise as possible . . . Both facts and interests must be given in such a way that all the alternative lines of action can be wisely measured in relation to one another. As the self-governing community seeks, by the method of voting, to gain wisdom in action, it can find it only in the minds of its individual citizens. If they fail, it fails. That is why freedom of discussion for those minds may not be abridged.” From this perspective, speech is protected by the First Amendment not to advance individual self-fulfillment nor to achieve the outcome of social or political truth, but instead, most importantly, to maintain the collective democratic process (which, in theory, serves “wisdom” by enabling the full airing of opinion).

Two issues typically are raised concerning Meiklejohn’s approach to speech. First, as much as his core goal to protect political speech is acknowledged as fundamental to the Constitution, many see the reach of his theory as insufficiently broad. Most immediately, critics have suggested that viewing speech as important primarily for its role in democratic deliberation provides government too much latitude to abridge nonpolitical expression. The First Amendment, commentators assert, protects far more than the publication of party platforms. What of the arts, for instance? To this assertion, Meiklejohn responded, in a manner widely viewed as unsatisfying, that many other forms of expression provide grist from which “the voter derives the knowledge, intelligence, [and] sensitivity to human values . . . which, so far as possible, a ballot should express”—thus literature and the arts should be protected by the First Amendment, in his view, because “they lead the way toward sensitive and informed appreciation and response to the values out of which the riches of the general welfare are created.” At the same time, though Meiklejohn took a liberal position in the domestic ideological battles of the Cold War (he describes the body that condemned Socrates as “a kind of un-Athenian Subversive Activities Committee”), some have asserted that the self-governance argument legitimizes government restrictions not only on the time, place, and manner of speech—which Meiklejohn approved, so that expression would accord with deliberative ideals—but also its political content. According to Robert Bork, for instance, it justifies government in prohibiting speech that advocates its own overthrow or “the violation of any law.”

The second issue concerns the extent to which the self-governance theory justifies state regulation of expression to promote democratic ends. On this view, associated especially with Owen Fiss, the principles that underlie the First Amendment justify the intervention of the state into the expressive arena to structure public discourse in ways that enhance democracy or achieve values the Constitution affirmatively demands, such as racial antisubordination. Arguments of this type are consistent with Meiklejohn’s original principles but they are advanced in a political context in which liberals view not Joseph McCarthy but rather structural inequality as the primary obstacle to democratic life, and thus in which they demand not a libertarian but rather an interventionist political agenda on behalf of their ideals. This approach is especially salient in the arena of campaign finance reform, where it is asserted that some abridgements of speech would safeguard the true “freedom of speech” contemplated by the First Amendment, and they have been a source of appeal for the Supreme Court in justifying public media regulation in Red Lion Broadcasting. In the view of Robert Post, such “collectivist” arguments typically fail to recognize that “the value of individual autonomy is inseparable from the very aspiration for self-government.” They also rest on a set of broad assumptions that deserve careful scrutiny, especially the notion that the distinction between public and private speech has become incoherent, and that public discourse cannot plausibly be viewed as an open dialogue between free, autonomous persons given the economic inequalities of the political arena. Future advocates of the self-governance approach to free speech will confront these and other criticisms as they maintain this tradition of analysis as a vibrant component of constitutional theory beyond its sixtieth year.

MARK S. WEINER

References and Further Reading

- Bork, Robert H., Neutral Principles and Some First Amendment Problems, Indiana Law Journal 47 (1971): 1: 1–35.
 Fiss, Owen, Free Speech and Social Structure, Iowa Law Review 71 (1986): 5: 1405–1425.
 Meiklejohn, Alexander, The First Amendment in an Absolute, Supreme Court Review 1961 (1961): 245–266.
 ———, Political Freedom: The Constitutional Powers of the People. New York: Harper & Brothers, 1960.
 Post, Robert, “Meiklejohn’s Mistake: Individual Autonomy and the Reform of Public Discourse.” In Constitutional Domains. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1995.

 Sunstein, Cass. Democracy and the Problem of Free Speech. New York: The Free Press, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Red Lion Broadcasting Co., Inc. v. Federal Communications Commission, 395 U.S. 367 (1969)

SELF-INCRIMINATION (V): HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

European, Colonial, and Constitutional Background

In the Roman Catholic Church’s campaign against heresy on the European continent in the late Middle Ages, ecclesiastical courts used the oath ex officio, by which suspects were required to swear to answer truthfully all questions that might be posed, without knowing the accusers, the charges, or the evidence. Refusal to take the oath resulted in condemnation as guilty, and acquiescence posed great risks of self-incrimination or punishment for perjury. Because perjury courted eternal damnation even if temporally unpunished, the oath was a powerful incentive for self-incrimination.

At about the same time, ecclesiastical courts in England, exercising jurisdiction over many secular offenses as well as church matters, sometimes imposed the oath ex officio and, more menacingly, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries so did the Court of High Commission (focused on heresy but able to impose civil as well as spiritual penalties) and the Court of Star Chamber (a secular court focused on political as well as criminal offenses). These courts also acknowledged, however, an opposing principle, nemo tenetur prodere seipsum (or nemo tenetur seipsum accusare)—no man should be compelled to betray (or accuse) himself. This principle arose not so much as a right of the accused as a means of requiring a credible basis for charges beyond the suspect’s own words; it stood in opposition to the obligation to answer under the oath ex officio but was restricted in application and not a sure safeguard.

The courts of High Commission and Star Chamber were abolished in 1641 and the oath ex officio died out, but criminal defendants in common-law courts still faced aggressive pretrial questioning by magistrates and trial questioning by prosecutors and judges; at neither point were they under oath, but their words (or refusal to speak) could be used against them. Although the practice of trial questioning gradually died out, the absence of defense attorneys meant that the only defense available was to speak on one's own behalf. An effective right to silence did not begin to emerge in England until the late eighteenth century, when trial procedures began to be revolutionized and a norm of excluding involuntary confessions (if only because they might be untrue) began to take hold.

Similar conditions prevailed in the American colonies, including the conflict between the ex officio and nemo tenetur principles. Heightened antipathy to British mechanisms of oppression, including use of the oath ex officio in prerogative courts, led all the newly independent states in the years after 1776 to embody in constitution, bill of rights, or common law some explicit or implicit recognition of a right not to incriminate oneself. When the Bill of Rights was added to the new federal constitution, there was no significant debate over inclusion of the Fifth Amendment provision that "No person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself." These state and federal provisions formalized rather than reformed best current procedure, however, and did not entail the privilege against self-incrimination as we know it. They precluded torture and some other coercive forms of interrogation, and incriminating interrogation under oath—but unlike witnesses, defendants were not under oath at trial. They remained subject to an expectation that the innocent could and would defend themselves, and official pretrial pressures to confess and use of the products thereof were not seen as a violation of rights. The federal constitutional guarantee, moreover, would not apply against the states—which conduct the vast majority of criminal trials—until 1964.

Nineteenth-Century Developments

Although the accused had to defend themselves in court if they lacked counsel, they could not testify under oath in any American jurisdiction until 1864 (because they were not considered disinterested parties). By 1900, the federal government and every state but Georgia had passed laws allowing (but not requiring) defendants to testify, and most of the new statutes stipulated that no adverse inferences could be drawn from a decision not to do so. (A century later, the Court would affirm that those are constitutional rights as well.) Counsel was now much more readily available, and defendants who could afford them could therefore exercise a genuine right to silence at trial.

The privilege forbade compulsion to testify under oath, but the use of incriminating statements gained through pretrial interrogation was another matter. Courts determined the admissibility of such statements on the basis of their trustworthiness, an assessment resting in large part on their voluntariness. Because pretrial questioning gradually passed out of the hands of magistrates and became the responsibility of newly developing police departments, however, trial judges had only partisan accounts of interrogations and tended to give the benefit of the doubt to police—who had both the incentive and the opportunity to use coercive methods to obtain confessions.

Without reference to the Fifth Amendment, the Supreme Court held in Hopt v. Utah Territory that threats, inducements, or promises could render a confession involuntary in federal court; in 1897, it casually announced that the Fifth Amendment embodied the federal standard of admissibility but then ignored that approach for several decades. More significantly, the Court ruled in Boyd v. United States that the enforced production of private papers violated the Fifth Amendment and in Counselman v. Hitchcock that the privilege could be asserted not only at a criminal trial but in other forums where testimony could be compelled, because such testimony could later be introduced at trial. Counselman also held that incriminating testimony could be compelled only with a grant of complete immunity from prosecution for the offense in question (transactional immunity).

Evolution of the Testimonial Privilege

Early in the twentieth century, the Court held that the privilege is restricted to natural persons and cannot be asserted by corporations, labor unions, or other collective entities. It reiterated the view that (like the rest of the Bill of Rights) the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination did not apply to the states and added that the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of due process (which does apply to the states) did not include the privilege. By mid-century it was clear that where it does apply, the privilege is not automatic and must be formally invoked. Defendants in criminal trials have an absolute right not to testify, but witnesses in any forum may assert the privilege only when their answers would present a realistic risk of incrimination, either directly or by providing a link in a chain of evidence or a lead to further evidence. Even if the requested information would be incriminating, it is not privileged if the individual does not face criminal liability, as when immunity has been granted or the statute of limitations has expired. The privilege may not be invoked to avoid any noncriminal consequences, however undesirable, but it is available even to those who maintain complete innocence, because they could be prosecuted on the basis of appearances. Consistently with the nemo tenetur principle, it protects individuals from being compelled to incriminate themselves, but not from the compulsion of evidence against them from any other source.

In the latter half of the twentieth century, the Court carved out various other exceptions to the testimonial privilege, first by elaborating the older idea that the privilege does not apply to records that a general regulatory statute requires individuals or organizations to keep. It then refused to expand the nemo tenetur principle by holding in Schmerber v. California and subsequent cases that the prohibition of compulsion to be a witness against oneself extends only to testimonial or communicative evidence and offers no protection against the compelled production of physical evidence such as blood samples, fingerprints, DNA samples, and even utterances for the purpose of voice recognition.

Drawing on the narrow and literal conception of the privilege in Schmerber, the Court undercut the Boyd case's protection of private papers in Fisher v. United States and subsequent cases, holding that there is no protection against a subpoena for (or search and seizure of) voluntarily prepared private papers because no communicative act has been compelled. The contents of such papers thus enjoy no protection, but where the act of producing them would itself be incriminating, they cannot be subpoenaed without a grant of immunity for the act of production (but not for the contents). The Court also significantly modified the Counselman decision by holding in Kastigar v. United States that transactional immunity provides more protection than the Fifth Amendment requires and that immunity from the use of testimony and any evidence directly or indirectly derived therefrom—use and derivative use immunity—is all that is required for the compulsion of incriminating testimony. That formulation, the Court concluded, is congruent with the Fifth Amendment privilege as enforced by the exclusionary rule, under which compelled statements and evidence derived therefrom may not be introduced as evidence against the person whose rights were violated, but he or she may still be prosecuted.

The testimonial privilege came most prominently and controversially to public attention in the era of the 1950s, when events such as the spread of communism in Eastern Europe, the Korean War, and Soviet espionage concerning the atomic and hydrogen bombs brought to fever pitch a relentless investigation of communism in America that came to be known as McCarthyism. Persons suspected of disloyalty were investigated not only by grand juries but also very publicly by congressional committees such as the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC), the Senate Subcommittee on Internal Security, and the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations under Senator Joseph R. McCarthy (R-WI), who in 1954 was censured by the Senate for his conduct. Witnesses could claim the privilege because of the threat of prosecution under the Smith Act, but in Ullmann v. United States the Court rejected the argument that it could be used to shield them from “loss of job, expulsion from labor unions, state registration and investigation statutes, [loss of] passport eligibility, and general public opprobrium,” even though these disabilities might be much more severe than the noncriminal consequences previously denied protection. In what is now generally regarded as an atmosphere of paranoid fear often leading to investigations serving little purpose beyond probing the political beliefs and unfairly sully the reputations of their targets, witnesses granted immunity faced the choices of refusing to answer and being punished for contempt, lying, and being punished for perjury or answering truthfully and being subjected to the harsh consequences identified by William Ullmann. The very act of claiming the privilege, even if immunity was not granted and testimony was not required, branded one as probably disloyal. Many persons lost their jobs as a result, and many public and private careers were unjustifiably ruined.

The threat of punishment for contempt is not the only form of compulsion, and as the anticommunist crusade died down, the Court ruled that individuals could not be fired from public employment, prohibited from entering into business contracts with the government, stripped of political party office, or barred from the practice of law simply for asserting the privilege (but could suffer such consequences if they refused to testify under a grant of immunity). In Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board it struck down a statute requiring members of communist organizations to register with the government and supply information about their activities, distinguishing it from general regulatory reporting requirements not aimed at criminal suspects. In the same spirit, it also upheld the assertion of the privilege with respect to laws requiring registration of gamblers and owners of illegal firearms. The Court opted to protect other values, however, by upholding a common state requirement that persons involved in traffic accidents with property damage stop and provide other drivers with their names and addresses (California v. Byers), and a court order to a mother suspected of serious child abuse to produce the child (Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight). It also made clear that the privilege protects only those confessions compelled by governmental action and not those resulting from such other sources of compulsion as mental illness.

Evolution of the Law of Coerced Confessions

In 1931, the Report on Lawlessness in Law Enforcement by the National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement (the Wickersham Commission) documented widespread use of brutal third-degree tactics of police interrogation, and a particularly gruesome, racially charged example soon came to the Court in Brown v. Mississippi. Three young black men had been convicted of murder and sentenced to death on the basis of confessions elicited by savage beatings; there was no other evidence against them, and all had alibis. Overturning a result upheld by the state supreme court, the Court held that although the Fifth Amendment privilege pertained to testimony under oath and did not apply to the states in any event, use of pretrial confessions gained by force violated the Fourteenth Amendment guarantee of due process of law and in this case had perpetrated “a wrong so fundamental that it made the whole proceeding a mere pretense of a trial and rendered the conviction and sentence wholly void.”

State courts had typically admitted or excluded confessions on the basis of their reliability, considering their voluntariness in making that assessment, but over the next three decades (and particularly in the liberalizing era of Chief Justice Earl Warren), the Court elaborated and enforced a conception of due process in which fair treatment of suspects was the touchstone and voluntariness per se was the criterion of admissibility for confessions. It held that psychological as well as physical coercion could violate due process and gradually abandoned the approach in which the determination of whether various forms and degrees of coercion were excessive depended on the powers of resistance of the suspect in question. The scope of permissible pressure was progressively reduced to rule out techniques of intimidation, protracted and persistent questioning, deprivation of bodily needs, and similar tactics of interrogation, with the ultimate test being whether or not a suspect had confessed of his or her own free will.

The voluntariness criterion in state cases was now so close to the federal standard of not being compelled to incriminate oneself that the Court relied on the state confession cases in Malloy v. Hogan, where it incorporated the self-incrimination clause of the Fifth Amendment into the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment and applied it (and its associated doctrines) to the states. In a companion case applicable only within the United States, it held that persons may assert the privilege in one jurisdiction out of fear of prosecution in another, and that a grant of immunity in one jurisdiction applies to other jurisdictions as well.

A major problem remained, however, which was the difficulty trial judges had considering the admissibility of confessions encountered in determining the true nature of interrogations that had occurred in the privacy of police stations. The Court thus took another major step in Miranda v. Arizona by holding that the privilege against self-incrimination applies to coerced confessions as well as compelled testimony and devising the Miranda warnings to protect the privilege for persons undergoing custodial interrogation.

Ongoing Issues

At the time of Boyd in the late nineteenth century, the rationale for the privilege seemed to be the protection of privacy, but subsequent decisions such as Schmerber and Fisher and those on collective entities and required records have undermined that conception, and there is no consensus on an alternative beyond a general desire to prohibit abusive governmental tactics. Debate over the proper scope of the privilege thus continues, with serious arguments for both expansion (such as restoring protection for private papers) and contraction (such as permitting the use of physical evidence derived from compelled statements). Controversy is compounded by uncertainty about the policy impact of constitutional doctrines. There is, for example, serious disagreement as to whether the Miranda initiative has either significantly inhibited police or substantially benefited suspects (most of whom waive their rights and talk to police). Furthermore, new issues concerning the proper scope of the privilege in the context of the war on terror are beginning to emerge. In that effort, the purpose of interrogation (of citizens and aliens, at home and abroad) may be to gather intelligence rather than evidence for prosecution, and the Court has ruled that it is not the use of coercive tactics of interrogation that violates the privilege, but only the use of the products as evidence in a criminal trial. With respect to both enduring and emerging issues, the scope and applicability of the privilege against self-incrimination will be the subject of continuing controversy.

JOHN B. TAYLOR

References and Further Reading

- Dolinko, David, Is There a Rationale for the Privilege against Self-Incrimination? U.C.L.A. Law Review 33 (1986): 1063–1148.
- Fried, Richard M. Nightmare in Red: The McCarthy Era in Perspective. New York: Oxford University Press, 1990.
- Helmholz, R. H., et al. The Privilege against Self-Incrimination: Its Origins and Development. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth Amendment: The Right against Self-Incrimination. New York: Oxford University Press, 1968.
- Taylor, John B. Right to Counsel and Privilege against Self-Incrimination: Rights and Liberties under the Law. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO Press, 2004.
- Witt, John Fabian, Making the Fifth: The Constitutionalization of American Self-Incrimination Doctrine, 1791–1903, Texas Law Review 77 (1999): 825–922.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Albertson v. Subversive Activities Control Board*, 382 U.S. 70 (1965)
- Baltimore City Department of Social Services v. Bouknight*, 493 U.S. 549 (1990)
- Boyd v. United States*, 116 U.S. 616 (1886)
- Brown v. Mississippi*, 297 U.S. 278 (1936)
- California v. Byers*, 402 U.S. 424 (1971)
- Counselman v. Hitchcock*, 142 U.S. 547 (1892)
- Fisher v. United States*, 425 U.S. 391 (1976)
- Hopt v. Utah Territory*, 110 U.S. 574 (1884)
- Kastigar v. United States*, 406 U.S. 441 (1972)
- Malloy v. Hogan*, 378 U.S. 1 (1964)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Schmerber v. California*, 384 U.S. 757 (1966)
- Ullmann v. United States*, 350 U.S. 422 (1956)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Exemplars; Self-Incrimination: Miranda and Evolution

SELF-INCRIMINATION: MIRANDA AND EVOLUTION

The Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides in relevant part that—“no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself . . .” The Fifth Amendment applies to all federal courts and the federal government. The Fourteenth Amendment forbids states from depriving any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

During the counterculture mood of the 1960s, civil and human rights movements, social revolution, and anti-Vietnam war protests occurred across the country. It was during this time of social unrest that the Supreme Court was called on to settle a then controversial criminal justice issue—interrogation of suspects in custody by police to extract confessions. In essence, to do what the Fifth Amendment precluded—compel the criminal suspect to be a “witness against himself.” The Court interpreted this individual right in the case that was to give rise to what we now know as the “Miranda rights”—Miranda v. Arizona.

The underlying facts in Miranda were uncomplicated. On March 2, 1963, a twenty-three-year-old Ernesto Miranda drove up to an eighteen-year-old woman walking home from work. Miranda parked his car and approached the woman, grabbed her, and forced her into the back seat of his car where he bound her and threatened her with a knife. Miranda drove the victim to the desert and raped her before returning her to the place from where she was kidnapped.

Miranda was arrested by state police based on the victim’s description of the car. The victim was unable to identify Miranda out of a lineup. However, when Miranda was interrogated by police, he was falsely told that the victim had identified him. He broke down and gave a written confession. At the top of the paper he was given to write out his confession, there was a paragraph stating that Miranda understood his rights and that he was confessing voluntarily. Miranda was never directly informed of his Fifth Amendment rights; he had only a grade-school education.

At his state criminal trial, the prosecution, over the objections of Miranda’s court-appointed lawyer, was allowed to introduce Miranda’s written confession as the key evidence against him. Miranda was convicted of the charges. He was later sentenced to twenty to thirty years. His lawyer appealed the conviction to the Arizona Supreme Court. The convictions were upheld. The American Civil Liberties Union in Phoenix, Arizona, picked up Miranda’s case. And in 1965 the U.S. Supreme Court agreed to review the case, consolidating it with three other cases presenting the same constitutional issue—Westover v. United States, Vignera v. New York, and California v. Stewart. On June 13, 1966, the U.S. Supreme Court issued its opinion reversing Miranda’s conviction and granting him a new trial because his due process rights were violated through the denial of his right against self-incrimination.

The Court held that, because of the due process guarantee of the Fourteenth Amendment (also contained in the Fifth Amendment), “[T]he prosecution may not use statements, whether exculpatory or inculpatory, stemming from custodial interrogation of the defendant unless it demonstrates the use of procedural safeguards effective to secure the privilege against self-incrimination” The “person in custody must, prior to interrogation, be clearly informed that he has the right to remain silent, and that anything he says will be used against him in court; he must be clearly informed that he has the right to consult with a lawyer and to have the lawyer with him during interrogation, and that, if he is indigent, a lawyer will be appointed to represent him” (Miranda, at 467–473). These are the now well-known Miranda Rights and remain unchanged forty years later.

The Court’s decision in Miranda was so controversial that it took center stage in the political debates during the 1968 presidential election. The Miranda decision and the rationale for its new doctrine have evolved through time and have set off legions of scholarly articles and judicial decisions.

Two years after Miranda, Congress tried to erode the basis of the decision by enacting Title 18 U.S.C. § 3501. Section 3501 made the giving of the Miranda Rights but one factor in the determination of the admissibility of custodial statements. Section 3501 tried to return to the voluntariness analysis in confession cases in place before Miranda was decided. But this statute was largely ignored by the courts, because it was viewed as unconstitutional in light of Miranda. It was not until 2000 that § 3501 was held unconstitutional by the Court in the landmark self-incrimination case of Dickerson v. United States, 530 U.S. 428 (2000).

Shortly after Miranda was decided, the Court began to retreat from its initial legal rule. In Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971), the Court held that statements taken in violation of Miranda can still be introduced at trial to impeach a defendant. In Michigan v. Tucker, 417 U.S. 433 (1974), the Court held that the Fourth Amendment’s “fruit of the poisonous tree” did not apply to Miranda violations; this ruling reaffirmed in U.S. v. Patane, 124 S.Ct. 2620 (2004). In Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), the Court held that once a suspect asks for a lawyer after Miranda rights, all questioning must cease; but, in Davis v. United States, 512 U.S. 452 (1994) that invocation must be unequivocal and clear. Then, in New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984), the Court found a public safety exception to the giving of Miranda rights. And in Duckworth v. Eagan, 492 U.S. 195 (1989), the Court approved a set of Miranda warnings slightly different from its original set. In Missouri v. Seibert, 124 S.Ct. 2601 (2004), the Court struck down a common law enforcement interrogation technique of securing a confession and afterwards to give Miranda warnings and then getting the confession again.

Miranda warnings have remained a staple in American society as a preventive cure to overzealous law enforcement officers. Miranda has survived and been reaffirmed at its core in the Dickerson and Seibert cases.

EZEKIEL E. CORTEZ

References and Further Reading

- Cassell, Paul, and Robert Litt, Will Miranda Survive?: Dickerson v. United States: The Right to Remain Silent, the Supreme Court, and Congress, Debate at the Georgetown University Law Center (March 28, 2000). Criminal Law Review 1165 (2000).
- Godsey, Mark A., Rethinking the Involuntary Confession Rule: Toward a Workable Test for Identifying Compelled Self-Incrimination, 93 California Law Review 465 (2005): 499–505.
- , Miranda’s Final Frontier—The International Arena: A Critical Analysis of United States v. Bin Laden, and a Proposal for a New Miranda Exception Abroad, 51 Duke Law Journal 1703, 1735–1752.
- Levy, Leonard W. Origins of the Fifth Amendment. New York: Macmillan–Pulitzer Prize winner, 1969. Reprint 1986.
- Stuart, Gary L. Miranda: The Story of America’s Right to Remain Silent. University of Arizona Press (2004).
- White, Welsh S. Miranda’s Waning Protections. University of Michigan Press (2003).

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogation; Miranda Warning

SELF-REPRESENTATION AT TRIAL

The Sixth Amendment provides that “[i]n all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence.” This provision, which applies to the states through the Fourteenth Amendment, encompasses an independent right of self-representation at trial. That is, a criminal defendant has a constitutional right to proceed without counsel at trial, which precludes the government from forcing a lawyer on an accused when the accused insists on conducting his or her own defense, Faretta v. California.

To invoke the right of self-representation, a defendant must make a timely request and must knowingly and intelligently forgo the traditional benefits associated with the right to counsel. This latter requirement does not mean that the accused must have the skill and experience of a lawyer to choose self-representation. The accused need not, for example, be familiar with the relevant rules of evidence and procedure. Rather, the accused merely must understand what he or she is doing and must make the choice with eyes open. Accordingly, an accused must be aware of the dangers and disadvantages of self-representation, Faretta v. California.

The right of self-representation encompasses certain specific rights. Defendants who choose self-representation must be permitted to control the organization and content of their own defense, to make motions, to argue points of law, to participate in the selection of the jury, to examine witnesses, and to address the judge and jury at appropriate points in the trial, McKaskle v. Wiggins. Defendants must, however, comply with the relevant rules of evidence and procedure, and they cannot complain after trial that the quality of their own defense amounted to a denial of “effective assistance of counsel.” Moreover, if a defendant deliberately engages in disruptive behavior, the trial judge can terminate the defendant’s self-representation, Faretta v. California.

When a defendant elects self-representation, the trial judge may—even over the defendant’s objection—appoint “standby counsel” to aid the defendant if and when the defendant requests help and to be available to represent the defendant if the judge finds it necessary to terminate the defendant’s self-representation, Faretta v. California. Nevertheless, the right of self-representation imposes some limits on the extent to which standby counsel may participate in the proceedings without the defendant’s consent. First, the defendant must maintain actual control over the case he or she chooses to present. For example, the defendant must be free to make significant tactical decisions, control the questioning of witnesses, and speak on any matters of importance. Second, in a jury trial, the unwanted participation by standby counsel must not destroy the jury’s perception that the defendant is representing him or herself, McKaskle v. Wiggins.

Although the Sixth Amendment guarantees a defendant the right to counsel as well as the right to self-representation, a defendant does not have a constitutional right to “hybrid” representation under which the defendant and an attorney act, in effect, as co-counsel. A trial court may, however, permit hybrid representation, McKaskle v. Wiggins.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 594–600, 995–996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Faretta v. California, 422 U.S. 806 (1975)
McKaskle v. Wiggins, 465 U.S. 168 (1984)

See also Incorporation Doctrine; Ineffective Assistance of Counsel; Right to Counsel (VI)

SENTENCING GUIDELINES

Sentencing guidelines are bodies of law that encourage judges to select sentences in normal cases from a narrow range of preferred sentences, while still allowing judges in unusual cases to choose from a broader range authorized by statute. The impact of sentencing guidelines on civil liberties varies from place to place. They sometimes combine the virtues of reasonably uniform outcomes with the ability to individualize each sentence. In many states, guidelines have become valuable methods for linking punishment policies to available resources, thus limiting the severity of punishments. On the other hand, in some jurisdictions (most prominently, the federal criminal justice system), guideline sentences have contributed to falling trial rates and increasingly severe punishments.

The concept of uniform guidance for sentencing judges originated in the middle of the twentieth century. An early proposal for sentencing guidelines carrying the force of law appeared in a short, but powerful, book published in 1973 by Judge Marvin Frankel, Criminal Sentences: Law without Order. Frankel condemned as “lawless” the discretionary sentencing system that gave judges no legal standards for making choices with the most profound effects on liberty. In place of this system, Frankel suggested that a “Commission on Sentencing” enact rules to govern the judicial selection of sentences.

Sentencing guidelines first took effect in a few state systems, including Minnesota and Pennsylvania. In the federal system, the Sentencing Reform Act of 1984 established the U.S. Sentencing Commission and empowered it to create guidelines for federal judges. Now roughly half the states have enacted some form of sentencing guidelines.

The reach of these sentencing guidelines varies. The guidelines all cover felonies, while a few also guide judges in misdemeanor cases, despite the challenges of importing new legal structures into the high-volume world of petty crimes. Guidelines in a few states designate the nonprison punishments for judges to impose. Most guideline states abolish parole and embrace the concept of “truth in sentencing,” which means that the sentence announced publicly in court corresponds closely to the sentence that the offender ultimately serves. In a few states, like Pennsylvania, sentencing guidelines coexist with a continued parole authority to set the maximum prison term.

The binding power of sentencing guidelines also varies. Some are known as “voluntary” guidelines, leaving judges free to sentence an offender outside the recommended range while staying within the broader statutory maximum and minimum. In contrast to these voluntary guidelines, some jurisdictions use “presumptive” guidelines. The judge who chooses a sentence within the presumptive range faces no appellate review and no obligation to explain the sentence, but a judge who “departs” from the guidelines to impose a higher or lower sentence triggers appellate review of that sentence and must offer a legally sufficient explanation for the departure.

Sentencing guidelines typically originate from an expert sentencing commission. They might take the form of statutes that the commission recommends to the legislature or administrative regulations that the commission creates on its own. The commission also monitors the operation of guidelines over time and amends them to reflect changing conditions or priorities.

Commissions that draft “prescriptive” guidelines, which attempt to change some aspect of preguideline sentences, must develop the political skills to convince judges, prosecutors, and probation officers to support the guidelines. Determined opposition from courtroom actors can lead to inconsistent and ineffective application of sentencing guidelines.

The U.S. Sentencing Commission has not been notably successful in winning the support of judges, defense attorneys, or line prosecutors. The federal guidelines create an elaborate structure to compel judges to consider all of the defendant’s conduct relevant to the “real offense” rather than limiting the relevant wrongdoing to the elements of the charged offense. This structure pushes some of the most important factual issues relevant to punishment out of the trial and into the procedurally informal sentencing hearing. The federal sentencing guidelines are also blamed for major prison population growth in the system, although the heavy use of mandatory minimum sentences contributes heavily to this problem.

The effects of sentencing guidelines in many states have been more positive. They have promoted more transparent connections between sentencing rules and actual sentencing practices, along with clearer explanations for many routine sentencing decisions. On balance, they have probably helped constrain the growth of prisons and have promoted more consistent use of criminal punishments, perhaps even removing some of the racial disparities that plague discretionary sentencing.

RONALD F. WRIGHT

References and Further Reading

Barkow, Rachel, Administering Crime, UCLA Law Review 52 (2005): 3: 715–814.

Bowman, Frank, The Failure of the Federal Sentencing Guidelines: A Structural Analysis, Columbia Law Review 105 (2005): 4: 1315–1350.

Frankel, Marvin. Criminal Sentences: Law without Order. New York: Hill and Wantg, 1973.

Frase, Richard, State Sentencing Guidelines: Diversity, Consensus, and Unresolved Policy Issues, Columbia Law Review 105 (2005): 4: 1190–1232.

Miller, Marc, True Grid: Revealing Sentencing Policy, U.C. Davis Law Review 25 (1992): 3: 587–610.

Stith, Kate, and José A. Cabranes. Fear of Judging: Sentencing Guidelines in the Federal Courts. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Tonry, Michael. Sentencing Matters. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Sentencing Reform Act of 1984, Pub. L. No. 98-473, 98 Stat. 1873

See also Mandatory Minimum Sentences; Prison Population Growth; Three Strikes/Proportionality

SENTENCING REFORM ACT

The Sentencing Reform Act was passed with overwhelming support in Congress in 1984. The Act’s purpose was to address the appearance (and may be reality) of unwarranted disparity in federal sentences. The Act was supported by politicians on both the left and right of the political spectrum. The former felt that treating similar defendants differently in the courts was simply unjustified; some means had to be found to regularize sentences, to treat defendants with similar backgrounds who committed comparable crimes in a consistent fashion. Proponents on the right of the political spectrum felt that reform of sentencing would lead to tougher penalties and would preclude the kinds of lenient sentences these advocates felt judges often meted out.

To achieve the goal of reducing unwarranted disparity in sentencing, the Sentencing Reform Act created the Sentencing Commission whose membership included both judicial and lay individuals. The Commission in turn promulgated Federal Sentencing Guidelines that became the required handbook for all Federal sentencing after November 1987. The Guidelines were essentially a 2×2 grid, with offender characteristics on one side and offense characteristics on the other. All crimes were said to fall within one of the resultant boxes, and judges were to sentence within the range (25 percent) of sentences indicated in the box. Several other factors are important to note about this sentencing process. First, judges were expected to increase or decrease a sentence after a jury verdict on a particular charge depending on certain factual matters (for example, the amount of drugs involved in a drug sale). This was to be done after a factual hearing in which the standard of proof was preponderance of the evidence (not the “beyond a reasonable doubt” standard the jury with which the jury was charged). Second, although in principle judges could depart from these Guidelines, the variables that justified these departures were few. If the Commission was said to have considered the variable in its deliberations—and indicated that it was not a ground for departure—the judge could not substitute his or her judgment for the Commission’s. Third, if the defense or prosecution opted for an appeal of a sentence outside the Guidelines, it was now permissible to do so. Appellate review of sentences before Sentencing Reform Act was limited mostly to sentencing “abuse of discretion,” a stringent standard rarely successfully used to overturn a sentence.

Since its implementation, the Guidelines have received mixed reviews. In their favor, they removed some of the difficulty in sentencing for judges. This is to say, judges who agonized over sentencing choices may have welcomed the mechanical nature of sentencing the Guidelines could offer. It could make a judge’s job easier. On the other hand, many criticisms of the Guidelines also surfaced. Judges felt like robots under the Guidelines, simply applying the increasingly complex adding and subtracting that the Guideline grids, and their accompanying rules, dictated. This was particularly difficult for some judges in “equity cases” wherein the judge felt the Guideline sentence was unfairly harsh and yet felt unable to mitigate the required sentence. Finally, judges, and many others, criticized the failure of the Guidelines to actually reduce disparity in sentences, the original animating purpose of the Sentencing Reform Act. Although the Guidelines hamstrung judges, critics noted, they did not appreciably restrict prosecutorial discretion. As a consequence, the power of the U.S. attorneys increased under the Guidelines, and their plea bargaining practices resulted in the very kind of disparity the Guideline’s aimed to reduce.

In January 2005, in U.S. v. Booker and U.S. v. Fanfan, a divided U.S. Supreme Court required that the major product of the Sentencing Reform Act—the Federal Sentencing Guidelines—needed to be substantially changed. Instead of mandating that judges opt for a particular box in the sentencing grid and then adjust the prescribed sentence depending on specific facts of the offense (facts established by the judge after the jury’s decision on guilt on a particular charge), the Guidelines should merely be advisory to the sentencing judge. The judge should preserve the discretion to sentence anywhere within the statutory range for a particular jury conviction. Whether in the future this will lead prosecutors to ask the jury to decide on additional factors (and thus limit a judge’s range), or whether in the case of pleas, defendants are expected to stipulate to certain sentencing facts, remains to be seen. Also, and most important, is the matter of whether increased judicial discretion will lead to the kind of “unwarranted sentencing disparity” that gave birth to the Guidelines initially.

MILTON HEUMANN

References and Further Reading

- Freed, Daniel, Federal Sentencing in the Wake of Guidelines: Unacceptable Limits on the Discretion of Sentencers, The Yale Law Journal 101 (1992): 8: 1681–1754.
 Heumann, Milton, Empirical Questions and Data Sources: Guideline and Sentencing Research in the Federal System, Federal Sentencing Reporter 6 (1993): 15–18.
 Stith, Kate, and Jose Cabranes. Fear of Judging. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
 Tonry, Michael. Sentencing Matters. New York: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Blakely v. Washington*, 542 U.S. (2004), 124 S. Ct. 2531 (2004)
United States v. Booker, No. 04-105, January 12, 2005, 125 S. Ct. 739 (2005)
United States v. Fanfan, (decided together with Booker)

See also Guilty Plea; Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right; Mandatory Minimum Sentences; Sentencing Guidelines

SERVICEMEMBERS LEGAL DEFENSE NETWORK

Servicemembers Legal Defense Network (SLDN) is a national nonprofit organization dedicated to ending discrimination against and harassment of military personnel on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity. SLDN was formed in 1993, in response to Congress’s statutory enactment of the military’s long-standing gay exclusion in the so-called Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell (DADT) statute.

SLDN’s efforts include policy development, impact litigation, watchdog, and legal aid activities. SLDN engages in policy research, educational efforts, and litigation aimed at lifting the military’s ban on gay service personnel. In court, it has repeatedly challenged the Don’t Ask, Don’t Tell policy as a violation of privacy, Equal Protection, the First Amendment, and the liberty interest within the due process clauses that was held to be constitutionally protected in Lawrence v. Texas. SLDN has also challenged the military sodomy statute as unconstitutional in the wake of Lawrence (United States v. Marcum). In 2005, SLDN worked with congressional leaders to introduce a proposed legislative repeal of the DADT policy, the Military Readiness Enhancement Act. SLDN regularly engages in educational efforts targeting key leaders in all branches of government. It also coordinates an annual lobby day that brings veterans to Capitol Hill to urge Members of Congress to repeal DADT.

Every year, SLDN provides free advice and legal services to many hundreds of active-duty and former military personnel in matters related to sexual orientation and gender identity. Its online Survival Guide is a comprehensive resource about DADT for service members. SLDN also produces an important annual report, Conduct Unbecoming, available at its website, analyzing the gay discharge-related activities of the various branches of the military and monitoring compliance or noncompliance with the supposedly protective aspects of the DADT law. SLDN has been active in documenting antigay harassment within the military and in pressuring various branches to clarify and enforce their antiharassment policies. SLDN also advocates for more protective privacy policies and for psychotherapist, doctor-patient, and chaplain privileges that would protect service members who discuss their sexual orientation or gender identity with health care providers and religious counselors.

SLDN works in coalition with a number of other advocacy groups. For example, with American Veterans for Equal Rights and the Human Rights Campaign, it cofounded Documenting Courage, an online campaign to tell the stories of lesbian, gay, and transgender troops. Working with the Center for the Study of Sexual Minorities in the Military and the Society of American Law Teachers, it established a web page to assist in developing organizing strategies around the Solomon Amendment. SLDN filed an amicus brief in the ongoing litigation challenging the Solomon Amendment (FAIR v. Rumsfeld).

SLDN also engages in activities that support service member and veteran pride and increase the visibility of these groups and individuals.

MARC R. POIRIER

References and Further Reading

www.sldn.org [website of Servicemembers Legal Defense Network].

Cases and Statutes Cited

Don't Ask, Don't Tell, 10 U.S.C. Sec. 654
Forum for Academic and Institutional Rights v. Rumsfeld, 319 F.3d 219 (3d Cir. 2004), cert. granted, 125 S.Ct. 1977
 (2005)

Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)

United States v. Marcum, 60 M.J. 198 (Ct. App. A.F. 2004)

See also Gay and Lesbian Rights; Right of Privacy; Sodomy Laws

SEVENTH DAY ADVENTISTS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

The Seventh day Adventist Church is an evangelical Christian denomination that grew out of a diverse family of denominations, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist, and Congregational and Bible study movements that arose in the middle of the nineteenth century. This evangelical Christian denomination was sparked by the teachings of Warren Miller (1782–1849). Warren Miller was a farmer who settled in upstate New York after the War of 1812. He was originally a Deist. Miller was convinced the Bible contained coded information about the end of the world and the second coming of Jesus Christ. By interpreting Daniel 8:14, Miller believed the “cleansing of the temple” (the second coming) would occur sometime between two spring equinoxes: March 21, 1843, and March 21, 1844. When the prophecy did not come true, many believers left the movement in what has become known as the Great Disappointment. Miller gradually withdrew from leadership and died in 1849. This group lead by Miller was known as Adventist or Millerites.

On May 21, 1863, the church was formally organized as the Seventh Day Adventist Church. This organization was led by Ellen Harmon White, her husband James White and Joseph Butes.

Early Seventh-day Adventist leaders, including Ellen G. White, taught that those who did not accept the Adventist message before October 22, 1844, would not be saved. This was called the “shut door” doctrine. This doctrine was later rejected.

Victor Houteff joined the Seven Day Adventist Church in 1919. His beliefs deviated from mainstream church doctrine, culminating in his publishing “The Shepherd’s Rod,” the title taken from a passage in Ezekiel. Houteff left the church and formed a new sect in 1929 called the Davidian Seventh Day Adventist. This group eventually split further and led to the organization called the Students of the Seven Seals, popularly known as the Branch Davidians. In 1993, after a long standoff with the FBI, the Branch Davidian's compound burned down with the sect suffering major losses of life.

Seventh Day Adventists, the main body of the group, believe they have the right to freedom of religion, subject to the equal rights of others. This implies the freedom to meet for instruction and worship, to worship on the seventh day of the week (Saturday), and to disseminate religious views by public preaching or through the media. Every person has a right to demand consideration whenever conscience does not allow the performance of certain public duties, such as requiring the bearing of arms. It has been their belief in Saturday Sabbaths and their consideration of conscience that has led to the majority of their religious liberty legal fights.

The Seventh Day Adventist belief in a twenty-four-hour sunset-to-sunset Sabbath commencing on Friday evening has led to two hallmark Supreme Court Cases, Sherbert v Verner, 374 US 398 (1963) and Hobbie v Unemployment Appeal Commission of Florida, 480 US 139 (1987). Both Sherbert and Hobbie were dismissed from work because of conflicts with their Sabbath hours. Adeil Sherbert was fired from her job after she refused to work on Saturday. The South Carolina Employment Security Commission denied her benefits, finding unacceptable her religious justification for refusing to work on Saturday. Sherbert sued, and the case went to the Supreme Court. Mr. Justice Brennan writing for the majority held that the state's eligibility restrictions for unemployment compensation imposed a significant burden on Sherbert's ability to freely exercise her faith. Furthermore, there was no compelling state interest that justified such a substantial burden on this basic First Amendment right. The question to ask stated the Court is "whether the law at issue substantially burdens a religious practice and, if so, whether the burden is justified by a compelling state interest," in the case there was not, the state could not "impose a burden on the free exercise of her religion." Paula Hobbie was employed by a jewelry store. After being employed for two years, Ms. Hobbie informed her employer that she was being baptized into the Seventh Day Adventist and, therefore, would be unable to work on her Sabbath day, Saturday. Arrangements were made for her to work Sunday. This arrangement worked until the owner of the company heard of the arrangement and informed Ms. Hobbie she must work Saturday or quit. She refused and was terminated. When Ms. Hobbie sought unemployment benefits, she was refused. Mr. Justice Brennan writing for the majority held that when a state denies receipt of a benefit because of conduct mandated by religious belief, thereby putting substantial pressure on an adherent to modify his or her behavior and to violate his or her beliefs, that denial must be subjected to strict scrutiny and can be justified only by proof of a compelling state interest. ". . . [R]eceipt of a benefit because of conduct mandated by religious belief . . . must be subjected to strict scrutiny."

The Seventh Day Adventists also held religious liberty versus the state in the case of Giroud v US, 328 US 61 (1946). In this case Mr. Giroud, a native of Canada, filed his petition for naturalization in the District Court of Massachusetts. To the question in the application, "If necessary, are you willing to take up arms in defense of this country?" he replied, "No," (noncombatant) Seventh Day Adventist. He explained the answer before the examiner saying "it is a purely religious matter with me, I have no political or personal reasons other than that." He did not claim before his Selective Service board exemption from all military service, but only from combatant military duty. The District Court admitted him to citizenship. The Circuit Court reversed. He was denied naturalization because he declared he would not bear arms to defend the United States but was willing to support and defend the Constitution and the laws in other ways. In this case the Supreme Court declared that the Congress had not intended the promise to bear arms to be a prerequisite to citizenship. Mr. Justice Douglas writing for the majority explained, "The victory for freedom of thought recorded in our Bill of Rights recognizes that in the domain of conscience there is a moral power higher than the State. Throughout the ages men have suffered death rather than subordinate their allegiance to God to the authority of the State. Freedom of religion guaranteed by the First Amendment is the product of that struggle."

The core of the Seventh Day Adventist tradition is their belief in "the Bible and the Bible alone" as the basis for all their doctrine. In this belief they hold firmly to religious liberty and actively work toward maintenance of the constitutional separation of church and state.

G. L. TYLER

References and Further Reading

- Anderson John. Religious Liberty in Transitional Societies: The Politics of Religion, 2003.
 Gaustad, Edwin, ed. The Rise of Adventism: Religion and Society in Mid-Nineteenth Century America, 1974.
 Mead, Frank S. The Handbook of Denominations, 1995.
 Vance, Laura L. Seventh-Day Adventism in Crises: Gendered and Sectarian Change in an Emerging Religion, 1999.

See also Sherbert v. Verner, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

SEX AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Female Offenders

Men account for the vast majority of people under the supervision of the criminal justice system. Nevertheless, the female presence in the system is growing at a significantly faster rate than the male presence, 6.4 percent versus 3.9 percent in the past ten years in the jail population alone. More than 100,000 women were under the supervision of prison authorities in 2003, with an average daily jail population of 81,650. Twenty-three percent of all probationers, a total of 936,000, were female, as were 13 percent of all parolees, or 97,000 women. The female arrest rate rose 1.9 percent in that year, whereas male arrests decreased 0.4 percent. The result is more than 1,000,000 females subject to some form of supervision, with more than 2,000,000 having been arrested.

Racial, ethnic, and class disparities characterize this population. Thus, again in 2003, African-American females were five times more likely than white females to be incarcerated, and twice as likely as Hispanic females, even though Hispanic female inmates rose 71 percent between 1990 and 1996 alone. In 2003, approximately 58 percent of female inmates were minorities. The average incarcerated woman is thirty-one years old, undereducated, unemployed at the time of arrest, and unmarried. She is three times more likely to have suffered physical abuse and six times more likely to have suffered sexual abuse after age eighteen than her male counterpart.

Only approximately 18 percent of all arrests for violent crime are of women. Drug offenses thus fuel most of the growth, accounting in New York, for example, for 91 percent of the rise in female prison sentences between 1986 and 1995. Drug or property offenses combined account for the bulk of criminal convictions of females. Women of color are once again affected disproportionately by the war on drugs; notably between 1986 and 1991, the number of women in state prisons for drug offenses rose 828 percent for African Americans, 328 percent for Hispanics, and 241 percent for whites.

Of those females who are incarcerated for acts of violence, many did so against a partner who had sexually or physically abused them. Abused women often turn to drug abuse, which is itself linked to criminality, to avoid dealing with deeper traumas.

Juvenile girls and young women, who are often running away from abusive homes, may become involved in gangs, although they likely constituting only 10 to 22 percent of all gang members nationwide. Female gang members are more likely than male members to come from families with alcoholic, drug-addicted, or criminally involved siblings or parents. Most female gangs are male gang auxiliaries, although independent "girl gangs" may have become more common and perhaps more central to drug dealing and violence in the 1990s.

Because so much female violent crime is a reaction to abuse, social science studies on the etiology and impact of such abuse have often been seized on by lawyers to aid in crafting their clients' defenses. Perhaps the best-known evidence of this kind is a psychologist's testimony about battered woman syndrome (BWS) and its variants, evidence generally admissible in most jurisdictions. BWS advocates argue that the abused's experience alters her perceptions, thus notably helping to support a self-defense claim (usually requiring that she actually and reasonably perceived herself as facing imminent danger of death or serious bodily injury) or at least a partial defense, perhaps mitigating the crime from murder to manslaughter on grounds of "extreme emotional disturbance."

Prostitution is another important category of female criminality. Although there are occasional crackdowns on the male customers ("johns"), law enforcement policy in this area favors arresting the prostitutes or, where feasible, their male pimps or female madams. In the wake of the AIDS epidemic, many states have passed laws targeting prostitutes who are repeat offenders for enhanced penalties, despite the lack of scientific evidence that female prostitutes are an important source of transmission of the disease in the United States.

Women and their children also often face harsh collateral consequences from current sentencing practices. When males are incarcerated, their children are likely to be raised by their mothers. But when females are incarcerated, the children's care is usually shifted to friends, relatives, or foster care; less than one-third of them reside with their father. The federal system is especially likely to discount family ties in imposing sentences. Yet even an eighteen-month prison sentence can be "a death penalty" for parental rights, given the Adoption and Safe Families Act's mandate of termination proceedings if a child spends fifteen of twenty-two months in foster care, unless certain specified circumstances exist. There are too few people willing to adopt such children, and foster care may not necessarily be better for these children; a Bureau of Justice Statistics Survey found that 87 percent of female prisoners whose childhood was spent in foster care or institutions report being sexually or physically abused. Separation of children from their parents can lead to guilt, anxiety, anger, depression, shame, and fear, and the children of the incarcerated are more likely than other children to offend. Furthermore, even after release, a single mother convicted of a drug-related offense who avoided termination of her parental rights will in most states be denied federal food stamps, cash assistance, public housing, or aid in paying for private housing or an education. Her conditions of release, such as working or receiving drug treatment, rarely take account of her childcare responsibilities, perhaps resulting in reincarceration for technical violations of probation or parole. Numerous commentators thus worry that harsh sentences for nonviolent female offenders merely encourage increased criminality among them and their children.

Women as Victims of Crime

Females, especially the young, are far more likely than males to be victimized by crime, with most victimizers being male. There are racial disparities as well, the violent crime victimization rate for white females notably is 40.9 per 1,000 females in the population but 44 for Hispanic females and 52.3 for African-American females. Women, are, however, far more frequently victimized than men for particular types of violent crime, with 98 percent of victims of rape and 81 percent of victims of attempted rape being females older than the age of twelve. Women are four times more likely to be stalked and about three times more likely to suffer physical abuse by a spouse or companion than are men. Nearly two-thirds of violent crimes against males are committed by strangers, whereas the corresponding number for females is but one-third. Most victimization of women occurs in their homes or those of friends, relatives, and neighbors rather than on the street. There is reason to believe that these numbers underestimate the absolute and relative victimization rates for women.

Rape is perhaps the most infamous of crimes against women, "date rape"—sexual assault involving individuals who knew each other—is especially difficult to prove. Although the studies done on the incidence of date rape have faced substantial criticisms, many converge on similar results: large percentages of women, often approximately 25 percent of the total, are estimated to have been victimized by rape or attempted rape, with more than 75 percent of their assailants being nonstrangers. The primary issue in these cases is whether the women consented and, if they did not, whether the men should reasonably have known that. Historically, the law created significant formal obstacles to conviction in rape cases, requiring corroboration of the victim's testimony; admitting evidence of her prior consensual sexual involvement with other men, both to prove her consent in the case at hand and to call her credibility into question; and specially instructing the jury to be cautious in its evaluation of the victim's testimony. Modern statutes and evidence rules, including "rape shield" statutes, frequently forbidding reference to a victim's reputation as promiscuous or reference to specific instances of her specific prior sex acts, generally reject these requirements. Most states still require proof of "force" or its threat, although some have eliminated that element of the crime. Traditionally, a showing of force required proving so much force as to overcome a woman's "utmost" resistance, generally meaning resistance to the point of endangerment of death or serious bodily injury. The law in many states later altered this requirement to showing a mere "reasonable" resistance, and some states have entirely eliminated any overt proof of the accused's use of force. These formal legal changes were largely prompted by an organized rape law reform movement, an arm of the broader feminist movement.

Many feminists saw the legal hurdles to proving rape as a way of, in practice, legalizing male sexual violence against women. Rape reformers hoped that formal legal changes would improve this state of affairs. Reformers also often gained access to counseling for rape victims and their right to submit victim impact statements at sentencing where convictions did occur. A number of states have also adopted statutes permitting the use of an accused rapist's prior acts of sexual violence against him in court to prove his guilt of the currently charged rape. Despite these efforts, various social science studies conclude that legal reform has had modest or no effect in improving rape reporting and conviction rates.

Several explanations have been offered for the failure of the rape law reform movement. Perhaps, most importantly, jurors continue to want corroboration, victim resistance, extreme uses of force, and "proper" stereotypical female behavior as preconditions for believing the woman's version of events and for convicting an accused rapist, even where the law no longer requires such proof. The severity of rape shield and other reform legislation also varies widely, with some statutes permitting sufficient numbers of exceptions or vesting the trial judge with sufficient discretion as to result in the continued admissibility at trial of a woman's sex life as relevant to the consent determination.

Furthermore, battering of female spouses had long been viewed in the United States as a necessary evil for disciplining wayward wives and part of the sacred precincts of “private” family life. Only in the 1970s did battering come to be seen as a serious social problem meriting the criminal justice system’s involvement. Yet this trend has not always been enthusiastically embraced by either the broader public or the police, who are charged with enforcement. This may partly stem from the senses that victims staying with their batterers are partly to blame for their plight and that intrafamilial dysfunction is better addressed by treatment and assistance programs than by criminalization. Victims may also refuse to cooperate because of fear of retaliation by their batterers, fear of losing their economic contribution, or belief that the mere threat of prosecution will solve the problem.

Although police originally generally did not intervene in abuse cases, in the 1960s and 1970s, they started using mediation, reconciliation, or agency referrals as common practice. Fifteen states had, however, moved to mandating arrest laws by the 1990s’ start, with all but a few remaining states amending their laws to permit warrantless misdemeanor arrests in domestic violence cases. Nevertheless, even when arrest is legally mandated, the number of arrests may not increase significantly because of police discretion in deciding what cases qualify and in police resistance, particularly where officers perceive a low likelihood of reprimand. Women also face disproportionate victimization by the crime of stalking, which is committed by the pursuit or harassment of a victim even in the absence of actual physical harm. The relatively new rise of antistalking legislation has resulted in its adoption in all states, the District of Columbia, and the federal government. Although the statutes vary, they generally require repeated harassment that would cause a reasonable person to fear for her safety or that of a family member. The harassment must be intentional, and some states require that the threat be “credible.”

Stalking and domestic violence are closely linked, with 59 percent of female victims being stalked by intimate partners and 81 percent of those so stalked also being physically assaulted by those partners. Only about half of female stalking victims report the crime to the police, with only 12 percent of those crimes being prosecuted. Commentators have suggested that the low stalker prosecution rates demonstrate that the justice system is not taking the crime seriously enough, with police too often viewing stalkers as “pathetic Romeos” rather than criminal offenders.

ANDREW E. TASLITZ

References and Further Reading

- Gertner, Nancy, Women Offenders and the Sentencing Guidelines, Yale Journal of Law & Feminism 14 (2002): 291.
- Mauer, Marc, et al. Gender and Justice: Women, Drugs, and Sentencing Policy (1999) (a report of the Sentencing Project).
- Raeder, Myrna, A Primer on Gender-Related Issues that Affect Female Offenders, Criminal Journal 20 (2005): 4.
- Rafter, Nicole. Encyclopedia of Women and Crime, 2003.
- Taslitz, Andrew E. Rape and the Culture of the Courtroom, 1999.

See also Domestic Violence; Marital Rape

SEX AND IMMIGRATION

Sex and immigration have long been intertwined, with sex (often in combination with race) being used as a criteria for denying immigration benefits. Indeed, the first federal law restricting immigration, the Page Law of 1875, barred women (mostly Chinese) suspected of entering the country for “lewd or immoral purposes.” Even when sex-based classifications were not explicit, ostensibly neutral categories often masked discrimination on the basis of sex. For example, beginning in the nineteenth century, immigration classifications barring individuals likely to become public charges were used to deter women from immigrating. More recently, women fleeing abuse across borders have struggled to gain recognition of domestic violence and female genital mutilation as grounds for political asylum. Although asylum laws use gender neutral language, these legal standards have long been construed without recognition of women’s particular experiences of abuse and persecution.

Sex-based classifications in immigration law have also extended to undermine aspects of women’s citizenship. For example, until married women were given some legal autonomy within marriage in the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, immigration laws did not recognize them as individuals separate from their husbands, and they traveled under their husband’s passports. Likewise, until 1934, immigration law permitted transmission of citizenship to children through blood from U.S. citizen fathers but not mothers. And from 1907 to 1922, United States citizen women who married noncitizens lost their citizenship—a policy that was deemed necessary to prevent foreign influences from undermining American society.

Some of these sex-based immigration laws are still in force. Restrictions on immigration of prostitutes and low-income individuals, for example, while modified in the intervening generations, still persist and fall particularly hard on women immigrants. Among others, women who have been trafficked by third parties or otherwise forced into prostitution may have difficulty entering as immigrants under these rules. Similarly, immigrant women fleeing abuse who must turn to domestic violence shelters or other community assistance for support may run afoul of immigration laws barring entry of those liable to be a public charge. U.S. citizens are also still subject to sex-based laws; for example, paralleling domestic policies that give mothers greater responsibility than fathers for nonmarital children, immigration law permits citizen mothers to freely transmit their citizenship to their foreign-born out-of-wedlock children, while fathers seeking to transmit citizenship must meet a host of specific criteria before the child's eighteenth birthday.

Nevertheless, women make up a significant percentage of new arrivals to the United States, including undocumented immigrants. In 2004, females accounted for 55 percent of new legal permanent residents and 54 percent of persons naturalizing. According to 2002 data, women constituted 41 percent of the adult undocumented population.

The predominance of women immigrants will continue to create pressure to enact laws addressing issues faced disproportionately by women, such as domestic violence. In addition, as the rights of homosexuals continue to expand internationally, U.S. immigration law will face a new set of challenges arising from changing norms of sex and sexuality. For example, although several nations and some states now recognize same-sex marriages or civil unions, United States immigration law continues to limit marriage-based immigration benefits to individuals in heterosexual relationships.

MARTHA F. DAVIS

References and Further Reading

- Abrams, Kerry. Polygamy, Prostitution and the Federalization of Immigration Law, Columbia Law Review 105 (2005): 3: 641–716.
- Annual Flow Report, Office of Immigration Statistics, Department of Homeland Security, June 2005.
- Bredbenner, Candice Lewis. A Nationality of Her Own: Women, Marriage, and the Law of Citizenship. Berkeley and Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1998.
- Gardner, Martha. The Qualities of a Citizen: Women, Immigration and Citizenship, 1890–1965. Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 2005.
- Peffer, George Anthony. If They Don't Bring Their Women Here: Chinese Female Immigration before Exclusion. Urbana: University of Illinois Press, 1999.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Page Law of 1875, Act of March 3, 1875, ch. 141, 18 Stat. 477

See also Fiallo v. Bell, 430 U.S. 787 (1977); Illegitimacy and Immigration; Immigration and Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986

SHAPIRO v. THOMPSON, 394 U.S. 618 (1969)

Welfare programs requiring a certain length of residence in the state as a condition of eligibility had become a subject of debate in the years following Edwards v. California (1941). Some commentators argued that welfare waiting periods, by denying benefits to recent residents, were inconsistent with the constitutional right to travel. In Shapiro v. Thompson, applicants to several state welfare programs challenged statutes requiring one year of residence for eligibility for Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC). The Court's six-to-three decision held that these requirements were unconstitutional.

Building on Edwards, the majority concluded that "A state may no more try to fence out those indigents who seek higher welfare benefits than it may try to fence out indigents generally." The Court applied the strict scrutiny standard of the equal protection clause to review the States' interference in movement across state borders and found it to be unconstitutional. The statutes in effect served to penalize applicants' exercise of the right to travel, and without showing that waiting periods were necessary to serve the States' fiscal interests, they could not be justified. States' argument that the Congress had authorized states to impose durational residency requirements up to one year in AFDC programs was rejected, because the case involved the constitutionality of state statutes and Congress "may not authorize the states to violate the equal protection clause."

Shapiro settled the debate over the constitutionality of welfare waiting periods, and residency requirements were abolished in subsequent years. In effect, this decision secured the right to travel that was first recognized in Edwards v. California.

DIANA H. YOON

References and Further Reading

- Rotunda, Ronald, John E. Nowak, and J. Nelson Young. Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure. 3rd Ed., Vol. 3, St. Paul, MN: West, 1999, pp. 775–794.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Edwards v. California, 314 U.S. 160 (1941)

See also Right to Travel; Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)

SHAUGHNESSY v. UNITED STATES EX REL. MEZEI, 345 U.S. 206 (1953)

Mezei was a legal permanent resident in the United States for twenty-five years when he left to visit his dying mother in Romania. When he returned to the United States, Mezei was temporarily excluded under the Passport Bill, 22 U.S.C. 223, and then permanently excluded from the country, without a hearing and based on secret evidence. Mezei was considered a threat to national security because he had gone behind the Iron Curtain and had been out of the country for nineteen months. He was indefinitely detained at Ellis Island while the United States refused to admit him, because no other country he applied to would accept him.

Mezei applied for a writ of habeas corpus, which the Supreme Court ultimately denied. The Supreme Court held that legal permanent residents who have left the country for a significant amount of time do not have procedural due process rights. Mezei was treated as an arriving alien rather than a deported alien, and thus the court interpreted his case as an exclusion proceeding. Mezei's holding at Ellis Island gave him no rights, because legal territorial fiction defined him as outside of the country. The Supreme Court denied Mezei habeas corpus and denied him admittance to the United States.

Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei is one of the most famous and fought over cases in immigration law, and is one of a trilogy of post-World War II security cases, including Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding and Knauff v. Shaughnessy. These three cases are among the most important modern cases defining the procedural due process rights of aliens.

VALENA ELIZABETH BEETY

References and Further Reading

Aleinikoff, Thomas Alexander, David A. Martin, and Hiroshi Motomura. Immigration and Citizenship: Process and Policy. St. Paul, MN: West, 2003, pp. 460–472.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Kwong Hai Chew v. Colding, 344 U.S. 590 (1953)
Knauff v. Shaughnessy, 338 U.S. 537 (1950)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Alien and Sedition Act (1798); Chae Chan Ping v. U.S., 130 U.S. 581 (1889) and Chinese Exclusion Act; Communism and the Cold War; Due Process in Immigration; Habeas Corpus: Modern History; Harisiades v. Shaughnessy, 342 U.S. 580 (1952); Noncitizens and Civil Liberties

SHAW, LEMUEL (1781–1861)

Lemuel Shaw, nineteenth-century jurist, was born to a Congregationalist minister in Barnstable, Massachusetts, on January 9, 1781. Shaw learned English and how to read the Bible as he helped to maintain the farm in the small town. In 1795, he left his family's farm to prepare for Harvard College. Failing his initial college entry examination, Shaw passed on his second try and was admitted to Harvard in 1796 and graduated in 1800. After college, Shaw became a schoolteacher and prepared for a legal career under the tutelage of attorney David Everett and his law partner Thomas Selfridge.

In 1804, he was admitted to the New Hampshire and Massachusetts bars, which would be the start of a career as a prominent figure in the American judicial system, particularly Massachusetts. Soon after admittance to the bar, he began to practice law in Boston. He was a Federalist in the Massachusetts House of Representatives from 1811 to 1814, 1820, and 1829. He served in the state Senate from 1821 to 1822 and was a delegate to the Massachusetts state convention of 1820–1821.

Shaw, who helped structure the first Boston charter in 1821, would later become chief justice of the Massachusetts Supreme Court from 1830 to 1860. It was in this capacity that he made monumental legal decisions that shaped the American judicial system, particularly Massachusetts. Several of Shaw's notable cases include Commonwealth v. Hunt (1842), Roberts v. City of Boston (1849), Commonwealth v. Alger (1851), and Brown v. Kendall (1850).

Before Commonwealth v. Hunt, workers were not legally allowed to organize to improve their working conditions. In 1840, seven shoemakers were charged with organizing themselves to extort money from their employer. Guided by precedents set in the 1349 English Statute of Labourers, labor unions were viewed as criminal. In Hunt, Shaw abandoned this perception and found that members of labor unions were not engaging in criminal behavior and conspiracies against their employers when they sought better work conditions.

Shaw's ruling in Roberts v. City of Boston also would be influential. The case outlined the judicial framework for legalized segregation that would later be adopted in Plessy v. Ferguson (1896). Five-year-old Sarah Roberts, after four attempts, was barred from attending the local school because of her color, and her father, Benjamin Roberts, sued the city arguing that it was in violation of the 1845 Boston statute that made any child excluded from public instruction eligible to recover damages. The Court ruled that the issue of race was not perverted, because the case hinged on the school committee's power to use its judgment to control itself, which included authority to maintain a system of separate white and black primary schools.

Another of Shaw's rulings, Commonwealth v. Alger, has been instrumental in shaping and defining constitutional law and police authority. The case stemmed from an indictment of a defendant who built a wharf that extended beyond the boundary set by Boston legislators. Shaw ruled that in certain circumstances, government had the right to regulate private property. The government had the right to protect and promote the general public welfare, and to do so boundaries and limitations on private property could be imposed. Furthermore, the ruling held that the state had the right to reasonably restrict an individual's use of private property for the benefit of the good of the general public and the right to enforce the state's restrictions.

In Brown v. Kendall, the plaintiff was struck in the face and injured with a stick while the defendant was attempting to break up a fight between the plaintiff's and defendant's dogs. The ruling in the case established negligence as the main criterion of tort law. In addition, it established that plaintiffs have the burden of proving the negligence of the defendant. Shaw ruled that the act was unintentional and that the plaintiff failed to prove that the defendant was neglect.

Chief Justice Lemuel Shaw of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts was arguably the most influential figure in the American judicial system in the mid-nineteenth century. He is often viewed as a pillar in American legal history, writing more than 2,000 opinions during his career. Shaw died in Boston on March 30, 1861, after an extensive legal career that still affects modern law and times.

BA-SHEN WELCH

References and Further Reading

- Chase, Frederic Hathaway. Lemuel Shaw: Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, 1830–1860. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Company, 1918.
- Levy, Leonard W. The Law of the Commonwealth and Chief Justice Shaw. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1957.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Brown v. Kendall*, 60 Mass. 292 (1850)
Commonwealth v. Alger, 61 Mass. 53 (1851)
Commonwealth v. Hunt, 45 Mass. 111 (1842)
Roberts v. City of Boston, 59 Mass. 198 (1849)

SHELLEY v. KRAEMER, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)

As a powerful weapon against discrimination, the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits only state (not private) actions. The United States Supreme Court decision in Shelley, however, made a remarkable effort to eliminate at least some private discrimination.

On February 1911, thirty of thirty-nine owners of property in a district located in St. Louis signed a restrictive covenant, which prohibits "any person not of the Caucasian race" from occupying any part of the property for a term of fifty years. These thirty owners held title to forty-seven parcels, including the contended one in Shelley, in a total of fifty-seven parcels. On August 1945, Shelley, who is African American, purchased a parcel in such a district without actual knowledge of the restrictive agreement. Owners of other property brought lawsuit to restrain Shelly from taking possession of the property. The trial court denied their request on the ground that the restrictive agreement had never become complete and final because it failed to collect signatures of all owners. The Supreme Court of Missouri reversed and held the agreement effective.

The issue before the U.S. Supreme Court (the Court) is "whether the equal protection of the Fourteenth Amendment inhibits judicial enforcement by state courts of such restrictive covenants based on race or color." The Court noticed that the restrictive covenant in this case only serves one purpose, that is, to exclude the use of the properties by racial minorities, and it is therefore discriminatory in nature. The Court affirmed that the rights to "acquire, enjoy, own and dispose of property" are essential rights guaranteed by the Fourteenth Amendment. In its precedent, the Court had declared unconstitutional several discriminatory ordinances that denied racial minorities the rights of property. However, the present case did not involve actions by state legislature or city councils. Rather, the agreement was made by a group of individuals and therefore not governed by the Constitution. The focus now is whether the judicial enforcement of such a private agreement is a state action governed by the Constitution. The Court held that actions of state courts and judicial officials are state actions. In Shelley, both buyers and sellers were willing parties in a transaction. "But for active intervention of the state courts, supported by the full panoply of state power," Shelley would have been free to occupy the property. As a result, the state had denied Shelley the equal protection of the laws.

Although three Justices did not participate in the case, all other six Justices in the Court agreed on its decision. Shelley became a major victory for racial minorities in the protection of their property rights. In 1994, the Federal Housing Act, 42 U.S.C.A. §§3601-3631, was enacted as Title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968 to impose further restraints against potential discrimination. On the other hand, Shelley raised a concern about how broad the Court is willing to interpret the concept of “state action.” Critics are afraid that an overbroad reading of state action may intervene and hamper individuals’ private lives.

BIN LIANG

References and Further Reading

Madry, Alan, Private Accountability and the Fourteenth Amendment: State Action, Federalism and Congress, University of Missouri Law Review 59 (1994): 499–568.

———, State Action and the Obligation of the States to Prevent Private Harm: The Rehnquist Transformation and the Betrayal of Fundamental Commitments, Southern California Law Review 65 (1992): 781–844.

Saxer, Shelley Ross. Shelley v. Kraemer’s Fiftieth Anniversary: “A Time for Keeping; a Time for Throwing Away”?, Kansas Law Review 47 (1998): 61–120.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Federal Housing Act, 42 U.S.C.A. §§3601–3631

SHEPARD, MATTHEW (1976–1998)

On the night of Tuesday, October 6, 1998, Matthew Shepard, a young, twenty-one-year-old homosexual male, went into a bar alone for a drink at the Fireside Bar after attending a meeting at the University of Wyoming’s Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender Association. Inside, he met two men in their twenties who posed as homosexual men and lured Shepard outside. There, Aaron McKinney and Russell Henderson kidnapped Shepard at gunpoint and drove to a remote area outside Laramie, a small town of 26,000 people in rural Wyoming. They tortured Shepard and left him to die tied to a buck-rail fence in the cold more than 7,000 feet above sea level. He was found the following morning by a mountain biker. Transferred to a hospital in critical condition, Shepard, a native of Casper, Wyoming, died on October 12 from fatal injuries incurred during the attack. The town of Laramie later passed a bias crime ordinance in response to Shepard’s death. His killers, McKinney and Henderson, each received two consecutive life sentences in prison.

Shepard was one of thirty-four gay men and women killed in 1998 for their sexual orientation, and his death in particular became a catalyst for calls for hate crime legislation as a violation of basic human rights. Activists defined a hate crime as any crime perpetuated on an individual because of the appearance of particular characteristics or because of one’s apparent membership in a particular group. In other words, such crimes overtly functioned to deny a person’s access to human rights. As of 2000, twenty-one states had passed hate crime legislation that covered sexual orientation in their definition. Of the hate crimes reported to the FBI that same year, those crimes based on one’s sexual orientation accounted for the third highest reason for the crimes, at 11 percent, falling behind race with the highest percentage and religion as second.

MELISSA OOTEN

References and Further Reading

Kaufman, Moises. The Laramie Project. New York: Vintage Books, 2001.

Loffreda, Beth. Losing Matt Shepard: Life and Politics in the Aftermath of Anti-Gay Murder. New York: Columbia University Press, 2000.

Swigonski, Mary. From Hate Crimes to Human Rights: A Tribute to Matthew Shepard. New York: Harrington Park Press, 2001.

See also Hate Crime Laws; Hate Crimes

SHERBERT v. VERNER, 374 U.S. 398 (1963)

Sherbert v. Verner has been rightly termed a “high water mark” in the constitutional protection of minority religious beliefs against state laws not targeted at specific religious practices. Sherbert served as the Supreme Court’s standard test in Free Exercises cases from 1963 to 1990, when it was effectively overruled for most cases by Employment Division, Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith. In Sherbert, the Supreme Court held that strict scrutiny would be extended to state laws that applied uniformly to all persons but imposed a substantial burden on minority religious adherents whose religious practice conflicted with those laws.

In 1957, Adell H. Sherbert, a textile mill worker in Spartanburg, South Carolina, became a member of the Seventh-Day Adventist Church, a Christian denomination that requires members to observe Saturdays as the Sabbath and a day of rest. Two years later, the workweek at the mill where she was employed changed to six days; and Sherbert was discharged when she refused to work on Saturday. Sherbert looked for Monday-to-Friday work with the other three mills in Spartanburg but could not find any suitable employment. She filed a claim with the South Carolina Unemployment Commission, indicating that she would be willing to accept work at other mills or in other industries so long as she was not required to work Saturdays. However, she was denied unemployment compensation because she “failed without good cause . . . to accept available suitable work when offered [her] by the employment office or the employer . . .” as required by the South Carolina unemployment law.

In Sherbert, the Supreme Court restated the free exercise clause prohibition against “governmental regulation of religious beliefs” but rejected the view that individuals’ actions in accordance with their religious convictions could not be regulated by the state. This ruling recalled the so-called belief-action distinction announced in Reynolds v. United States, a major Free Exercise case that had upheld a Mormon’s conviction for the religious practice of polygamy in the late nineteenth century.

Although it acknowledged that legislatures can regulate religious conduct, the Sherbert Court imposed a higher standard on state regulation of such conduct than in previous cases, holding the state could not disqualify Adell Sherbert from unemployment benefits unless it justified any incidental burden on her free exercise of religion by a compelling state interest.

As a threshold requirement, the Sherbert Court required that a reviewing court determine whether a religious claimant’s Free Exercise rights had actually been infringed before applying strict scrutiny. Rejecting a distinction between direct and indirect state burdens, the Court held that the burden on Sherbert constituted a constitutional infringement because it “force[d] her to choose between following the precepts of her religion and forfeiting benefits, on the one hand, and abandoning one of the precepts of her religion in order to accept work, on the other hand.” In the Court’s view, to impose such a choice on Sherbert burdened her as much as if the state had fined her for worshipping on Saturday.

This burden was more significant than the burden imposed on Orthodox Jews who had to close their businesses on Saturday for their Sabbath and also under Sunday closing laws, thereby losing an extra day of income, in Braunfeld v. Brown.

Applying strict scrutiny to the statute, the Court held that in the proceedings below the state had not offered any compelling interest for its regulation or evidence that such an interest was endangered, such as proof that fraudulent religious claims threatened the unemployment fund or South Carolina employers’ ability to schedule their workforce. Moreover, the Court held, even if such proof was available, the state had the burden of demonstrating that it could not find alternative regulations to combat such abuses without infringing on religious freedom rights, applying the second prong of the strict scrutiny test.

Although Sherbert held out the promise of extraordinary protection for religious minorities forced into a religious Hobson’s choice by state legislatures unaware or unconcerned about their plight, subsequent cases did not bear out that promise. In some cases, the Court directly applied the Sherbert test to invalidate the state law, such as in Wisconsin v. Yoder, overruling Wisconsin’s demand that Amish children attend school after the eighth grade; and in Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div and Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm’n of Florida, cases invalidating unemployment compensation denials to workers whose religious views conflicted with their jobs.

However, in many other cases, the Court refused to extend protection under the Sherbert rule, while not discarding it as the constitutional standard. In some cases, the Court did not extend protection to religious claimants because they had not shown a constitutionally sufficient burden on their Free Exercise rights. See, for example, Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protection Ass’n (federal government not required to use its lands in manner that would protect American Indian religious practices; its action did not coerce or penalize Free Exercise rights); Bowen v. Roy (federal government not required to administer Social Security system to respond to religious beliefs of Native Americans who believed that assignment of a social security number would rob their daughter of her spirit; its action did not involve coercion); and United States v. Gillette (failure to extend federal conscientious objector exemptions to religious claimants who wishes to object to particular wars imposed only “an incidental burden” on them).

In other cases, involving religious claimants in prison and in the military, the Court simply carved out exceptions to Sherbert, holding that deferential review or “reasonableness” standard would be applied in such settings. See, for example, Goldman v. Weinberger (rejecting challenge to military dress regulations that forbade the wearing of yarmulkes) and O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz (upholding prison’s refusal to excuse inmates from work requirements to attend worship services). In still other cases, such as United States v. Lee, involving the religious challenge of an Amish employer to the requirement that he pay Social Security taxes for his employee, the Court held that the state had met the strict scrutiny test.

In 1990, religious freedom advocates were stunned by the dramatic reversal in the Court’s doctrine in Employment Division, Dept. of Human Services of Oregon v. Smith. In Smith, the Court held that Sherbert would not be applicable to challenges to neutral, generally applicable criminal laws that were not targeted at particular religious beliefs. The Court appeared to carve out two exceptions for cases in which Sherbert would continue to apply: first, it remains viable law for government programs such as unemployment compensation where the state provides individual exemptions from the rules for others and may not refuse those exemptions to persons with “religious hardships” without a compelling reason. Second, the Court will continue to exercise strict scrutiny in cases such as Yoder, where a religious freedom claim is joined with other constitutional rights, such as freedom of speech or the rights of parents to raise their children, so-called hybrid rights cases. Smith also continued the practice exercising strict scrutiny to review laws that are not “neutral” and “generally applicable” but are targeted at particular religions or aimed at conduct because it is religious.

After a public firestorm in the wake of the Smith decision, Congress attempted to reinstate the Sherbert standard in the Religious Freedom Restoration Act (RFRA.) However, in City of Boerne v. Flores, the Supreme Court held that RFRA was unconstitutional at least as applied to state laws, because it exceeded Congressional power granted by section 5 of the Fourteenth Amendment to protect Free Exercise as a liberty under the due process clause.

Thus, the Sherbert decision has been supplanted by Smith in many, but not all, of the cases to which it formerly applied. Many courts have continued to find cases of “individualized assessment” and “hybrid rights” where Sherbert applies, and at least some cases have found that and City of Boerne does not prevent RFRA from being applied against the federal government. In addition, a number of states have adopted the Sherbert test to interpret their own state constitutional provisions guaranteeing free exercise of religion or passed “mini-RFRA” laws that provide heightened judicial protection for Free Exercise claims.

MARIE A. FAILINGER

References and Further Reading

- Abraham, Henry, and Barbara A Perry. Freedom and the Court: Civil Rights and Liberties in the United States. 7th ed. New York, NY: Oxford University Press, 1998, pp. 235–265.
- Gaffney, Edward McGlynn, Jr., Curious Chiasma: Rising and Falling Protection of Religious Liberty, University of Pennsylvania Journal of Constitutional Law 4 (2002): 394–449.
- Greenawalt, Kent, Quo Vadis: The Status and Prospects of “Tests” under the Religion Clauses, Supreme Court Review (1995): 323–391.

Redlich, Norman, John Attanasio, and Joel K. Goldstein, Understanding Constitutional Law. 3rd ed. New York, NY: Matthew Bender, 2004, pp. 737–750.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowen v. Roy*, 476 U.S. 693 (1986)
Braunfeld v. Brown, 366 U.S. 599 (1961)
Church of the Lukumi Babalu Aye Inc., v. City of Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
City of Boerne v. Flores, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971)
Goldman v. Weinberger, 475 U.S. 503 (1986)
Hobbie v. Unemployment Appeals Comm’n of Florida, 480 U.S. 136 (1987)
Lyng v. Northwest Indian Cemetery Protective Ass’n, 485 U.S. 439 (1988)
O’Lone v. Estate of Shabazz, 482 U.S. 342 (1987)
 Religious Freedom Restoration Act, 42 U.S.C.A. § 2000bb et seq. (1990)
Reynolds v. United States, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
Thomas v. Review Bd. of Indiana Employment Security Div., 450 U.S. 707 (1981)
United States v. Lee, 455 U.S. 252 (1982)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

SHERMAN ACT

The Sherman Act, commonly known as the Sherman Anti-Trust Act, was the first government action taken to limit trust companies, which often monopolized certain industries, and therefore, segments of the economy. Passed in 1890, it was named after Senator John Sherman of Ohio, and made “every contract, combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, or with foreign nations . . . illegal.” The Sherman Act also placed a burden of responsibility on district courts and government attorneys to investigate possible trust violations and explained the possible consequences to violators.

Changes in manufacturing practices contributed to the Act’s passage. Starting in the late nineteenth century, large corporations integrated horizontally and vertically to form oligopolies and monopolies in their respective areas of industry. Some of the trusts that emerged in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries were Standard Oil, American Sugar Refining Company, American Tobacco Company, and United States Steel. Despite its aims, the Sherman Act failed to regulate trusts until Theodore Roosevelt’s presidency because of adverse court rulings.

Roosevelt undertook a trust-busting campaign and overcame the Supreme Court ruling in United States v. E. C. Knight (1895), which impaired the enforcement of the Sherman Act by exempting manufacturing corporations from the Act's authority. However, in 1904, the Supreme Court consented that Northern Securities Company, a railroad monopoly, should be dissolved because it dealt with interstate transportation. President Roosevelt continued to pursue antitrust suits, initiating more than forty antitrust proceedings. Roosevelt's successor, William Howard Taft, also supported trustbusting. Under Taft's presidency there were twice as many antitrust suits as during his predecessor's terms.

The Sherman Act was also used against labor movements. By including all organizations in its original wording, the Act could be used against labor unions during strikes by claiming they unlawfully interfered with commerce. The most famous of such cases was the 1894 Pullman strike near Chicago, Illinois. Employees paid high rent for company-owned housing within the model town of Pullman and suffered from reduced wages simultaneously. Those conditions, among others, caused the workers at the Pullman Palace Car Company, a luxury sleeper rail car manufacturer, to strike. In doing so, the strikers asked the American Railway Union (ARU) to boycott Pullman cars and to disconnect them from every train and depart without them. Once the ARU agreed, the General Managers Association (GMA), formed by twenty-four railway companies to help combat the increasing power of labor unions, claimed only railway managers could determine which cars made up the trains and that they would fire any worker supporting the boycott. These actions resulted in 150,000 ARU members striking, causing rail traffic to halt, and the intervention of the federal government on the side of the GMA. United States Attorney General Richard Olney obtained an injunction against the strikers, claiming the strike prevented mail delivery and violated the Sherman Act by restricting commerce. Persuaded by Olney and fearful of violence, President Grover Cleveland authorized the use of United States marshals and federal troops to protect the trains operated by strikebreakers. Violence increased with the arrival of the troops; railroad property was attacked and burned, and fights broke out in the streets of Chicago between the authorities and strikers. The strike, which had started May 12, ended July 8 with the death of thirty-four people. The use of the injunction made striking illegal and thus in effect denied the union members freedom of expression and freedom of association.

This type of use of the Sherman Act resulted in criticism from organized labor, the People's Party, Progressives in both parties, and liberal academics and political activists. In 1914, during Woodrow Wilson's presidency, the Sherman Act was amended through the passage of the Clayton Antitrust Act. The latter Act banned practices such as price fixing but also exempted unions and farmers' organizations from prosecution under antitrust laws. Since 1914, the United States Congress passed additional legislation aimed to strengthen the Sherman Act's effectiveness, such as the Robinson-Patman Act of 1936 and the Hart-Scott-Rodino Antitrust Improvements Act of 1976. In June 2004, President George W. Bush signed into law the Criminal Antitrust Penalty Enhancement and Reform Act, which increased the maximum Sherman Act penalties for corporations to $100 million, for individuals to $1 million, and for jail terms to ten years. This most recent act also heightened incentives for corporations to self-report criminal activity and aims to enhance the antimonopoly policy.

HEIDI SCOTT GIUSTO

References and Further Reading

- Chandler, Alfred D. Jr. The Visible Hand: The Managerial Revolution in American Business. Cambridge, Mass.: The Belknap Press of Harvard University Press, 1977.
- "Clayton Anti-Trust Act of 1914." United States Statutes at Large (63rd Congress, Session II, Chapter 323), pp. 730–740 and in Online Serial Essential Documents in American History, Essential Documents 1492–Present (1997).
- Johnsen, Julia E. Trade Unions and the Anti-Trust Laws, The Reference Shelf, Vol. 13, No. 10. New York: H.W. Wilson Company, 1940.
- Labor Law. Application of Sherman Anti-Trust Act to Sit-Down Strikes*, Virginia Law Review, 26 (February, 1940): 4: 518–519.
- Painter, Nell Irvin. Standing at Armageddon: The United States 1877–1919. New York: W.W. Norton & Company, 1987.
- Pate, R. Hewitt. "Assistant Attorney General for Antitrust, R. Hewitt Pate, Issues Statement on Enactment of Antitrust Criminal Penalty Enhancement and Reform Act of 2004," http://www.usdoj.gov/atr/public/press_releases/2004/204319.htm, (June 23, 2004).
- "Sherman Anti-Trust Act of 1890." United States Statutes at Large (51st Congress, Session I, Chapter 647), pp. 209–210 and in Online Serial Essential Documents in American History, Essential Documents 1492–Present (1997).
- Taft, William Howard. The Anti-Trust Act and the Supreme Court. New York: Harper & Brothers Publishers, 1914.

SHERMAN, ROGER (1721–1793)

Known for his integrity, persistence, and sensibility, Roger Sherman was a statesman who served as a member of the Continental Congresses, fought for and signed the Declaration of Independence, was instrumental in the drafting of the Constitution, and was a member of the first U.S. Congress. Considered a political moderate because of his recognition of a need for a strong national government alongside his persistent dedication to the power of governance by the states, Sherman remained an avid believer in democratic rule as a means to ensure against tyranny and called for independence from the crippling hand of the British. Roger Sherman's integrity and work ethic enabled his integral work behind the scenes in attending to the everyday affairs of a country fighting for independence and striving to be a successful democracy. For instance, he was active in congressional committees that dealt with the war effort (particularly providing the necessary supplies to the revolutionary army), the treatment of Western lands, and he dealt closely with the challenging public finance matters such as the use of paper money, and state and national debt. He worked for much-needed stability in the formative years of the nation. Sherman is credited as the first to propose and argue for a bicameral legislature, with representation by colonies, and, concurrently, by population, a compromise that protected the interests of smaller states (such as his home state Connecticut). In fact, at the time of the Constitutional Convention, Sherman called for a national government of limited powers, leaving most matters to the states, out of a fear that a national government would end any notions of equality among disparate states. He believed that the states best represented the intent of the people and resisted any efforts to reduce their power. For similar reasons, he opposed a bill of rights, since he sincerely believed that rights were and would be protected adequately at the state level. In addition, because the Constitution enumerated specific federal powers, Sherman saw no need for any additional limits on government, because the government was, by definition, limited. Although Sherman's prostate position lost out to a strong national government and a bill of rights, Sherman's views provide a basis for the reservation of police powers in the respective states. He believed that if there were even a need for a bill of rights against the government, it would not be a government with real staying power.

Finally, Sherman favored acts of legislature over a strong executive, because a powerful president was, in his estimation, a throwback to British rule. He believed that the veto, which vested absolute decision-making in the hands of one person, represented the kind of absolutism practiced by the British monarchy, the abuses of which had led to the revolutionary war in the first place. Overall, he was suspicious of executive power and urged structural protections such as a limited veto, short terms in office, and a council that could check the president's actions.

JAMES F. VAN ORDEN

References and Further Reading

- Collier, Christopher. Roger Sherman's Connecticut: Yankee Politics and the American Revolution. Wesleyan University Press. 1971.
- Boardman, Roger Sherman. Roger Sherman: Signer and Statesman. University of Pennsylvania Press. 1938.

SHIELD LAWS

Shield laws generally allow journalists to refuse to testify in court proceedings to protect confidential sources or information gained in confidence. Shield laws vary widely: Some provide absolute protection for withholding sources or confidential information; others provide a qualified privilege that may be overcome with a showing of need. Shield laws are applied differently in civil and criminal cases.

Maryland enacted the first state shield law in 1896. Now, thirty-one states have such laws, and a majority of states recognize a reporter's privilege, either in their constitutions or common law.

No federal shield law exists, and the U.S. Supreme Court has not recognized a reporter's privilege stemming from the First Amendment. In Branzburg v. Hayes, a five-to-four majority ruled against the reporters in three cases decided together. However, parts of Justice Lewis Powell's concurring opinion were consistent with the minority view. That led appellate courts to recognize a constitutional protection of reporter's privilege.

By and large, federal courts have allowed for at least limited First Amendment protections. However, some U.S. Circuit Courts of Appeals have not. In 2001 and 2002, a freelance writer in Houston was jailed for 168 days on contempt charges after she refused to reveal material from an interview with a murder suspect. In 2005, New York Times reporter Judith Miller spent eighty-five days in jail for refusing to divulge the source of information related to the leaking of the name of an undercover CIA agent. For legal and political reasons, the case generated much publicity, even though Miller never published a news article.

GILBERT D. MARTINEZ

References and Further Reading

- Overbeck, Wayne. Major Principles of Media Law. Belmont, CA: Thomson Wadsworth, 2005.
- Siegel, Paul. Communication Law in America. Boston: Allyn and Bacon, 2002.
- "The Reporter's Privilege: An Introduction." <http://www.rcfp.org/cgi-local/privilege/item.cgi?i=intro>.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Branzburg v. Hayes, 408 U.S. 665 (1972)

SHOPPING CENTERS AND FREEDOM OF SPEECH

Shopping centers have grown from virtual nonexistence in the middle of the twentieth century to a dominant feature on the American landscape today. Along with their growth as commercial centers, modern shopping centers have become important places to engage in expressive activity—political speech, protests, and so forth. Not all speakers are welcome; mall owners have sought to exclude those activities they believe improperly intrude on private property.

Several Supreme Court decisions from 1968 to 1980 took a roundabout path to holding that no First Amendment expressive right is guaranteed in shopping centers by the U.S. Constitution, but the states are free to decide whether their constitutions extend greater rights to the individual. In 1968, the Court held that the First Amendment protected the right to free speech in shopping malls. Four years later, that position started to erode; the Court reconsidered, ruling that the invitation extended by shopping center owners to the public was limited to business-related matters. The original prospeech position fell entirely in 1976; the Court held unequivocally that the Constitution does not protect speech activity in shopping malls.

There is a twist—in 1980, the Court held that States might provide greater protection of speech rights than the federal constitution. The Court did not back down from its previous opinions; instead, its central premise was that the limitations on the U.S. Constitution do not also limit a state's authority to offer greater protection of individual liberties. The states have been divided over this question; there is no consensus.

MARK C. ALEXANDER

Cases and Statutes Cited

Amalgamated Food Employees Union Local 590 v. Logan Valley Plaza, Inc., 391 U.S. 308 (1968)
Hudgens v. National Labor Relations Board, 424 U.S. 527 (1976)
Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)
Prune Yard Shopping Center v. Robins, 447 U.S. 74 (1980)

SICURELLA v. UNITED STATES, 348 U.S. 385 (1955)

In times of war, the United States government often has to balance one's individual right to religious expression with the country's need to arm itself sufficiently. Central to this task is determining whether or not a military registrant truly opposes war in all forms, especially where the registrant's faith demands he or she be prepared for a theocratic war.

Two years after registering with his local draft board, Sicurella was classified for general military service. A Jehovah's Witness since the age of six, the petitioner filed a conscientious objector claim noting that he was already "'serving as a soldier of Jehovah's appointed Commander Jesus Christ,'" which prohibited him from participating in any military war. Asked whether there were circumstances in which he supported war, he replied that he would fight to defend "Kingdom Interests," but only with the weapons of prayer. Although the sincerity of his objections was not doubted, the board denied his claim because he did not demonstrate opposition to war in all forms. On the Department of Justice's advice, the Appeal Board upheld the denial. Sicurella was subsequently prosecuted for refusing to appear for induction.

The fundamental issue before the Supreme Court was whether Sicurella's assertion that he would support war for his Kingdom's defense disqualified his conscientious objector claim on grounds that he did not oppose "participation in war in any form." Justice Tom Clark held that it did not. A former National Guardsman and attorney with the Department of Justice, Clark clarified that the conscientious objector test did not require opposition to all war, but opposition to participating in war on religious grounds. Even though Sicurella averred a willingness to use spiritual weapons in theocratic wars, he consistently opposed any "carnal warfare of this world." Clark insisted that Congress did not intend beliefs in biblical wars to preclude objector status but instead expected claims to be measured against opposition to "real shooting wars . . . between nations of the earth in our time," with tangible weaponry like airplanes, missiles, and guns. He further noted that the Appeal Board must clearly identify the grounds on which it denies an objector's claim; where it fails to do so, rejection on illegitimate or arbitrary grounds could threaten "the integrity of the Selective Service System." In sum, the Supreme Court overruled the lower tribunals because the government could not deny conscientious objector status if a registrant supported spiritual wars that have "neither the bark nor bite" of modern total warfare.

The Supreme Court has not wavered from limiting Sicurella's application to conscientious objections to participating in shooting wars on religious grounds. In Gillette v. United States, the Court refused to allow a petitioner to object to a particular war (Vietnam) on grounds that he found it "unjust." Furthermore, Clark's call for specified grounds for rejection affected several suits, including Muhammad Ali's much-publicized objector case. The Court reversed Ali's conviction because it was impossible to determine on which grounds the Appeal Board rejected his claim, especially where two were admittedly invalid.

DOMINIC DEBRINCAT

Cases and Statutes Cited

Clay v. United States, 403 U.S. 698 (1971)
Gillette v. United States, 401 U.S. 437 (1971)
 Universal Military Training and Service Act, Act of June 24, 1948, 50 U.S.C. Appx 456(j) and 462(a), 62 Stat. 604

See also Clark, Tom Cambell; Conscientious Objection, the Free Exercise Clause; Jehovah's Witnesses and Religious Liberty

SIMOPOULOS v. VIRGINIA, 462 U.S. 506 (1983)

In 1973, the United States Supreme Court (the Court) handed down its landmark decision in Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973), holding that the right of privacy, guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution, encompasses a woman's decision whether or not to terminate her pregnancy. The affirmed abortion right, however, never ended the abortion debate. In the next twenty years, for example, the Court had to make twenty-one more abortion decisions, and Simopoulos is one of them.

In Simopoulos, the appellant was an obstetrician-gynecologist who practiced in Virginia. In November 1979, P.M., a seventeen-year-old high school student, approached the appellant at his unlicensed clinic and requested an abortion. P.M. was five months pregnant (well into the second trimester) and never advised her parents of her decision despite the appellant's advice. After an injection of saline solution by the appellant at the clinic, P.M. aborted her fetus in a motel bathroom, and the police found the fetus later on the same day. As a result, the appellant was indicted for unlawfully performing an abortion during the second trimester of pregnancy outside of a licensed hospital and was convicted by Virginia courts.

On appeal, the Court affirmed the conviction. In its majority opinion, five justices held that Virginia's requirement that the second trimester abortion be performed in licensed hospitals was constitutional. The Court reaffirmed that a state has an "important and legitimate interest in the health of the mother," and it becomes compelling at approximately the end of the first trimester. Such interest allows the state to regulate the facilities and circumstances in which abortions are performed. Distinguishing from its decision in Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983), the Court pointed out that the term "hospital," defined by the Virginia Code (not by the Virginia abortion statute itself), was broad enough to include "outpatient hospitals." Unlike provisions in Akron, the Virginia regulations did not require that "the patient be hospitalized as an inpatient or that the abortion be performed in a full-service, acute-care hospital." Rather, these regulations seemed to be generally compatible with accepted medical standards, and the Virginia's requirement was not an unreasonable means of furthering the state's compelling interest in protecting women's health and safety. Three more justices also concurred that the Virginia's requirement was not an undue burden on a woman's decision to undergo an abortion and argued that the mandatory hospitalization requirement need not be contingent on the trimester. Justice Stevens dissented and believed that the exact meaning of the Virginia Code was ambiguous and that it requires further clarification.

Handed down along with Akron and Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 463 U.S. 506 (1983), Simopoulos shows once again how the Court has been carefully balancing an individual's rights with the state's legitimate rights, especially in such a delicate abortion issue. Nevertheless, Simopoulos and other 1983 abortion decisions unequivocally reaffirmed women's abortion right in Roe v. Wade.

BIN LIANG

References and Further Reading

Fox, Laura, The 1983 Abortion Decision: Clarification of the Permissible Limits of Abortion Regulation, University of Richmond Law Review 18 (1983): 137-159.
 Harrison, Maureen, and Steve Gilbert, eds. Abortion Decisions of the United States Supreme Court: The 1980's. Beverly Hills, CA: Excellent Books, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Akron v. Akron Center for Reproductive Health, 462 U.S. 416 (1983)
Planned Parenthood v. Ashcroft, 463 U.S. 506 (1983)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)

SINCERITY OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF

The category of "religion" has presented particularly thorny legal problems for the last century. The intellectual difficulty arises from the fact that religion triggers heightened constitutional (and more recently, statutory) protections, while at the same time the specific referent of the word is vague and elastic. To fully allow the term's full scope risks paralyzing government with unending exceptions under the free exercise clause, whereas recognizing only a few threatens not only the principle of religious liberty but also runs afoul of the establishment clause.

The search for a balance initiated at least two discernible responses. First, the Supreme Court tried to define the term according to substantive elements, thereby removing some of its inherent vagueness; and second, it isolated the psychological dimensions of religiosity to be afforded special deference.

"Sincerity of religious belief" belongs to the second phase, during which the Court attempted to fashion a useful standard to identify religion worthy of these legal benefits, and refers to the holding of U.S. v. Ballard, 322 U.S. 78 (1944). To place that rule into jurisprudential context, however, it is necessary to know what came before.

The Path to Ballard

Before Ballard, the definition of religion had been notoriously both ethnocentric and substantive. In general, the successful religious claimant represented majority congregations that espoused specific tenets of faith such as a belief in the Judeo-Christian deity. In the heyday of the anti-Mormon fervor, the Supreme Court announced ever-narrower restrictions on the kinds of activities that could be "religious" and thereby trigger protections under the free exercise clause. Reynolds v. U.S., 98 U.S. 145 (1878), began by emphasizing the idea of one's duty to the Supreme Being, implying that religion was necessarily theistic or including as a tenet of orthodoxy a belief in a nonmaterial, supernatural entity. Only those beliefs should receive constitutional deference.

Davis v. Beason, 133 U.S. 333 (1880), took the criterion of theism from Reynolds and raised it to the sine qua non to find religion and the heightened protections it was promised. Furthermore, whereas Reynolds had bifurcated religion into two elements of protected belief and unprotected action, Davis restricted religion to only the former ("views and obligations"). In contrast, the actions of ritual and behavior were glossed as "cults." This step greatly eased the legal task of identifying what was protected, because the free exercise clause expressly extended only to religion (belief) and excluded all cultic behavior in which those beliefs might find expression.

Finally, The Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. U.S., 136 U.S. 1 (1890), required religion not only to be theistic, but also "enlightened," necessarily diminishing any expectations of protection by minority sects.

Ballard and Sincerity

A definition of religion that essentially protected only Christianity, or religions structurally and theologically analogous to it, became unwieldy as American society become more multicultural and less parochial. Consequently, a new constitutional direction was taken in 1944 when the Court decided Ballard. Guy Ballard represented himself to be "a divine messenger," medium for the "ascended masters" Saint Germain, Jesus, George Washington, and Godfre Ray King. The communicated teachings received through this spiritual mediumship formed the foundation for the "I Am" movement. The Ballards were charged and convicted of mail fraud, accused of soliciting funds "by means of false and fraudulent representations, pretenses and promises" by claiming ability to cure ailments.

The charge hinged on the assertion that the respondents "well knew" that their claimed spiritual powers were false. At trial, the jury charge set aside the question of the truth of the Ballards' religious beliefs; instead, the "issue is: Did these defendants honestly and in good faith believe those things? If they did, they should be acquitted."

The Ninth Circuit reversed the conviction and ordered a new trial, concluding that "the restriction of the issue in question to that of good faith was error," and should have reached to the truth or falsity of the disputed religious tenets. In this, it was imposing a standard that could fit comfortably with Late Corporation's dicta that religion must be "enlightened," a finding that entails an evaluative judgment on the religious beliefs claiming resort to First Amendment protections.

The U.S. Supreme Court, however, now repudiated that line of reasoning. Religious truth could not be adjudicated, because "Heresy trials are foreign to our constitution If one could be sent to jail because a jury in a hostile environment found those teachings false, little indeed would be left of religious freedom."

The Ballard Court found the pivotal distinction between protected religious practice and unprotected fraud to reside not in the truth of the content of the claims, which would forever be beyond the jurisdiction of the courts, but in the defendant's internal, psychological condition when asserting them. Religions did not have to be empirically true but only sincerely believed.

Sincerity's Post-Ballard Elaboration

An immediate implication of this stance is that religion need no longer “look like” Christianity to be protected. This culturally sensitive position, unfortunately, did not resolve the Court’s difficulties with religion but only shifted the field of contest. By what standard could a trier of fact determine whether a party’s religious beliefs were “sincere”? Were such claims even to be adjudicated?

Outside the constitutional context, lower courts grappled with these issues, most significantly in a series of conscientious objector cases from 1943 to 1969. Although decided one year before Ballard, U.S. v. Kauten, 133 F.2d 703 (2d Cir. 1943), seemed to operationalized the sincerity standard when it defined a religious belief as one “finding expression in a conscience which categorically requires the believer to disregard elementary self-interest and to accept martyrdom in preference to transgressing its tenets.”

When the U.S. Supreme Court tried its hand to construe “religion” in this same statutory context in U.S. v. Seeger, 380 U.S. 163 (1965), it reiterated the holding of Ballard and held that “the test of belief ‘in a relation to a Supreme Being is whether a given belief that is sincere and meaningful occupies a place in the life of its possessor parallel to that filled by the orthodox belief in God of one who clearly qualifies for the exemption.” While stopping short of the “martyrdom” standard of Kauten, the Court cited the Protestant theologian Paul Tillich’s standard of “ultimate concern” as a tool to find a parallel belief-set to more traditional religious systems. Nothing in this approach, however, required the belief system to focus on traditional theistic spiritual entities, leading the Court to eliminate this criterion in Welsh v. U.S., 398 U.S. 333 (1970).

The other body of judicial decisions occurs in the context of unemployment compensation cases and traces a similarly decreasing reliance on organizational affiliation to find protected beliefs so long as the claims are sincere. Highlights include Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana Employment Security Division, 450 U.S. 707 (1981), which held that a person’s protected beliefs were not limited to those shared by the other members of the religious organization. Thomas, a Jehovah’s Witness, had been denied benefits after he refused a work assignment that contributed to weapons manufacturing. The lower court, to characterize his position as a personal philosophy rather than a religious belief and therefore unprotected by the free exercise clause, relied heavily on the fact that other Jehovah’s Witnesses did not object to this work and that Thomas admitted to be struggling over his beliefs. The U.S. Supreme Court rejected the relevance of those facts in terms reminiscent of Ballard:

the guarantee of free exercise is not limited to beliefs which are shared by all of the members of a religious sect. Particularly in this sensitive area, it is not within the judicial function and judicial competence to inquire whether the petitioner or his fellow worker more correctly perceived the commands of their common faith. Courts are not arbiters of scriptural interpretation.

Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security, 489 U.S. 829 (1989), took this process another step forward. Whereas Thomas had been a member of a recognized church, William Frazee acknowledged membership in no specific denomination. The lower court denied Frazee unemployment benefits after he refused to accept a job that required him to work on Sundays. While acknowledging that his convictions were sincere, the Illinois Appellate Court held that constitutional protections required the tenet to be associated with an “established religious sect” rather than a personal commitment. The U.S. Supreme Court disagreed, ruling that any such requirement violated the free exercise clause. Frazee and Thomas (as well as Seeger and Welsh) seemed to firmly establish the principle that sincere belief alone could trigger constitutional analysis rather than organizational membership or any specific constellation of beliefs, including Christian-like theisms.

Fallout from Ballard

After the dust settled, protected religion had seemingly come to refer to beliefs in which one sincerely believed, with the test of that sincerity being whether the belief occupied a place within the party’s interior life analogous to that held by unquestionably protected beliefs (that is, Christianity). The specific content of the beliefs, and their presumed truth or falsity, and whether they were shared by others, were not to be part of the inquiry. Under this standard, “religion” had moved from a mere synonym for Christianity to a concept of considerable, even infinite, breadth. Concern over precisely this condition had ironically motivated the Reynolds Court to articulate the original belief/action dichotomy that had initiated this line of reasoning that brought about the feared result.

Although the sincerity standard may be satisfactory when using religion as a shield, it creates problems when wielding it as a sword. In other words, this test to find a religious safe harbor works better when hoping to stop the state from requiring the citizen to act against his or her religious beliefs than it does when the party wishes to do something that the government forbids but that is mandated by a sincerely held religious belief. Public order can better tolerate a broad extension of religion in the former context than the latter. This division, rather than a coarse belief/action distinction, may be the better line to draw.

The Supreme Court, however, perhaps despairing that the confusion could ever be satisfactorily resolved, essentially washed its hands of the matter in Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (II), 494 U.S. 872 (1990). In Smith, Justice Scalia drastically curtailed the scope of the free exercise clause by writing that, unless the religious practice had been explicitly targeted by the governmental action, Free Exercise claims would in the future only be successful if coupled with other constitutional provisions (his “hybrid rights cases”). That rule would most likely have required different outcomes in both the conscientious objector and unemployment compensation cases. Legislatures rather than courts, Scalia argued, would be a better venue for the protection of minority religious beliefs, however sincerely they may be held.

JAMES M. DONOVAN

References and Further Reading

- Donovan, James M., God Is as God Does: Law, Anthropology, and the Definition of “Religion,” Seton Hall Constitutional Law Journal 6 (1995): 23–99.
- Long, Carolyn N. Religious Freedom and Indian Rights. Lawrence: University Press of Kansas, 2000.
- Zock, Hetty. A Psychology of Ultimate Concern. Amsterdam: Rodopi, 1990.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Davis v. Beason*, 133 U.S. 333 (1880)
- Employment Div., Dept. of Human Resources of Oregon v. Smith (II)*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Frazee v. Illinois Dept. of Employment Security*, 489 U.S. 829 (1989)
- The Late Corporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints v. U.S.*, 136 U.S. 1 (1890)
- Reynolds v. U.S.*, 98 U.S. 145 (1878)
- Thomas v. Review Board of Indiana Employment Security Division*, 450 U.S. 707 (1981)
- U.S. v. Ballard*, 322 U.S. 78 (1944)
- U.S. v. Kauten*, 133 F.2d 703 (2d Cir. 1943)
- U.S. v. Seeger*, 380 U.S. 163 (1965)
- Welsh v. U.S.*, 398 U.S. 333 (1970)

See also Conscientious Objection, The Free Exercise Clause; Defining Religion; Free Exercise Clause: History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause Doctrine: Supreme Court Jurisprudence

SINGER v. UNITED STATES, 380 U.S. 24 (1965)

A federal criminal defendant sought to waive a jury trial and be tried before the judge alone. The applicable rule of procedure permitted a waiver only with the approval of the trial court and consent of the prosecutor. Although the trial court was willing to approve the waiver, the prosecutor refused to consent, and the defendant was tried and convicted by a jury.

In Singer v. United States, the U.S. Supreme Court held that although the Constitution grants criminal defendants the right to a jury trial, it neither confers nor recognizes a right of defendants to have their cases decided by a judge alone. It acknowledged that the Constitution does not prohibit defendants from waiving their jury trial right, but noted that “[t]he ability to waive a constitutional right does not ordinarily carry with it the right to insist upon the opposite of that right.” It then upheld the applicable procedural rule, finding no constitutional impediment to conditioning a waiver of the jury trial right on the consent of the prosecutor and the trial judge, because “if either refuses to consent, the result is simply that the defendant is subject to an impartial trial by jury—the very thing that the Constitution guarantees him.” The Court cautioned, however, that cases may exist in which a defendant’s reasons for wanting to be tried before a judge alone are so compelling that the prosecutor’s insistence on a jury trial would result in the denial to the defendant of an impartial trial.

DAVID S. RUDSTEIN

References and Further Reading

- LaFave, Wayne R., Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul: Thompson-West, 2004, pp. 1041–1043, 1141.
- Note, Singer v. United States, Northwestern University Law Review 60 (1965): 5:722–730.
- Rudstein, David S., C. Peter Erlinder, and David C. Thomas. Criminal Constitutional Law. Newark and San Francisco: LexisNexis-Matthew Bender, 1990, 2004, pp. 14–35 to 14–37.

See also Jury Trial; Jury Trial Right

SKINNER v. OKLAHOMA, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)

In Skinner v. Oklahoma, the Supreme Court considered the constitutionality of a state statute that provided for sterilization of “habitual criminals.” The statute defined a habitual criminal as any person who has been convicted two or more times of felonies of “moral turpitude” either in Oklahoma or any other state. The statute was enacted on the assumption that criminal traits are inheritable.

The State of Oklahoma found that petitioner had been convicted of felonies of moral turpitude: stealing chickens in 1926, robbery with a firearm in 1929 and again in 1945. Because the jury's only decision was whether petitioner could be sterilized without injury to his general health, it found that Skinner was subject to sterilization.

Petitioner challenged the constitutionality of the statute under the Fourteenth Amendment. Among the grounds argued was that the state could not exercise its police power in this way because of the dearth of scientific evidence on the inheritability of criminal traits. Petitioner argued also that his due process rights were violated when he was not given an opportunity to be heard on the issue of whether he is the potential parent of socially undesirable offspring. Finally, Skinner argued that sterilization was cruel and unusual punishment.

The Supreme Court, however, declined to address any of the above-mentioned claims, unanimously holding that the Oklahoma statute "fail[ed] to meet the requirements of the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment" (316 U.S. at 538). In discussing the inequalities of the statute, the Court provided one noteworthy example. Larceny was a felony of moral turpitude, and thus a person found guilty of larceny three times could be sterilized. Embezzlement was not a crime of moral turpitude, regardless of the amount taken, and therefore, despite the intrinsic similarity of the two crimes, they are subject to vastly different punishments.

Although recognizing that the states may exercise police powers in a somewhat asymmetrical way, when fundamental rights are the issue, the Court must evaluate the law using strict scrutiny. Thus, although invalidating the statute on equal protection grounds, the Court recognized a fundamental right to procreate, suggesting a substantive due process underpinning to the case. "We are dealing here with legislation which involves one of the basic civil rights of man. Marriage and procreation are fundamental to the very existence and survival of the race" (316 U.S. at 541).

Skinner would almost certainly be decided solely on substantive due process grounds today. Indeed, Skinner's significance rests on its recognition of a fundamental right to marry and procreate and that any infringement of these basic liberties must be subject to strict scrutiny. In so doing, the Supreme Court foreshadowed the importance of procreation and marriage as subjects of liberty protection; for example, Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965) (statute forbidding use of contraceptives violates marital zone of privacy); Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978) (invalidating a statute, which required court approval to marry for noncustodial parents with child support obligations).

EMILY R. FROMSON

Cases and Statutes Cited

Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Skinner v. Oklahoma, 316 U.S. 535 (1942)
Zablocki v. Redhail, 434 U.S. 374 (1978)

SKINNER v. RAILWAY LABOR EXECUTIVES' ASSOCIATION, 489 U.S. 602 (1989)

Drug testing has become a regular feature of American employment, especially in government jobs. Since the mid-1980s, both federal and state agencies and numerous regulated industries have implemented testing programs for their employees. Although advocates suggest that drug testing increases job safety, cuts costs, and helps fight the "war on drugs," opponents argue that such programs amount to "chemical McCarthyism" and an invasion of personal privacy. In Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives' Association, the Supreme Court held that a drug-testing scheme for railroad employees did not violate the Fourth Amendment's search and seizure protections.

The issue in Skinner concerned federal regulations promulgated in response to a history of alcohol and drug abuse by railroad employees, resulting in fatal and costly train accidents. Pursuant to these regulations, employees involved in certain accidents were required to undergo blood and urine tests after the event. Testing could also occur when an employee violated particular rules or when a supervisor had reasonable suspicion that the employee was under the influence of drugs or alcohol. Positive results or an employee's refusal to undergo testing could be used in disciplinary proceedings and might result in job-related punishment. Various labor organizations brought suit to enjoin the enforcement of the drug testing regulations.

The Court recognized that the collection of samples (for example, monitoring the act of urination) intruded on personal privacy whereas the chemical analysis of such samples constituted a search by revealing intimate information. The Fourth Amendment does not ban all searches, however, but only unreasonable ones based on a balancing of government prerogatives and individual privacy interests. In particular, the Court cited approvingly its evolving "special needs" doctrine that permitted searches in the absence of warrants and probable cause when "special needs, beyond the normal need for law enforcement," make these requirements "impracticable."

According to the Court, the government had a compelling interest in the drug-testing program, given that a misstep by an intoxicated worker could cause extensive damage and fatalities without an opportunity for a supervisor to intervene. And although an individual's privacy interests were not trivial, they were diminished by the nonintrusive nature of the testing procedures and the high degree of regulation in the railroad industry. In these circumstances, requiring a warrant would impede the timely analysis of samples and might be beyond the grasp of railroad supervisors. Likewise, obtaining individualized suspicion would be difficult if not impossible in the chaotic aftermath of a train accident. The Court also suggested that the testing regime served a complementary purpose, deterring drug use among employees in the first place.

Since Skinner and its companion case, National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, the Court has considered four other regimes, upholding student drug testing in the Acton and Earls decisions and invalidating testing programs for political candidates in Chandler v. Miller and for pregnant mothers in Ferguson v. City of Charleston. The end result has been a crazy quilt of jurisprudence and a great deal of confusion in the lower courts.

ERIK LUNA

References and Further Reading

- Coombs, Robert H., and Louis Jolyon West. Drugs Testing: Issues and Options. New York: Oxford University Press, 1991.
- Gilliom, John. Surveillance, Privacy, and the Law: Employee Drug Testing and the Politics of Social Control. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1994.
- Normand, Jacques, Richard O. Lempert, and Charles P. O'Brien. Under the Influence: Drugs and the American Workforce. Washington, D.C.: National Academy Press, 1993.
- Schulhofer, Stephen J., On the Fourth Amendment Rights of the Law-Abiding Public, Supreme Court Review (1989): 87–163.
- Symposium: Drug Testing in the Workplace*, William & Mary Law Review 33 (1991): 1–252.
- Tunnell, Kenneth D. Pissing on Demand: Workplace Drug Testing and the Rise of the Detox Industry. New York: New York University Press, 2004.
- Welfing, John B., Employer Drug Testing: Disparate Judicial and Legislative Responses, Albany Law Review 63 (2000): 799–832.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Board of Education v. Earls*, 536 U.S. 822 (2002)
- Chandler v. Miller*, 520 U.S. 305 (1997)
- Ferguson v. City of Charleston*, 532 U.S. 67 (2001)

National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989)

Vernonia School District 47J v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995)

See also Administrative Searches and Seizures; Board of Education v. Earls, 536 U.S. 822 (2002); Chandler v. Miller, 520 U.S. 305 (1997); Drug Testing; National Treasury Employee Union v. Von Raab, 489 U.S. 656 (1989); Search (General Definition); Vernonia School District v. Acton, 515 U.S. 646 (1995); War on Drugs; Warrant Clause (IV); Warrantless Searches

SLAPP SUITS (STRATEGIC LAWSUITS AGAINST PUBLIC PARTICIPATION)

"SLAPP" is an acronym for "strategic lawsuit against public participation," a term coined by Professors George W. Pring and Penelope Canan to describe the growing phenomenon of filing lawsuits to discourage opponents from exercising their free speech and other civil rights. Plaintiffs in SLAPP actions sue in a variety of contexts, defamation, copyright, zoning applications, and land use variance requests. SLAPP suits arise frequently in the environmental arena, in response to opposition against hazardous waste disposal facilities, the loss of natural environmental features, and developments that raise concerns for nearby residents. The concept of SLAPP is ironic in that the party who files the suit seeks to use the law to chill the civil rights of others. In the typical SLAPP suit, an economically dominant party (the SLAPper) files suit against an economic underdog (the SLAP-pee) who has petitioned the government in opposition to the SLAPper's project. The SLAPper has little concern about the ultimate outcome of the action. His purpose is to convince the SLAPpee that opposition is futile and personally disastrous. The First Amendment provides protection against SLAPP suits. A party seeking a dismissal of a suit on the basis that it is a SLAPP typically must establish that plaintiff sued him because he petitioned or planned to petition the government. The SLAPP retaliates against or creates disincentives against petitioning activity by the defendant protected by the First Amendment—read broadly to include protection for citizens expressing views to agencies, legislatures, and courts. For example, Sierra Club v. Butz, 349 F. Supp. 934 (N.D. Cal. 1972), rejected a company's counterclaim for interference with an advantageous relationship. In its dismissal, the federal court held that the plaintiff's actions that the defendant claimed interfered with his business relationship constituted a petition to the government. The case thus recognized a common law foundation for the judicial right to dismiss SLAPP suits.

Some states condemn SLAPP suits by statute. At least twenty states, including California, Massachusetts, and New York, have passed anti-SLAPP legislation, establishing sanctions against parties who bring a cause of action for the purpose of squelching the rights of the parties sued. States with anti-SLAPP laws reject SLAPP suits on the basis that such suits intimidate or discourage speech about matters of public interest. The California statute is a good example of legislative protection. It protects acts “in furtherance of the exercise of the constitutional right of petition or the constitutional right of free speech . . . in connection with a public issue or an issue of public interest.” State anti-SLAPP statutes authorize courts to dismiss civil claims that infringe on the defendant’s constitutional right of petition. Because everyone has a right to petition by lawsuit (including those accused of SLAPPs), courts navigate difficult factual questions in evaluating dismissal claims on the basis that the suit violates the anti-SLAPP statute. The courts must protect citizens from meritless lawsuits while protecting the right to bring a suit for judicial resolution. Some anti-SLAPP statutes, such as that of New York, also expressly authorize costs and attorney’s fees when the suit lacks a substantial basis. New York Civil Rights Law § 70a (Consol. 2005) also allows compensatory and even punitive damages to the SLAPpee in specified circumstances. The anti-SLAPP provisions facilitate dismissal of retaliatory lawsuits by reducing the burden of proof for dismissal for malicious prosecution or abuse of process. In Kashian v. Harriman, 98 Cal. App.4th 892, 120 Cal. Rptr.2d 576 (2002), a California court invoked the state’s anti-SLAPP statute in dismissing a claim by a hospital developer against a lawyer who represented an advocacy organization opposing the developer’s plan.

In addition to statutory penalties, the lawyer who brings a SLAPP suit lacking a basis in fact may receive sanctions under Rule 11 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure and the Rules of Professional Conduct in some jurisdictions. The American Bar Association Model Rule of Professional Conduct 3.1, “Meritorious Claims and Contentions,” states: “A lawyer shall not bring or defend a proceeding, or assert or controvert an issue therein, unless there is a basis for doing so that is not frivolous, which includes a good faith argument for an extension, modification or reversal of existing law.” Comment 1 to Model Rule 3.1 summarizes the sense of the rule: “The advocate has a duty to use legal procedure for the fullest benefit of the client’s cause, but also a duty not to abuse legal procedure.”

IRMA S. RUSSELL

References and Further Reading

- Jackson, Mark, The Corporate Defamation Plaintiff in the Era of SLAPPs: Revisiting New York Times v. Sullivan, William & Mary Bill of Rights Journal 491 (2001): 9.
- Kuehn, Robert R., Shooting the Messenger: The Ethics of Attacks on Environmental Representation, Harvard Environmental Law Review 417 (2002): 26.
- McBrayer, Lauren, The Direct TV Cases: Applying Anti-SLAPP Laws to Copyright Protection Cease-and-Desist Letters, Berkley Technology Law Journal 603 (2005): 20.
- McBride, Edward W. Jr., The Empire State SLAPPs Back: New York’s Legislative Response to SLAPP Suits, Vermont Law Review 925 (1990): 17.
- Pring, George W., SLAPPs: Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation, Pace Environmental Law Review 3, 6–8 (1990): 7.
- Pring, George W., and Penelope Canan, Strategic Lawsuits Against Public Participation (“SLAPP”): An Introduction for Bench, Bar and Bystanders, Bridgeport Law Review 937 (1993): 12.
- Tobias, Carl, Environmental Litigation and Rule 11, William & Mary Law Review 429 (1992): 33.
- Wilson, Paul D., Of Sexy Phone Calls and Well-Aimed Golf Balls: Anti-SLAPP Statutes in Recent Land-Use Damages Litigation, Urban Lawyer 375 (2004): 36.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Kashian v. Harriman*, 98 Cal. App.4th 892, 120 Cal. Rptr.2d 576 (2002)
- Kobrin v. Gastfrind*, 821 N.E. 2d 60, 63 (Mass. 2005)
- Margolis v. Gosselin*, 5 Mass. L. Rptr. 283 (May 22, 1996)
- Novak v. Dept. of Env’tl. Prot.*, 6 Mass. L. Rptr. 273 (Feb. 24, 1997)
- Protect Our Mountain Environment, Inc. v. District Court in and for Jefferson County*, 677 P. 2d 1361 (Colo. 1984)
- Sierra v. Butz*, 349 F. Supp. 934 (N.D. Cal. 1972)
- Webb v. Fury*, 282 S.E. 2d 28 (1981)
- Westfield Partners, Ltd. v. Hogan*, 740 F. Supp. 523 (N.D. Ill. 1990)
- American Bar Association Model Rules of Professional Conduct 3.1 (2003)
- California Civil Procedure Code § 425.16 (Deering 2005)
- Federal Rule of Civil Procedure 11
- Massachusetts General Laws ch. 231, § 59H (2005)
- New York Civil Rights Law § 70a (Consol. 2005)

SLAUGHTERHOUSE CASES, 83 U.S. (16 WALL.) 36 (1873)

The Crescent City Live-Stock Landing and Slaughterhouse Company was created by the Louisiana legislature in 1869 and granted a state-enforced monopoly over the landing and slaughtering of livestock within an 1,100 square mile district surrounding New Orleans. The law, entitled “An Act to Protect the Health of the City of New Orleans, to Locate the Stocklandings and Slaughterhouses, and to Incorporate the ‘Crescent City Company’” provided the company with the exclusive privilege of conducting livestock landing and slaughtering and required all other slaughterhouses within the district to close. The Act also obligated the company to permit all butchers to use its facilities at statutorily defined fees.

The enactment was challenged in nearly 300 lawsuits, filed primarily by competing butchers who alleged, among other claims, that the monopoly deprived them of the right to engage in their chosen profession. Appeals from the Louisiana Supreme Court were ultimately resolved against the butchers by the five-to-four Slaughterhouse Cases decision, which provided the U.S. Supreme Court the first opportunity to adjudicate the recently ratified Fourteenth Amendment. The decision remains the most significant authority on the privileges or immunities clause.

Justice Samuel Miller wrote for the majority, announcing that the enactment was within the police powers of the state and did not violate the Thirteenth Amendment, or the due process, or equal protection clauses of the Fourteenth Amendment. Relying on a long history of English and American precedent, the holding of the case was limited to the conclusion that Louisiana was within settled notions of the police power to grant a monopoly in what was deemed a noxious trade.

The bulk of Miller's analysis turned, however, on the privileges or immunities clause. Although not part of the actual holding of the case, that element of the opinion is the most important because of its subsequent influence. Beginning with a brief discussion of the Civil War, the analysis proceeded from the premise that the Reconstruction Amendments were ratified primarily as a means of establishing and securing the liberty of former slaves. But for the war, the majority posited, none of the amendments would have been suggested and, therefore, the amendments could not reasonably be understood to encompass the wide range of liberties claimed by the butchers on behalf of all citizens. On this foundation, Miller reasoned, only a narrow construction of the Fourteenth Amendment was proper.

The Fourteenth Amendment establishes every person as a citizen of the nation: "All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside." Miller found in this sentence a distinction between national and state citizenship, each consisting of a unique set of individual rights. State citizenship, held the majority, included virtually all civil rights, whereas federal citizenship included only those rights that arise as a result of the federal government, its laws, or the national character of federal citizenship.

The text of the privileges or immunities clause prohibits states from abridging the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States, leading the majority to conclude that the clause was intended to protect only those rights incident to federal citizenship. Were it otherwise, Miller reasoned, the phrase "citizen of the state" would not have been left out of the clause "when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to 'citizens of the United States' in the very sentence which precedes it."

The right to travel to the seat of government, to access ports and courthouses, and the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus were among a short list of examples used to illustrate the unique rights of federal citizenship. The right to engage in a profession of one's choosing, although acknowledged as a genuine privilege, was deemed to be of state origin and not within the ambit of the Fourteenth Amendment. To hold otherwise, Miller stated, would be to remove the protection of nearly all civil rights from the power of the states and place it in the federal government, which he denied could have been the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment. Rhetorically, the majority asked "where is it declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?"

Three separate dissents were filed by Justices Swayne, Bradley, and Field. Justice Field's dissent answered the majority directly, arguing that the purpose of the Fourteenth Amendment was broader than securing emancipation for the slaves. The ratification of the Amendment was intended to alter the hierarchy of state and federal citizenship, placing the vast sweep of civil rights, possessed by all men and not merely former slaves, under the protection of the federal government. Any other interpretation of the privileges or immunities clause, Field insisted, would reduce it to a "vain and idle enactment."

Academic commentary on the Slaughterhouse Cases has been predominantly critical of the majority opinion, more often siding with the dissenters understanding of the Fourteenth Amendment. The consensus view is that Justice Miller's reading of the privileges or immunities clause accorded it an improperly narrow construction. The judicial consequence of the Slaughterhouse Cases, however, is clear: the Privileges or Immunities clause has been nearly ignored and only recently resuscitated after 125 years by a majority of the Supreme Court in Saenz v. Roe. As a result, the Slaughterhouse Cases foreclosed any significant role for the privileges or immunities clause in the development of civil rights during the nineteenth and twentieth centuries.

LAWRENCE G. SALZMAN

References and Further Reading

- Aynes, Richard L., Constricting the Law of Freedom: Justice Miller, the Fourteenth Amendment, and the Slaughter-House Cases, Chicago-Kent Law Review 80 (1995): 627–688.
- Curtis, Michael K., Resurrecting the Privileges or Immunities Clause and Revising the Slaughter-House Cases without Exhuming Lochner: Individual Rights and the Fourteenth Amendment, Boston College Law Review 38 (1996): 1–106.
- Labbe, Ronald M., and Jonathan Lurie. The Slaughterhouse Cases: Regulation, Reconstruction, and the Fourteenth Amendment. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas, 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)

See also Fourteenth Amendment; Police Power of the State; Privileges and Immunities (XIV); Saenz v. Roe, 526 U.S. 489 (1999)

SLAVERY

Slavery was clearly the most obvious violation of civil liberties in American history. The system denied slaves all civil liberties. With the exception of the right not to be murdered or mutilated (by 1830 both were crimes under the laws of the southern states), slaves had no legal rights. They could not sue or be sued, they could not testify in court against a white or in many places even against a free black. They could own nothing and were instead the subject of ownership. They were property and could be bought and sold, or given away. They could not legally marry and had no control over their children or their family's destiny. Spouses could be separated by sale or removal, and the children of slaves could also be sold away from parents from their children. Some states prohibited separating very young children from their mothers by public sale, but mothers could be sold without their children, and masters often separated toddlers from their parents. Slaves developed their own religious traditions, but masters and state governments suppressed slave religious expression whenever they thought it was necessary or useful to do so. Similarly, masters imposed religion on their slaves, often as a device to control them. Slaves had no free speech rights, and in most southern states it was illegal to teach them to read. Far from having a right of assembly, southern laws prohibited gatherings of slaves or free blacks; and in some states even services in all-black churches had to be observed by a white. Slaves in the end were denied their liberty without due process of law. This was even true in jurisdictions that were entirely under the control of Congress, such as Washington, D.C., and various federal territories. Although the Bill of Rights presumably prohibited Congress from passing any law to deprive anyone of his or her liberty without due process of law, this provision of the Constitution simply did not apply to slaves.

Although legally considered property, slaves were treated as persons when charged with crimes. Ironically, when charged with a crime slaves were often given trials that were reasonably fair, with some due process protections. Southern courts sometimes overturned the convictions of slaves on the basis of coerced confessions or the lack of effective counsel. These rules may have had the effect of giving some slave defendants due process, but the main purposes of such rules were to protect the integrity of the court system itself, preserve white supremacy, and prevent the needless destruction of the valuable property interest that masters had in their slaves. Slaves had to have lawyers defend them, for example, because otherwise the trial would have been offensive to the notions of how courts should operate, or worse yet, slaves would have had to act as their own attorneys, which would have undermined notions of race and status in the slave south.

Slaves had no expectation that their bodies would be free from physical punishment. Masters were free to whip and beat slaves as they wished, to incarcerate them and chain them up or tie them down. Violence was inherent in the system of slavery. A few masters were punished for murdering their slaves. John Hoover was executed in North Carolina after the state supreme court upheld his conviction for murdering a slave by torturing her, forcing her to work virtually naked outdoors in the winter, and savagely beating her. But Hoover's murder conviction and execution was highly unusual. Most slaves suffered punishments that did not kill them, and they could expect no intervention from the legal system. As Chief Justice Ruffin of North Carolina noted in State v. Mann (1829),

The end [of slavery] is the profit of the master, his security and the public safety; the subject, one doomed in his own person, and his posterity, to live without knowledge, and without the capacity to make anything his own, and to toil that another may reap the fruits. What moral considerations shall be addressed to such a being, to convince him what, it is impossible but that the most stupid must feel and know can never be true—that he is thus to labour upon a principle of natural duty, or for the sake of his own personal happiness, such services can only be expected from one who has no will of his own; who surrenders his will in implicit obedience to that of another. Such obedience is the consequence only of uncontrolled authority over the body. There is nothing else which can operate to produce the effect. The power of the master must be absolute, to render the submission of the slave perfect. I most freely confess my sense of the harshness of this proposition, I feel it as deeply as any man can. And as a principle of moral right, every person in his retirement must repudiate it. But in the actual condition of things, it must be so. There is no remedy. This discipline belongs to the state of slavery. They cannot be disunited, without abrogating at once the rights of the master, and absolving the slave from his subjection. It constitutes the curse of slavery to both the bond and free portions of our population. But it is inherent in the relation of master and slave.

More succinctly, Chief Justice Roger B. Taney of the U.S. Supreme Court declared in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857), under the U.S. Constitution blacks were “a subordinate and inferior class of beings, who had been subjugated by the dominant race, and, whether emancipated or not, yet remained subject to their authority, and had no rights or privileges but such as those who held the power and the Government might choose to grant them.” Thus, it was permissible to treat them as slaves, with no rights at all.

Thus, slavery fits into the history of civil liberties as the most egregious example of the denial of such liberties in our national history. The fact that slavery existed, and was protected by the U.S. Constitution, illustrates the way in which civil liberties were limited and constricted at the nation’s founding.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Finkelman, Paul. Slavery and the Founders: Race and Liberty in the Age of Jefferson. 2nd ed. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, 2001.
- Morris, Thomas D. Southern Slavery and the Law, 1619–1860. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1996.
- Tushnet, Mark. Slave Law in the American South: State v. Mann in History and Literature. Lawrence, KS: University of Kansas Press, 2003.

SLAVERY AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

Slavery clearly violated the civil liberties of those held in bondage. (See the entry on “Slavery” in this volume.) It also had a profound impact on the civil liberties of free blacks and whites. Indeed, much of the development of civil liberties in the period before the Civil War can be attributed to slavery.

Slavery affected the understanding of due process in criminal and civil cases; the meaning of freedom of speech, press, and assembly; and the application of the Bill of Rights to the federal territories. It also led, in Dred Scott v. Sandford (1857), to the first articulation of substantive due process by the Supreme Court and one of the Court’s first rulings on the meaning of the “takings clause” of the Fifth Amendment.

The fugitive slave clause of Article IV, Sec. 2 of the Constitution, allowed masters to recover runaway slaves found in other states and prohibited those states from emancipating any slaves who escaped into their jurisdiction. This clause set the stage for various conflicts between the free states and the slave states and also between the free states and the federal government. In 1793, Congress passed a law to enforce this clause. The 1793 law did not require a jury trial or any normal due process procedures for the return of fugitive slaves. Fearful that free blacks might be falsely claimed as fugitives and taken South, in the 1820s and 1830s most of the northern states passed “personal liberty laws” that gave alleged fugitive slaves more due process rights. Through these laws the free states attempted to give free blacks, and fugitive slaves, access to jury trials, the writ of habeas corpus, and other due process protections. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842), the U.S. Supreme Court struck down all these laws, arguing that the states could not pass any legislation that would supplement the federal law or interfere with its enforcement. In 1850, Congress passed a new law, which specifically prohibited jury trials or the use of the writ of habeas corpus to interfere in the rendition of fugitive slaves. The alleged slave was allowed to have an attorney, but only if he could afford one or one stepped forward to offer his services. The law did not require the court to appoint counsel, and no judges or federal commissioners hearing cases under the law ever did appoint a lawyer for an alleged fugitive slave. Federal commissioners tried to hold their hearings in secret, early in the morning, and finish them quickly, before anyone could find out that a fugitive slave case was in progress. Although not exactly a secret court, there was no attempt to make a fugitive slave case part of an open court. Furthermore, in what was perhaps the most outrageous denial of fundamental rights, alleged slaves were not allowed to testify on their behalf at the hearing to determine whether they were free or runaway slaves. Equally outrageous, from the perspective of opponents of slavery, was a differential fee schedule in cases involving runaway slaves. If a federal judge or federal commissioner determined the person before him was not a fugitive slave, he would get a five dollar fee. But, if he decided in favor of the person claiming the slave—that is if he decided that the person before him was a fugitive slave—he would get a ten dollar fee. The explanation of this fee schedule made sense—if the judge or commissioner found in favor of the alleged slave, he only had to release him from custody, but if he found in favor of the claimant, he would have to fill out a great deal of paperwork. But however reasonable this was, the law looked like a blatant attempt to bribe judges and commissioners to help southerners catch slaves or enslave free blacks. This went against the very nature of liberty, as set out in Section 40 of Magna Carta, "To no one will we sell, to no one will we refuse or delay, right or justice." Whites who interfered with the return of fugitive slaves were subject to heavy fines and jail terms. The Supreme Court and the lower federal courts almost always sided with southern masters and against the interests of free blacks, alleged fugitive slaves, or whites who helped them. Both fugitive slave laws and the courts that enforced them trampled on the civil liberties of blacks and often of the liberties of whites who helped them.

Slavery affected free speech in a variety of ways. In the South it led to extraordinary self-censorship. In 1819, for example, a prosecutor in Maryland brought charges against Rev. Jacob Gruber, a Methodist minister, because he gave a sermon that implied that slave holding was sinful and that it was cruel to sell people at auctions like cattle. Rev. Gruber was acquitted, but the very fact that he was prosecuted suggests the precarious nature of civil liberties in the South. In Virginia, a number of ministers and other religiously motivated men would be prosecuted for similar offenses, although few were ultimately convicted. In 1854, Margaret Douglass, a white woman, spent a month in jail in Norfolk for teaching free black children to read the Bible. In 1861, Rabbi David Einhorn fled Baltimore in the middle of the night, threatened by mobs that would no longer tolerate his opposition to slavery. He moved to Philadelphia where he became the chief rabbi at Congregation Keneseth Israel, which was known as the Abolitionist Synagogue.

By the eve of the Civil War it was impossible for whites to debate slavery, because anything that might resemble antislavery literature was banned. Some white northerners were arrested and tried for the mere possession of antislavery literature. In the 1850s, the greatest bestseller of the age, Uncle Tom's Cabin, could be read in the North and Great Britain while translations in German, French, Spanish, and other languages made it available almost everywhere in the world. But, in the slave south the book was banned, and possession of it could lead to arrest or a mob attack. In the late 1850s, a native of North Carolina, Hinton Rowan Helper, published The Impending Crisis of the South: How to Meet It (1857), a detailed discussion of the dangers of slavery to the white, nonslaveholding class. He argued that slavery and the South's dependence on cotton as harmful to the majority of southern whites, who did not in fact own slaves. Helper was forced to leave the state of his birth and soon afterwards his brother left as well. In 1860, the North Carolina Supreme Court upheld the conviction, and one-year jail sentence, of Rev. Daniel Worth, also a native of North Carolina, who had circulated Helper's book. Free speech was simply not available to southern whites if they dared to challenge slavery. The southern states also tried to get the free states to ban antislavery speech. In 1831, Georgia offered a $5,000 reward for the arrest of William Lloyd Garrison, the editor of The Liberator, the nation's most radical antislavery paper. In the mid-1830s, Alabama asked the governor of New York to extradite R. G. Williams, of the American Anti-Slavery Society, for helping to distribute The Emancipator in that state. Because Williams had never actually set foot in Alabama, the governor of New York refused to arrest him and send him to Alabama for trial. The First Amendment did not apply to the states at this time, so there was no issue of censorship that could have been taken to the federal courts. However, most state constitutions protected basic rights of freedom of expression. In the South, however, these rights simply did not exist for people wishing to debate slavery. In Charleston, South Carolina, mobs attacked the U.S. post office, indiscriminately burning bags of mail from the North, because members of these mobs feared that the mail contained antislavery literature. Postmaster General Amos Kendall refused to condone attacks on the mail and declared that abolitionist propaganda was not technically illegal, but he also declared that any local postmaster who refused to deliver abolitionist mail would be "justified" in doing so and would not be sanctioned. In Charleston and elsewhere, local postmasters in fact refused to deliver mail from the North without inspecting or allowing locally appointed vigilance committees to do so. This kind of censorship went to the heart of civil liberties, by prohibiting the circulation of literature that challenged social institutions. The South's growing police-state mentality also affected the North. In New York, the local postmaster refused to allow antislavery material to be sent South, even though this violated the postal laws. Postmaster General Kendall saw no reason to reverse this policy. In 1850, Arkansas made it a crime to "maintain that owners have not the right of property in their slaves," and in 1859, a South Carolina law provided a one-year jail term for merely receiving antislavery material in the mail. The self-censorship of the South also affected southern universities. Lieber was effectively forced out of the University of South Carolina because he was not sufficiently proslavery, although at no time did he openly challenge the central institution of his adopted state.

In 1856, the president of the University of North Carolina proudly noted that in the previous two decades no students had ever debated the issue of slavery. In 1860, Rev. John G. Fee, the founder of Berea College, fled Kentucky because his opposition to slavery made it unsafe for him to live there. That same year the Rev. Leonidas Polk established the University of the South, in Sewanee, Tennessee, as a place where higher education would teach the value of slavery.

The First Amendment and the rest of the Bill of Rights did apply to the District of Columbia, but here too slavery trumped civil liberties. In 1836, authorities in Washington, D.C., prosecuted Dr. Rueben Crandall, a Quaker from Connecticut, because he was found to possess some antislavery pamphlets. The prosecutor who brought this case was Francis Scott Key, who was the author of the Star Spangled Banner, which later became the national anthem. Key lost the case because he could not actually prove that Dr. Crandall had circulated these pamphlets and claimed they were packed into his luggage without his knowledge. By the 1840s, abolitionists had established their right of freedom of the press in the nation's capital, where a leading antislavery paper, The National Era, was published. In 1851–1852, this paper published Harriet Beecher Stowe's great antislavery novel, Uncle Tom's Cabin, in serial installments.

The First Amendment also suffered in Congress because of slavery. That Amendment protects the right to "petition the Government for a redress of grievances." However, in the 1790s, southern Congressmen successfully prevented the reception of petitions from free blacks. In the 1830s, abolitionists began to send hundreds of petitions to Congress asking the national legislature to pass various laws to restrict slavery. The House of Representatives instead adopted a "gag rule," which prevented these petitions from even being read on the floor of Congress. Congressman John Quincy Adams, who had been elected to the House of Representatives after serving as president, considered the gag rule to be an unconstitutional denial of the right to petition. For nearly a decade, from 1836 until 1844, Adams and a handful of antislavery Congressmen fought the gag rule. Finally in 1844, northern Democrats, who had previously supported the southern wing of their party on this issue, joined northern Whigs to repeal the gag. The debate over the gag rule helped create a climate of civil liberties in the North, as people in that region came to see slavery as a threat to the liberty of free whites, as well as blacks.

Slavery also threatened freedom of expression in the North. In the 1830s, mobs attacked abolitionists throughout the North when they spoke out against slavery. These mobs were often motivated by racist hatred of blacks, but members of the mobs also feared that antislavery would lead to instability. Northern conservatives understood that verbal and literary assaults on slavery would undermine national harmony and the Union. In Philadelphia a mob burned a building used by the antislavery movement for meetings. In Boston, a mob placed a noose around the neck of the abolitionist editor, William Lloyd Garrison, threatening to hang him. Abolitionist speakers, like Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Frederick Douglass, were often assaulted in the late 1830s and early 1840s when they tried to give speeches attacking slavery. Mobs in Cincinnati destroyed the printing press of the Philanthropist in 1836, but the two editors, James G. Birney and Gamaliel Bailey, escaped without serious injury.

In Alton, Illinois, Elijah P. Lovejoy was not so fortunate. Lovejoy was the editor of the St. Louis Observer, a religious paper. In 1836, Lovejoy condemned the lynching of a free black man in St. Louis and attacked a local judge for his failure to vigorously pursue the leaders of the lynch mob. This sort of freedom of expression was not acceptable in the slaveholding city, and a mob attacked his press. Up to this time Lovejoy had not taken a stand on slavery, and even in this incident, he condemned lynching, not slaveholding. But whites in St. Louis saw little distinction between Lovejoy and an abolitionist, and he was forced to leave the city. He moved across the river, to Alton, Illinois, where he planned to publish the Alton Observer. However, even before his printing press was unloaded, a mob, made up mostly of men from St. Louis, attacked the crated press and threw it into the River. Lovejoy ordered a second press and at the same time announced had become an opponent of slavery. A mob destroyed this press as well. When a mob attacked the building where he had his third press, Lovejoy defended his property. While trying to put out a fire on his roof, which had been started by the mob, someone in the mob shot and killed Lovejoy. Lovejoy became the antislavery movement's first martyr. His death underscored the threat to the liberty of whites that came from slavery.

The U.S. Supreme Court heard few cases involving civil liberties or the Bill of Rights before the Civil War. In Prigg v. Pennsylvania (1842), as already noted, the Court held that persons seized as fugitive slaves were not entitled to a trial with traditional due process guarantees. In Jones v. Van Zandt (1847), the Court upheld a civil suit for the value of a slave who was never recovered after Van Zandt, an Ohio farmer, gave the runaway a ride in his wagon. The Court rejected Van Zandt's argument that in Ohio all persons were presumed to be free and thus he could have had no notice that the person he gave a ride to was in fact a runaway slave.

The Court's most important pronouncement on the Bill of Rights and slavery came in Dred Scott v. Sandford. The main issue in Dred Scott was the constitutionality of the ban on slavery in the federal territories west of Missouri. Taney's strongest argument for overturning that ban was his assertion that freeing slaves violated the Fifth Amendment. Taney argued that Congress could not deny people living in the territories their fundamental rights guaranteed in the Bill of Rights. He noted: "For example, no one, we presume, will contend that Congress can make any law in a Territory respecting the establishment of religion, or the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people of the Territory peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for the redress of grievances." Similarly, he asserted that Congress could not "deny to the people . . . the right to trial by jury, nor compel any one to be a witness against himself in a criminal proceeding." He then turned to the Fifth Amendment, noting:

These powers, and others, in relation to rights of person, which it is not necessary here to enumerate, are, in express and positive terms, denied to the General Government; and the rights of private property have been guarded with equal care. Thus the rights of property are united with the rights of person, and placed on the same ground by the fifth amendment to the Constitution, which provides that no person shall be deprived of life, liberty, and property, without due process of law. And an act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself or brought his property into a particular Territory of the United States, and who had committed no offence against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law.

Taney continued to make this point in his opinion, writing: "So, too, it will hardly be contended that Congress could by law quarter a soldier in a house in a Territory without the consent of the owner, in time of peace; nor in time of war, but in a manner prescribed by law. Nor could they by law forfeit the property of a citizen in a Territory who was convicted of treason, for a longer period than the life of the person convicted; nor take private property for public use without just compensation."

Taney also asserted that "the right of property in a slave is distinctly and expressly affirmed in the Constitution." Thus, if slave property were protected by the Constitution—as it surely was—then taking that property without due process or compensation would violate the Fifth Amendment. Thus, Taney noted: "And if the Constitution recognizes the right of property of the master in a slave, and makes no distinction between that description of property and other property owned by a citizen, no tribunal, acting under the authority of the United States, whether it be legislative, executive, or judicial, has a right to draw such a distinction, or deny to it the benefit of the provisions and guarantees which have been provided for the protection of private property against the encroachments of the Government."

This argument was the first time the Supreme Court has ever determined that a law violated the Bill of Rights. Taney was intent on protecting the liberty of the master to continue to own his slave property in any federal territory, arguing that a law that took property away without any judicial hearing or compensation could not be "dignified with the name of due process of law." This was the same analysis that the Supreme Court would use, nearly a century later, to incorporate the Bill of Rights to the states. Members of the new Republican Party reacted to Dred Scott with shock and dismay. Lincoln's vigorous and articulate attack on the opinion helped make him a national figure that led to his nomination for president three years later. After the Civil War, the Republicans wrote and ratified the Fourteenth Amendment, which effectively reversed Dred Scott. Part of that amendment prohibited the states from denying any person "life, liberty, or property without due process of law." The Supreme Court would ultimately use this clause to expand the Bill of Rights—and fundamental civil liberties—to the states. In this way, theories of law that Taney helped create to protect slavery later became the engine for expanding civil liberties throughout the nation.

PAUL FINKELMAN

References and Further Reading

- Curtis, Michael. Free Speech: "The People's Darling Privilege": Struggles for Freedom of Expression in American History. Durham: Duke University Press, 2000.
- Eaton, Clement. The Freedom of Thought Struggle in the Old South. New York: Harper and Row, 1964.
- Finkelman, Paul. Dred Scott v. Sandford: A Brief History with Documents. Boston: Bedford Books, 1995.
- Nye, Russell. Fettered Freedom: Civil Liberties and the Slavery Controversy. East Lansing: Michigan State University Press, 1964.

SMITH ACT

Formally known as the Alien Registration Act of 1940, the Smith Act was a response to the increasing popularity of both the Communist Party and fascist groups during the 1930s. Calls for a federal statute like the Smith Act had been constant since 1935, when the McCormack-Dickstein Committee had investigated both left-wing and right-wing activities. Introduced by Rep. Howard Smith of Virginia, the law's passage in 1940 was aided by the Soviet Union's signing of the Ribbentrop-Molotov pact with Nazi Germany and both countries' invasion of Poland. The Smith Act made it a criminal offense for anyone to advocate the violent overthrow of the government of the United States, to organize any association for that purpose, or to become a member of such an association. The law also provided for the deportation of any alien who was convicted of violating any of its criminal provisions.

The earliest use of the Smith Act against a radical group involved members of the Trotskyite Socialist Workers Party in Minneapolis; the jury acquitted many of the defendants and recommended lenient sentences for those convicted. The Great Sedition Trial, a 1944 Smith Act prosecution of twenty-six American fascists, ended in a mistrial after the judge's death. The better-known prosecutions of national and local leaders of the Communist Party of the United States of America (CPUSA) occurred in four waves. Eleven members of the national leadership were tried in New York in 1949 and 1950. After the Supreme Court upheld their convictions in 1951, the Justice Department indicted sixty-eight second-tier communists. The final two waves of prosecutions occurred in 1954 and 1956, both election years. The Smith Act prosecutions of American communists yielded 140 indictments, ninety-three convictions and ten acquittals. Less than half of those convicted served any jail time; most of the sentences were relatively short.

The Supreme Court decided four major cases involving prosecutions under the Smith Act's criminal provisions. In Dennis v. United States (1951), the Court sustained the convictions of eleven CPUSA leaders under a broad application of the clear and present danger test, finding that the act of organizing the Communist Party was enough to jeopardize national security, even without overt revolutionary acts on the part of the defendants. In the second major case, Yates v. United States (1957), the convictions of several second-string Communist Party leaders were reversed because the Court found the Smith Act prohibited only "advocacy of action," not "advocacy in the realm of ideas," reinterpreting the Smith Act's criminal provisions closer to traditional understandings of conspiracy and solicitation. In Noto v. United States (1961), the Court reversed a conviction under the membership clause because there was insufficient evidence that the Party advocated "present," rather than abstract, revolutionary activity. In Scales v. United States, decided the same day as Noto, the Court upheld the conviction of Scales, the only person convicted under the Smith Act after Yates redefined the law, because of his more concrete advocacy of violent political action, including martial arts demonstrations.

DANIEL LEVIN

References and Further Reading

- Belknap, Michal R. Cold War, Political Justice. Westport, CT: Greenwood, 1977.
 Stone, Geoffrey R. Perilous Times: Free Speech in Wartime from the Sedition Act of 1798 to the War on Terrorism. New York: W.W. Norton, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Alien Registration Act of 1940, 54 Stat. 670 (1940)
Dennis v. United States, 341 U.S. 494 (1951)
Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961)
Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)
Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

SMITH v. CALIFORNIA, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)

Can a local or state government make possession of material, later judicially declared to be obscene, a criminal offense without requiring that scienter be established, indicating that the possessor knew the material to be obscene? Smith, a bookstore proprietor, was convicted of violating a Los Angeles City ordinance for having an obscene book in his inventory. Judicial interpretations of the ordinance made simple possession of obscene books unlawful even if the person possessing them had no knowledge of their contents. The ordinance thus did not include scienter as an element and accordingly imposed "strict" or "absolute" criminal liability. The Supreme Court, reversing the state court, struck down the ordinance. Justice Brennan delivered the lead opinion. Justices Black, Frankfurter, and Douglas wrote separate opinions concurring only with the judgment. Justice Harlan concurred in part and dissented in part.

Brennan points out that states may not create strict criminal liabilities in those instances where the elimination of scienter may restrict freedom of speech or of the press. Such laws, he argues, discourage booksellers from including in their inventories any books they had not inspected personally with the consequence that the public's access to books or other reading matter is restricted. The physical limitations of inspecting every book plus the bookseller's "timidity in the face of his criminal liability" would constrain the public's access to books or other material that “the State could not constitutionally suppress directly.”

As for the argument that the regulation of obscene material would be ineffective if scienter were required, because booksellers would falsely proclaim their ignorance of a book’s obscene qualities, Brennan dismisses it with the observation that “it has been some time now since the law viewed itself as impotent to explore the actual state of a man’s mind.” However, Brennan also denies any need to decide in this case “what sort of mental element is requisite” for constitutionally permissible prosecutions of booksellers who stock obscene books. Then, in a comment that would surface as an issue in later cases, Brennan remarks, “The circumstances may warrant the inference that [the bookseller] was aware of what a book contained, despite his denial.”

In his concurrence, Douglas, citing his dissent in Roth, simply dismisses the notion that obscene material or speech falls outside the protections of the First Amendment. Black’s concerns center on the ease with which state or local governments could add “a few new words” to satisfy the need for scienter to prosecute possession of obscene material. Moreover, he argues, the Court’s invalidation of an obscenity statute logically calls for “some indication” by the Court of what form of scienter would be appropriate rather than passing on the issue. To compound the problem, the Court’s suggestion that “awareness” of the obscene nature of material may satisfy scienter provides no more than an “unguiding, vague standard.”

Frankfurter’s concurrence also focuses on the “uncertainties” of the scope of scienter and the “speculative proof” the Court’s opinion seems to require. In particular, Frankfurter objected to the state courts’ refusal to admit expert testimony, which he emphasizes is essential for establishing “prevailing literary and moral community standards” and the “psychological or physiological consequences of questioned literature.” Harlan’s concurrence reprises his view that state power over obscenity has a wider scope than federal power and that considerations of scienter vary accordingly.

ROY B. FLEMMING

References and Further Reading

- Alexander, Donald. The Politics of Pornography. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1989.
- Hixson, Richard F. Pornography and the Justices: The Supreme Court and the Intractable Obscenity Problem. Carbondale, IL: Southern Illinois University Press, 1996.
- Mackey, Thomas C. Pornography on Trial: A Handbook with Cases, Law, and Documents. Santa Barbara, CA: ABC-CLIO, 2002.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Smith v. California, 361 U.S. 147 (1959)

SMITH v. ORGANIZATION OF FOSTER FAMILIES, 431 U.S. 816 (1977)

Individual foster parents and a foster parent organization challenged the New York statutory procedures for removal of foster children from foster homes. They argued that the New York procedures violated the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. According to the Fourteenth Amendment, “no State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law.” The majority opinion, delivered by Justice Brennan, held the challenged procedures to be constitutional. Despite the ultimate decision, the case has become more powerful because of the language used by the Court.

Before the Court’s legal analysis, it launched a strong, multiparagraphed disparagement of the foster care system in New York in the 1970s. Relying on empirical studies that demonstrated racial and socioeconomic bias of the foster care system, the Court criticized the seeming “limbo” in which foster children were left to wallow. Cognizant of its limited role in bringing about change, it suggested reform through the legislature.

Turning to the analysis under the Fourteenth Amendment, the court set forth a two-part inquiry: first, does a protected “interest” exist; and if so, what process is due. Accordingly, of initial concern was whether or not a foster family had a “liberty interest” in its survival as a family. Ultimately, the foster parents likened the foster family to that of a more traditional biological family. Curiously, the Court avoided this issue and decided the case on narrower grounds (see later). Nevertheless, dicta in the opinion suggested a particular view on the status of nonbiological families: biological relationships are not the exclusive determination of the existence of a family; the importance of familial relationships stem from the emotional attachments that derive from the intimacy of daily association and from the role it plays in promoting a way of life through the instruction of children; a foster family is not mere collection of unrelated individuals. This language seemed to indicate that a non-traditional family could, in fact, have a liberty interest in its own existence. The court was careful, however, and limited its language by suggesting that whatever liberty interest might exist in the foster family as an institution would not trump an interest derived from a blood relationship should such a conflict arise.

Instead of formally holding that a liberty interest actually existed, the Court simply assumed one did and proceeded to the second phase of its due process inquiry. The Court was next left to determine just what sort of process was due to the foster family in this particular context. Before a person is deprived of a protected interest, he or she must be afforded the opportunity for some kind of hearing. Due process is flexible concept, and as such, the hearing granted must be appropriate to the nature of the case. The Court found that the New York procedures, which included written notice, an opportunity to request a hearing, and the right to appeal, were the appropriate amount of “process” to protect the liberty interest (whatever that may be) of the foster parents.

This case has become a valuable one—not so much because of the ultimate decision, but because of the language used by the Court in two different areas: its description of the foster care system in New York; and its discussion of what constituted a “liberty interest” worthy of constitutional protection.

KERRY L. MUEHLENBECK

References and Further Reading

Guggenheim, Martin, Alexandra Dylan Lowe, and Diane Curtis. The Rights of Families: The Authoritative ACLU Guide to the Rights of Family Members Today (American Civil Liberties Union Handbook). Southern Illinois University Press October 1, 1996.

United States Supreme Court—Parental Rights Cases, <http://www.liftingtheveil.org/supreme-court.htm>.

SNAKE-HANDLING SECTS AND RELIGIOUS LIBERTY

Courts have attempted to reconcile religious freedom with public safety in various cases involving Christians who regard the handling of snakes and consumption of poison as signs, confirmation, and celebration of their religious faith. The use of snakes and poisons is part of the rituals of several small American “holiness” sects, located mostly in Appalachia. The first such organization was founded in rural Tennessee in 1909 by a man who died of snakebite in 1955. Members of these sects base their beliefs and practices on Mark 16:17–18, which reads as follows in the King James version of the Bible:

And these signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; and shall Speak with new tongues;

They shall take up serpents; and if they Drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them . . .

The number of persons who handle snakes or drink poison in religious ceremonies was estimated in 1995 at 2500. During the past sixty years, scores of persons are known to have died from the effects of these practices and many others have suffered nonfatal injuries. In response to these hazards, several southern states have enacted criminal statutes to restrict or prohibit such practices. State courts have consistently upheld the constitutionality of these laws on the ground that the government’s compelling interest in protecting the safety and health of its citizens outweighs any burden that the laws impose on the free exercise of religion.

In the most recent case, State ex rel. Swann v. Pack (Tenn. 1975), the Supreme Court of Tennessee unanimously held that a minister and an elder of a snake-handling sect should be enjoined from handling, exhibiting, or displaying poisonous snakes or from consuming poisons, including strychnine. The court held that a lower court erred in confining the scope of the injunction to the display of snakes in a manner that would endanger the life or health of persons who did not consent to exposure to such danger. The court declared that “the state has a right to protect a person from himself and to demand that he protect his own life.” Although the court emphasized that religious freedom requires the government to tolerate “unusual or bizarre religions,” the court explained that no religion “has an unbridled right to pursue any practice of his own choosing. The right to believe is absolute; the right to act is subject to reasonable regulation designed to protect a compelling state interest.” Such regulations may include “outright prohibition, where it involves a clear and present danger to the interests of society.”

The court’s decision in Swann was consistent with an earlier decision of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, Harden v. State (Tenn. 1948). Decisions in other states likewise have upheld prohibitions on snake handling, even when precautions were taken to protect bystanders from snakes. As the Supreme Court of North Carolina explained in State v. Massey (N.C. 1949), “the case comes down to a very simple question: Which is superior, the public safety or the defendants’ religious practices? The authorities are at one in holding that the safety of the public comes first.” The Court of Appeals of Kentucky upheld a prohibition on snake handling in Lawson v. Commonwealth (Ky. 1942), as did the Court of Appeals of Alabama in Hill v. State (Ala.App. 1956).

These decisions seem to be consistent with the federal Religious Freedom Restoration Act and its state counterparts, which require that the government must exempt persons from laws that burden their religious beliefs unless the law is the least restrictive means of promoting a compelling government interest.

In a child custody case, Harris v. Harris (Miss. 1977), the Supreme Court of Mississippi held that a mother who was a member of snake-handling sect had a right to indoctrinate her child in her religious beliefs so long as there was no evidence that she exposed her child to the risk of a snake bite. Members of the mother's congregation kept a snake caged and never handled it during their services. In Kirk v. Commonwealth (Va. 1947), a Virginia court indicated that a minister could be criminally prosecuted for involuntary manslaughter of his wife, who died after suffering a snake bite during a religious service. The court explained that the trial court properly instructed the jury that "while the law cannot interfere with a person's religious belief or opinion, this is no excuse for an illegal act made criminal by the law of the land, even though such act is based on conscientious religious belief."

WILLIAM G. ROSS

References and Further Reading

- Burton, Thomas G. Serpent-Handling Believers. Knoxville: University of Tennessee Press, 1993.
 Kimbrough, David L. Taking Up Serpents: Snake Handlers of Eastern Kentucky. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1993.
 La Barre, Weston. They Shall Take Up Serpents: Psychology of the Southern Snake-Handling Cult. Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1962.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Harden v. State*, 216 S.W.2d 708 (Tenn. 1948)
Harris v. Harris, 343 So.2d 762 (Miss. 1977)
Hill v. State, 88 So.2d 880 (Ala.App. 1956), cert. denied, 88 So.2d 887 (Ala. 1956)
Kirk v. Commonwealth, 44 S.E.2d 409 (Va. 1947)
Lawson v. Commonwealth, 164 S.W.2d 972 (Ky. 1942)
State v. Massey, 51 S.E. 2d 179 (N.C. 1949), appeal dismissed, 336 U.S. 942 (1949), rehearing denied, 336 U.S. 971 (1949)
State ex rel. Swann v. Pack, 527 S.W.2d 99 (Tenn. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 954 (1976)
 42 U.S.C. sec. 2000bb (2002) (Religious Freedom Restoration Act)

See also Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Religious Freedom Restoration Act

SNEPP v. UNITED STATES, 444 U.S. 507 (1980)

Snepp v. United States establishes that the government by prior agreement can require prepublication review to prevent the disclosure of unclassified but confidential information when publication of that information would be detrimental to vital national interests by compromising classified information (including intelligence sources or methods). The case thus stands as one of several narrow exceptions to the general prohibition against prior restraints. It operates essentially as a limited waiver by a former government employee of his First Amendment rights. Moreover, unlike other, nonnational security-related prior restraints, which place the burden on the government to obtain a judicial order enjoining publication, this exception has been interpreted by the lower courts to place the burden on the publisher to obtain a judicial determination that governmental clearance had been improperly withheld. See Snepp v. US, 897 F.2d 138 (4th Cir. 1990).

Frank Snepp, based on his experiences as a clandestine CIA operative in South Vietnam, published Decent Interval, after leaving the CIA but without submitting it to prepublication review. He had, as a condition of his initial employment and in a termination secrecy agreement executed in 1976 before his departure from the CIA, expressly promised not to divulge classified information and not to publish any information without prepublication clearance. The government—conceding, for purposes of Snepp's appeal from a lower court decision finding him in breach of contract, that Snepp had not revealed classified information and had a First Amendment right to publish—argued that there was a compelling state interest in preserving the appearance of confidentiality. Relying on lower court testimony by CIA Director Admiral Stansfield Turner that the publication of Snepp's book had impeded intelligence cooperation for the United States, the Supreme Court judged that reliable and enforceable prepublication review procedures were necessary to provide the advance assurance that foreign intelligence sources needed to cooperate with the United States. The Court judged that prepublication review, even of material that was unclassified at the time of the review, was necessary to allow the CIA to determine whether publication would lead to the disclosure of foreign intelligence sources and methods.

The surprisingly mundane issue before the Court, however, was the remedy for Snepp's breach of contract. The lower courts had determined that, in principle, in addition to ordinary contract damages for the value of Snepp's unperformed promise to comply with prepublication review procedures, punitive damages might be available. The lower courts described Snepp's breach as a violation of a fiduciary relationship—a special relationship of trust and confidence—with the CIA. The Supreme Court feared, however, that under the facts of the case it might be impossible to determine any real pecuniary loss for the value of the bargain, which as a matter of ordinary contract law would then bar the CIA from obtaining punitive damages as well. Because this would leave the CIA uncompensated and Snapp undeterred, the Supreme Court then relied on its extraordinary powers as a court of equity to fashion a remedy based on the common law of restitution. It found that Snapp's breach would be remedied, and future violations would be effectively deterred, by ordering Snapp to transfer to the government all his gains from the publication of his book, Decent Interval.

ANTONIO F. PEREZ

References and Further Reading

- McCamus, John D., Disgorgement for Breach of Contract: A Comparative Perspective, Loyola of Los Angeles Law Review 943 (Winter 2003): 36 (discussing the Snapp case from the perspective of ordinary contract law).
- Meadow, Jonathan C., The First Amendment and the Secrecy State: Snapp v. United States, U. Pennsylvania Law Review 130 (1982): 775, 785, 802 (discussing the Snapp case from the free speech perspective).
- White, Laura A., The Need for Governmental Secrecy: Why the U.S. Government Must Be Able to Withhold Information in the Interest of National Security, Virginia Journal of International Law 1071 (Summer 2003): 43 (discussing the Snapp case from the national security perspective).

SODOMY LAWS

Origins and Early Development

There is a long and well-documented tradition of states regulating private sexual acts. In ancient Babylon the code of Hamurabi (cir. 1860 B.C.E.) prohibited adultery and incest. The code of the Hittites (cir. 1650 B.C.E.) also outlawed certain types of bestiality, and the code of the Assyrians (cir. 1075 B.C.E.) required castration for a man who engaged in intercourse with his "brother-in-arms." Proscriptions of bestiality and what would now be termed homosexual behavior indicate that ancient civilizations were interested in regulating sexuality for reasons beyond ensuring parentage and guarding inheritance.

The foundation for laws prohibiting sodomy in Western states is the Bible. The word "sodomy" was first created in the eleventh century and is drawn from the story of the fall of the city of Sodom in the book of Genesis (19: 1–26). Scholars disagree over the interpretation of this passage; with some citing the sin of Sodom as ill treatment and inhospitality rather than the homosexual behavior with which Sodom became associated.

The principle biblical basis for the condemnation of sodomy is the book of Leviticus (18:22 and 20:13), which requires death for men who "lie with a male as those who lie with a female" for committing an "abomination." The translation and context are disputed, but from early in its history the Catholic Church has maintained that homosexual acts are sinful.

In medieval England, marriage, divorce, and sexual morality were matters for the Church and handled by ecclesiastical courts. This changed when King Henry VIII broke away from the Catholic Church, abolishing the ecclesiastical courts and subsuming their jurisdiction within the crown courts. This made previously religious offenses into crimes against the state, and in 1533 Parliament passed an act making sodomy, or "buggery," a capital crime.

The English colonies in America either adopted statutes forbidding sodomy or simply received the Common law under which sodomy was a crime. Colonial sodomy laws frequently contained biblical justifications or quotations, and there were a number of sodomy prosecutions in early America.

The Scope of Sodomy Laws in the United States

The precise definition of sodomy in English law covered not only anal intercourse between a man and either a woman or a man but also sexual intercourse between a man and an animal; consensual anal intercourse, even between husband and wife, still violated the "buggery" statute. After the revolution, the United States continued with the English understanding but gradually expanded the range of sexual acts that fell under the sodomy laws. The language used in sodomy laws was often vague and frequently included references to acts that were "unnatural" and in the absence of a clear definition were used as justification for the laws to cover acts outside of the English definition of sodomy. Toward the end of the nineteenth century states began to more clearly define the range of acts covered by the sodomy statutes, and whereas the precise definitions varied from state to state, they could be expanded to cover oral intercourse, both heterosexual and homosexual, mutual masturbation, and the use of objects for sexual gratification.

Punishments for Sodomy

Punishments for conviction of sodomy varied. The death penalty was the original punishment, although evidence suggests that few people were executed for sodomy in later colonial and United States America. Lengthy jail sentences were not uncommon throughout the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Some eugenic sterilization laws allowed for the involuntary sterilization of persons found guilty of violating sodomy laws. In the mid-twentieth century a number of states viewed same-sex sodomy as evidence of a mental condition and would institutionalize persons involved in an attempt to rehabilitate. In the late twentieth century, a sodomy conviction might result in having to join a sex offenders' register. Having a sodomy conviction was also seen as an indication of immorality and could lead to dismissal from the armed forces or civil service, loss of the right to vote or hold a drivers' license, and deportation in immigration cases.

Reform of Sodomy Laws

In the mid-twentieth century legal opinion in the United States began to push for an end to the criminalization of private consensual sodomy: France had done so in 1810 and was joined much later by England in 1967. In 1955, the American Law Institute published a Model Penal Code that did not criminalize consensual sodomy in private. Whereas a number of states used this as a template, most retained or expanded existing laws criminalizing consensual sodomy, with only Illinois and Connecticut decriminalizing consensual sodomy by 1970.

In Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965), the U.S. Supreme Court found that the Constitution created a right of privacy that precluded state regulation of the intimate activities of married couples, in this case the use of birth control. The Court made it clear in Eisenstadt v. Baird, 405 U.S. 438 (1972), that this right extended to unmarried couples.

The right of privacy described in Griswold and its progeny placed a question mark over the constitutionality of sodomy laws. Some states responded by either creating a marital exemption from their sodomy laws or through limiting them to criminalize only homosexual sodomy. Other states repealed their sodomy laws, or they were found to be in violation of the privacy provisions of their state constitutions. The Court faced the issue in Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986), a case involving consensual homosexual sodomy in a private bedroom. In a five-to-four decision, the Court ruled that the Constitution did not grant a right to engage in consensual sodomy and pointed both to the history and traditions of the states and the fact that twenty-five states still had sodomy laws.

The Court changed its position and invalidated a sodomy statute with the due process provision of the fourteenth amendment in Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003), noting that only thirteen states retained consensual sodomy laws of which four only criminalized homosexual conduct. After Lawrence, the focus for laws criminalizing consensual sodomy has shifted to arguments over what constitutes a private place for the purposes of constitutional protection.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- D'Emilio, John, and Estelle B. Freedman. Intimate Matters: A History of Sexuality in America. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1997.
- Halsall, Paul. "Internet Ancient History Sourcebook" <http://www.fordham.edu/halsall/ancient/asbook.html>, (1998).
- Jordan, Mark. Invention of Sodomy in Christian Theology. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.
- Leonard, Arthur S., ed. Homosexuality and the Constitution. Garland Publishing, 1997.
- Painter, George. "Sodomy Laws" <http://www.sodomylaws.org/index.htm>, (1991).
- Posner, Richard A., and Katherine B. Silbaugh. A Guide to America's Sex Laws. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1998.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Bowers v. Hardwick*, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
- Eisenstadt v. Baird*, 405 U.S. 438 (1972)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)

See also Boy Scouts of America v. Dale, 530 U.S. 640 (2000); Don't Ask, Don't Tell; Search (General Definition); Felon Disenfranchisement; Gay and Lesbian Rights; Homosexuality and Immigration; House Un-American Activities Committee; Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund; Megan's Law (Felon Registration); Roemer v. Evans, 517 U.S. 620 (1996); Same-Sex Adoption; State Constitution, Privacy Provisions; Stonewall Riot; Substantive Due Process; Victimless Crimes

SOLEM v. HELM, 463 U.S. 277 (1983)

The Eighth Amendment prohibits, among other things, “cruel and unusual punishments.” Since 1980, the Supreme Court has decided six cases in which the duration of a prison sentence was challenged as being grossly disproportionate to the crime for which the defendant was convicted. In only one of those cases—Solem v. Helm—has the Court ruled in favor of the defendant.

In Solem, the defendant received a sentence of life without the possibility of parole under South Dakota’s “four-strikes” recidivist statute for passing a “no account” check in the amount of $100. By itself, Helm’s triggering offense—a felony under South Dakota law—would have been punishable by up to five years in prison. Under South Dakota’s recidivist statute, however, three of Helm’s seven prior convictions “in addition to the principal felony” rendered him eligible for a maximum sentence of life without the possibility of parole.

In striking down Helm’s sentence, the Court held “as a matter of principle that a criminal sentence must be proportionate to the crime for which the defendant has been convicted.” The Court specified that the proportionality standard in recidivist sentence cases should be guided by a three-step process. First, courts must compare “the gravity of the offense and the harshness of the penalty,” with the gravity of the offense being evaluated “in light of the harm caused or threatened to the victim or society, and the culpability of the offender.” Second, courts should “compare the sentences imposed on other criminals in the same jurisdiction” to see whether “more serious crimes are subject to the same penalty, or to less serious penalties.” Finally, the courts should “compare the sentences imposed for commission of the same crime in other jurisdictions.”

The Court found that Helm’s conviction and prior offenses were all minor and nonviolent, that his sentence was the most severe authorized by South Dakota at the time, that Helm had been punished as or more severely than many South Dakota criminals whose crimes were far more serious, and that he had been punished more severely than he would have been in any other state.

Although Solem technically remains good law, it has undergone a handful of revisions and has been severely limited by subsequent Supreme Court recidivist sentence cases—Harmelin v. Michigan, Ewing v. California, and Lockyer v. Andrade. These cases sit uneasily with each other, and there remains substantial uncertainty over whether the Court will ever strike down another recidivist sentence. Nonetheless, a handful of state and lower federal courts have relied recently on Solem—notwithstanding Harmelin, Ewing, and Andrade—to do so.

JEAN-CLAUDE ANDRÉ

References and Further Reading

Frase, Richard S., Excessive Prison Sentences, Punishment Goals, and the Eighth Amendment: ‘Proportionality’ Relative to What? Minnesota Law Review 89 (February 2005): 3: 571–651.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Ewing v. California, 538 U.S. 11 (2003)
Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991)
Lockyer v. Andrade, 538 U.S. 63 (2003)

See also Cruel and Unusual Punishment Generally; Harmelin v. Michigan, 501 U.S. 957 (1991); Three Strikes/Proportionality; Theories of Punishment

SON OF SAM LAWS

“Son of Sam” laws are designed to prevent criminals from profiting from their misdeeds and to enhance the ability of crime victims to collect tort damages from the persons who cause them harm. New York enacted the first such law in 1977 in response to widespread concern that David Berkowitz, a notorious serial killer popularly known as the “Son of Sam,” might sell the rights to his story for a substantial sum.

The New York law, as later amended, required any entity that contracted with an “accused or convicted” person for a work recounting his crime or describing his thoughts or feelings about his crime to submit a copy of the contract to the state Victims Compensation Board and turn over any monies owed under that contract. The board was required to hold these monies in escrow for the benefit of any crime victim who, within five years of the account’s establishment, brought a civil action against the criminal author. The law was designed to enhance the tort law remedies available to crime victims in two respects: first, the escrow account prevented the authors from spending the profits generated by their crime stories before their victims could obtain judgments against them; and second, once the escrow account was established, the tort statute of limitations recommenced, giving the crime victim additional time to file suit. New York’s law quickly became a national model, and Congress and all but a handful of state legislatures subsequently adopted similar laws.

In 1991, in Simon & Schuster v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board, the Supreme Court unanimously invalidated New York's Son of Sam law on First Amendment grounds. The Court found that the law was a content-based regulation of speech and thus could be upheld only if it could withstand strict scrutiny. Although the Court acknowledged that the state interests supporting the law—ensuring that criminals do not profit from their misdeeds and that crime victims are compensated by those who harm them—were both “compelling,” it determined that the law was unnecessarily broad for two reasons. First, the law applied to works on any subject or theme that “express the author’s thoughts or recollections about his crime, however tangentially or incidentally.” Second, the law’s “broad definition of ‘person convicted of a crime’ enable[d] the Board to escrow the income of any author who admit[ted] in his work to having committed a crime, whether or not the author was ever actually accused or convicted.” Thus, the law potentially reached many literary works, ranging from St. Augustine’s Confessions to The Autobiography of Malcolm X, whose commercial value was not attributable to their accounts of criminal activities and whose authors did not owe their fame to criminal activity.

After Simon & Schuster, a number of states repealed their Son of Sam laws, while others, including New York, amended their laws in an effort to cure the constitutional defects identified by the Court. Some of these revised laws have since been invalidated by state courts, and it is uncertain whether any content-based law of this kind will be able to withstand First Amendment challenge.

MICHAEL MADOW

Cases and Statutes Cited

Simon & Schuster v. Members of the New York State Crime Victims Board, 502 U.S. 105 (1991)
N.Y. Exec. Law §632-a(1) (McKinney 1982 & Supp. 1991)
18 United States Code § 3681(2005)

See also Content-Based Regulation of Speech

SORRELLS v. U.S., 287 U.S. 435 (1932)

“The officer made me do it!” The federal courts did not recognize this common excuse as a possible defense to criminal conduct until Sorrells v. United States. In Sorrells, a prohibition agent visited the house of the defendant and represented himself as a World War I veteran. During the course of the night, the prohibition agent asked the defendant three times to retrieve some liquor. After declining twice, the defendant left his home and quickly returned with a half gallon of liquor. The defendant was subsequently convicted of possessing and selling whiskey in violation of the National Prohibition Act. The Supreme Court considered whether the evidence produced at trial was sufficient to create a jury question on the issue of entrapment.

Writing for the majority, Chief Justice Hughes resolved the entrapment issue in terms of statutory construction. The Court explained that Congress could not have intended for government officials to enforce the prohibition statute by coercion or abuse. The Court held that when a government official induces criminal conduct by an otherwise innocent person who lacks the predisposition to commit the crime, the entrapment defense should be submitted to the jury as a matter of law.

Justice Roberts’ concurrence provided a broader reading of the entrapment defense. Roberts emphasized that the entrapment doctrine protects the violation of the principles of justice. Roberts believed that regardless of the defendant’s previous record, the courts must not allow a conviction for a crime instigated by the government’s own agents.

Since Sorrells, courts have primarily followed the reasoning in the majority opinion rather than the concurrence. In fact, many jurisdictions have limited the scope and availability of the entrapment defense.

KIRAN RAJ

References and Further Reading

21 Am. Jur. 2d Criminal Law § 247.

Colquitt, Joseph A. Rethinking Entrapment, American Criminal Law Review 41 (2004): 1389.

SOUTER, DAVID HACKETT (1939–)

Born in Melrose, Massachusetts, on September 17, 1939, David Hackett Souter was an accomplished student at Harvard College, Oxford University, and Harvard Law School. He then went on to a distinguished career of public service in New Hampshire, serving the Granite State as Deputy Attorney General, Attorney General, trial court judge, and Supreme Court justice. In 1990, when Republican President George H. W. Bush nominated him to serve on the U.S. Court of Appeals for the First Circuit, few people outside his home state had heard of him. Despite this anonymity, President Bush announced just two months later that he was nominating Souter to replace retiring Justice William Brennan on the U.S. Supreme Court. No one predicted it then, but Souter has followed Brennan's path as an active and successful defender of civil liberties.

When Bush named him to the high Court, Souter was widely perceived as a "stealth nominee"—a reliable conservative ideologue, whose written record was sparse enough to mute any opposition from liberal Senators and interest groups. His actual performance on the bench, however, has confounded the expectations of both his liberal critics and his conservative supporters.

Beginning in 1968, Republican Presidents Nixon, Reagan, and Bush appealed to conservative voters by criticizing liberal judicial activism and by promising to appoint judges who would exercise their power with self-restraint. These new conservative judges, the Republican presidents pledged, would overturn landmark liberal precedents such as Miranda v. Arizona (1966) and Roe v. Wade (1973) and would stop protecting constitutional rights in a way that unduly limited the democratic will of the American people. Despite ten consecutive Republican appointments to the Supreme Court, however, none of this came to pass, and Souter played an influential role on the Court that reaffirmed Miranda and Roe.

Souter has tempered Brennan's expansive and evolving rights-based constitutional vision, but he has endorsed it to a surprising degree. Like Brennan, he has led the Court in defending an evolutionary, common law approach to constitutional interpretation that seeks to enforce those fundamental liberties that are essential to individual human dignity or to democratic governance. And like Brennan, Souter has worked persistently behind the scenes, drafting and redrafting opinions in search of a five-justice majority for a reading of the Constitution as close as possible to his own.

Religious Freedom

During his second year on the Court, Souter joined four other Republican appointees in Lee v. Weisman (1992) to prohibit the practice of state-sponsored prayer at public school graduation ceremonies. Because conservative political leaders had long been criticizing the Court's school prayer decisions, this result was surprising to many, but Souter's concurring opinion made clear that one of his top priorities on the Court would be to defend the constitutional guarantee of religious liberty. The First Amendment prohibits government from either establishing a state church or interfering with religious exercise, and Souter has expressed a singular determination to preserve the Warren Court's active defense of each of these guarantees. Although some of his conservative colleagues have insisted that government is constitutionally free to aid religion so long as it does not grant preferential treatment to any particular religion, Souter has sharply disagreed. In Weisman, for example, he offered a careful review of both the original understanding of the establishment clause and the Court's precedents to support the holding that the Constitution "forbids state-sponsored prayers in public school settings no matter how nondenominational the prayers may be."

Two years later, Souter wrote for the Court in Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet (1994), holding that the State of New York could not constitutionally create a special school district just for members of a Satmar Hasidic sect in the village of Kiryas Joel. In his view, "a State may not delegate its civic authority to a group chosen according to a religious criterion." He acknowledged that the First Amendment requirement of government neutrality toward religion does not prohibit the government from accommodating religious belief and practice but insisted that this particular accommodation of the Satmar community's wishes went too far, "cross[ing] the line from permissible accommodation to impermissible establishment."

Souter has not always been successful in mobilizing a judicial majority to join him in defending the establishment clause. In Agostini v. Felton (1997), Mitchell v. Helms (2000), and Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), Souter's arguments were relegated to dissent, because his more conservative colleagues gave state governments greater leeway to provide nonpreferential aid to religious schools. Similarly, when the Court held in Rosenberger v. the University of Virginia (1995) and Good News Club v. Milford Central School District (2001) that public schools and universities cannot constitutionally exclude religious organizations from generally available resources, Souter again objected to the Court's abandonment of what he saw as the First Amendment's flat prohibition on government aid to religion.

Souter has played a similar role in the Court's free exercise decisions, urging his colleagues to actively defend a broad conception of religious liberty in cases like Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah (1993). As in other areas of the law, the Rehnquist Court has surprisingly reaffirmed, and even built on, a number of landmark liberal activist precedents on religious freedom, and Souter's votes and opinions have played a key role in these developments. When the conservative justices have succeeded in chipping away at these precedents, Souter has been a leading dissenting voice.

Unenumerated Constitutional Liberties

Although religious liberty is explicitly guaranteed by the constitutional text, Souter has also urged the Court to actively defend a variety of “unenumerated” constitutional rights. Just five days after the Weisman decision on school prayer, for example, he joined the same Republican appointees in declaring that “the essential holding of Roe v. Wade should be retained and once again reaffirmed.” In a remarkable joint opinion in Planned Parenthood v. Casey (1992), Sandra Day O’Connor, Anthony Kennedy, and Souter explicitly rejected the Bush administration’s call for Roe to be overturned, thus reaffirming the constitutional jurisprudence that they had been appointed to abolish.

Endorsing a broad and evolutionary reading of the “liberty” that is guaranteed by the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, O’Connor, Kennedy, and Souter closely followed the constitutional jurisprudence laid out by the second Justice Harlan in cases like Poe v. Ullman (1961) and Griswold v. Connecticut (1965). After Harlan, Souter held in Casey and subsequent cases that Fourteenth Amendment liberty encompasses a range of more specific (although unwritten) rights such as the right to an abortion. Also after Harlan, however, he sought to balance this active judicial protection of liberty with a healthy dose of deference to democratic majorities.

In Washington v. Glucksberg (1997), for example, Souter joined a unanimous Court in upholding a state statute that outlawed physician-assisted suicide. He wrote separately, however, to make clear that the Court’s holding should be taken as neither a rejection of the Court’s liberty-protecting jurisprudence in general nor a final decision on the question of the “right to die” in particular. On the latter question, he concluded that “while I do not decide for all time that respondents’ claim [of a constitutionally protected right to die] should not be recognized, I acknowledge the legislative institutional competence as the better one to deal with that claim at this time.” On the former, he rejected the claim of some of his fellow Republican appointees that the Court should only defend those liberties explicitly guaranteed by the constitutional text, calling instead for the justices to use their “reasoned judgment” in extending constitutional protection to new liberties in new contexts.

The following year, in Sacramento v. Lewis (1998), the Court again unanimously rejected a due process claim, but Souter again made clear that the “reasoned judgment” approach was alive and well. In this opinion, Souter revived the “shocks the conscience” test that Justice Frankfurter had used for evaluating government conduct in Rochin v. California (1952), an opinion that had significantly influenced Harlan’s approach to due process liberty. In subsequent years, Souter regularly concurred in the Court’s decisions protecting parental rights (for example, Troxel v. Granville (2000)), abortion rights (for example, Stenberg v. Carhart (2000)), and sexual privacy (for example, Lawrence v. Texas (2003)).

The Rights of Criminal Defendants

Souter’s jurisprudence in the area of criminal procedure has been more conservative than in other contexts. In Atwater v. Lago Vista (2001), for example, he wrote for a bare majority of the Court in upholding the use of a warrantless custodial arrest for a misdemeanor violation of Texas’s seatbelt law. Such decisions make clear that Souter’s vision of liberal constitutionalism is less sweeping than Brennan’s, but this divergence should not be overstated. The entire spectrum of constitutional debate shifted to the right during the Burger and Rehnquist eras, such that no justice would any longer join Brennan in insisting that capital punishment is prohibited by the Constitution. Considered in light of this rightward shift, Souter’s opinions even in the area of criminal procedure have reflected a commitment to defending constitutional rights and liberties. In Dickerson v. United States (2000), for example, he joined a seven-justice majority in reaffirming Miranda.

Rejecting Conservative Activism

In addition to the surprising survival of liberal activism, the other most noteworthy development on the Rehnquist Court was the emergence of a distinctive style of conservative judicial activism. In a wide variety of constitutional contexts, the conservative justices of the Rehnquist Court declared their support for civil liberties—but civil liberties of a conservative stripe. These conservative justices, for example, have sought to defend the constitutional right of white university applicants to face a race-neutral admissions process, of the Boy Scouts of America to exclude gay members, of religious organizations to have equal access to state resources, of wealthy individuals to contribute large sums of money to political campaigns, of tobacco companies to advertise their product as they see fit, of property owners to be free from onerous zoning laws, and the like. While actively defending liberal constitutional rights in the Warren Court tradition, Souter has opposed this newer set of conservative rights claims.

The most noteworthy example of the Rehnquist Court's conservative activism was the case deciding the outcome of the 2000 presidential election. Working behind the scenes in Bush v. Gore, Souter tried valiantly to persuade O'Connor or Kennedy to provide a fifth vote for allowing the ballot recounts in Florida to continue. His efforts in this regard became clear, at least in hindsight, during the Court's oral arguments, when his questions revealed that he was searching for a compromise resolution in which the Court would send the case back to the Florida courts to resume the manual recount under a more uniform standard for determining the voters' intent. Unlike his dramatic success under similar circumstances in Casey, however, here he dramatically failed.

THOMAS M. KECK

References and Further Reading

- Fliter, John A. "Keeping the Faith: Justice David Souter and the First Amendment Religion Clauses." Journal of Church and State 40 (1998): 387.
- Garrow, David J. "Justice Souter Emerges." New York Times Magazine, 25 September 1994, 41.
- Keck, Thomas M. "David H. Souter: Liberal Constitutionalism and the Brennan Seat." In Maltz, Earl, ed. Rehnquist Justice: Understanding the Court Dynamic. Lawrence, KS: The University Press of Kansas, 2003, pp. 185–215.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Atwater v. Lago Vista*, 532 U.S. 318 (2001)
- Board of Education, Kiryas Joel Village School District v. Grumet*, 512 U.S. 687 (1994)
- Bush v. Gore*, 531 U.S. 98 (2000)
- Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye v. Hialeah*, 508 U.S. 520 (1993)
- Dickerson v. United States*, 530 U.S. 428 (2000)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Lawrence v. Texas*, 123 S. Ct. 2472 (2003)
- Lee v. Weisman*, 505 U.S. 577 (1992)
- Miranda v. Arizona*, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey*, 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
- Poe v. Ullman*, 367 U.S. 497 (1961)
- Rochin v. California*, 342 U.S. 165 (1952)
- Roe v. Wade*, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
- Sacramento v. Lewis*, 523 U.S. 833 (1998)
- Stenberg v. Carhart*, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)
- Troxel v. Granville*, 530 U.S. 57 (2000)
- Washington v. Glucksberg*, 521 U.S. 702 (1997)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 122 S.Ct. 2460 (2002)

See also Establishment Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Free Exercise Clause (I): History, Background, Framing; Rehnquist Court; Substantive Due Process

SOUTH DAKOTA v. OPPERMAN, 428 U.S. 364 (1976)

Vermillion, South Dakota, had a city ordinance making it illegal to park in certain areas between 2 a.m. and 6 a.m. A vehicle belonging to Opperman was cited for parking in a restricted area and subsequently towed to the police impound lot, where it was then inventoried, per departmental procedure. Within the unlocked glove compartment officers discovered a plastic bag containing marijuana. Opperman was later arrested and charged with possession of marijuana. His motion to suppress the evidence produced by the inventory search was denied, and he was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court of South Dakota reversed Opperman's conviction and concluded that the evidence obtained violated respondent's Fourth Amendment right to be free from unreasonable searches and seizures.

The U.S. Supreme Court reversed, upholding the validity of the inventory procedure. The Court noted that less scrutiny is applied to automobile searches than residential searches, police are frequently required to impound vehicles that violate parking ordinances to protect public safety and to keep traffic movement efficient. When a vehicle is impounded, police departments are required to inventory the automobile's contents for three reasons: to protect the occupant's personal property, to protect the police from claims or disputes of lost or stolen property, and to protect the police from a potentially dangerous situation. The Vermillion police officers were lawfully engaging in a caretaking inventory of the vehicle. The inventory was conducted according to proper departmental procedure, and only after the vehicle had been impounded for numerous parking violations, the owner of the vehicle was not present to make other arrangements for the vehicle, and the officer had observed numerous valuable personal items within the vehicle. The court noted the outcome might be different if the impoundment had been merely a pretext concealing an "investigatory police motive." Therefore, the court concluded that the inventory was not "unreasonable" under the Fourth Amendment.

AMANDA FREEMAN

See also Automobile Searches; Exclusionary Rule; Search (General Definition)

SOUTHEASTERN PROMOTIONS, LTD. v. CONRAD, 420 U.S. 546 (1975)

The municipal board responsible for managing and leasing two theaters in Chattanooga, Tennessee, denied Southeastern Promotions, a theatrical production company, use of the theaters to present Hair, a rock musical that played for three years in New York City and toured to more than 140 cities. Southeastern Promotions' request for injunctive relief was denied twice by the federal district court; the second time a jury decided Hair was obscene because it included nudity and simulated sexual conduct in violation of city and state laws. The Circuit Court of Appeals, by a divided vote, sustained the lower court.

The Supreme Court by a six-to-three vote reversed the lower court decision. Blackmun wrote the majority opinion and was joined by Brennan (who as senior associate judge in the majority assigned the opinion to Blackmun as part of Brennan's efforts to encourage Blackmun's drift toward more liberal positions) plus Stewart, Marshall, and Powell. Douglas concurred with the judgment but consistent with his absolutist view regarding the First Amendment disagreed with the majority's substantive ruling. White's dissent was joined by Burger; Rehnquist dissented separately.

Both the majority and dissenters ignored the question of whether the jury and lower courts properly interpreted the Miller standard. The decision turned instead on differing views as to whether the Chattanooga board exercised prior restraint when it refused to lease the city's theaters to Southeastern Promotions. If prior restraint did occur, the question then hinges on whether the process of denying the lease included adequate constitutional safeguards to protect Southeastern Promotions' First Amendment rights. Because the majority agreed with the petitioner's first contention that prior restraint had been exercised, it did not consider Southeastern Promotions' other claims that Miller had been wrongly followed.

Blackmun thus frames his opinion in terms of whether prior restraint had occurred in light of pertinent previous Supreme Court decisions and explains why when First Amendment issues are involved that the presumption against constitutional validity becomes weightier. The absence of proper procedural safeguards in administrative processes that broach censorship concerns was mandated by Freedman v. Maryland (1965). The majority, concluding the process in Chattanooga lacked these safeguards, accordingly reversed the decision denying Southeastern Promotions the opportunity to present Hair.

The dissenters criticized the majority's willingness to impose on Chattanooga's board what Rehnquist referred to as a "farrago of procedural requirements" that overlook the board's responsibilities under its standard lease agreement that required the board to comply with state and local laws, including those pertaining to public nudity and obscenity. The lower court proceedings, the dissenters argue, were sufficient guarantees that board's decision to deny the lease was constitutionally adequate and nondiscriminatory. As Rehnquist puts it, "I do not believe fidelity to the First Amendment requires the exaggerated and rigid procedural safeguards which the Court insists upon in this case."

ROY B. FLEMMING

Cases and Statutes Cited

Freedman v. Maryland, 380 U.S. 51 (1965)

Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)

Southeastern Promotions, Ltd. v. Conrad, 420 U.S. 546 (1975)

SOUTHERN CENTER FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

The Southern Center for Human Rights, a preeminent civil rights organization, engages in litigation, public education, and advocacy to defend persons sentenced to death and protect the civil rights of indigent defendants and inmates. Created in 1976 and located in Atlanta, Georgia, the Center is led by Stephen Bright, a leading opponent of capital punishment and recipient of numerous awards for advocacy on behalf of indigent persons.

The Center, which challenges discrimination against minorities, the poor, the mentally ill, and other disempowered persons, focuses its work in five areas: representing, at trial and on appeal, persons facing the death penalty; challenging unconstitutional conditions in prisons, jails, and children's institutions including physical and sexual assaults, deprivation of food and life-sustaining medication, and severe overcrowding; advocating for adequate legal representation for indigent defendants; advocating for judicial independence, particularly from electoral political pressures; and helping empower prisoners' families.

In addition to litigation in state and federal courts, the Center's staff has testified before Congress and state legislative bodies, taught at law schools, prepared reports and articles, engaged in community organizing, and worked with other organizations and the media to address criminal justice and corrections issues. Former Center attorneys have gone on to lead human rights organizations across the South, including the Equal Justice Initiative in Alabama, the Louisiana Crisis Assistance Center, and the Juvenile Justice Project of Louisiana.

Formerly called the Southern Prisoners' Defense Committee, the Center is a private, nonprofit organization and is known for its egalitarian ethic and modest operational expenses.

SANJAY K. CHHABLANI

References and Further Reading

Documentary Film. "Fighting for Life in the Death-Belt." EM Productions, 2005 (52 min).

Lezin, Katya. Finding Life on Death Row. Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1999.

McFeely, William S. Proximity to Death. New York: W. W. Norton & Co., Inc., 1999.

Southern Center for Human Rights, <http://www.schr.org>.

See also Capital Punishment

SOUTHERN POVERTY LAW CENTER

The Southern Poverty Law Center (the Center) is a civil rights and educational organization. Founded in 1969 by Morris Seligman Dees, Jr., and Joseph L. Levin, Jr., as a small civil rights law firm in Montgomery, Alabama, the Center evolved from the law firm and became incorporated as a nonprofit legal and educational foundation in 1971. The Center has since become an internationally recognized legal, educational, and intelligence-gathering group famous for its legal victories against white supremacist groups, tolerance education programs, and investigations of hate groups. When the Center was formally incorporated in 1971, Dees was initially named its chief counsel and executive director, and Levin became the legal director. Julian Bond, formerly of the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee and now Chairman of the Board of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), became the first president of the Center until 1979. Dees's title later changed to chief trial counsel, the position he continues to hold. With J. Richard Cohen now serving as the Center's president, Levin's title is president emeritus, whereas Bond is a member of the Center's Board of Directors.

Using court challenges as its chief and primary weapon, the Center since its founding has amassed a series of significant legal victories, some at the U.S. Supreme Court. The Center's legal department files civil suits on behalf of anyone that has been a victim of any form of discrimination, but particularly goes after white supremacist organizations by using tort law legal principles that make organizations and their leaders liable for misdeeds of their agents or representatives called vicarious liability. The Center also provides help to other lawyers and various advocacy groups involved in capital punishment defense, civil rights, and poverty cases. Partly in response to the reemergence of Ku Klux Klan and affiliated groups in the late 1970s to early 1980s, and partly because of the limited constitutional reach of U.S. law enforcement agencies (as a result of laws enacted because of J. Edgar Hoover's alleged abuses at the FBI), the Center began its "Klanwatch" project in 1981 and started investigating and tracking the activities of such groups. Although many of the Center's staff initially disagreed with Dees (the project's chief architect) on its establishment, the Center is now well recognized partly because of this project (now called the "Intelligence Project"). The Center's Intelligence Project publishes the Intelligence Report, a quarterly magazine, detailing activities among alleged hate groups and extremist organizations. The Intelligence Report is distributed to law enforcement agencies, the media, and the public. The Report is credited with helping obtain criminal convictions in several hate crime cases.

In 1991, the Center created an educational program called "Teaching Tolerance," and according to its website, "to help K-12 teachers foster respect and understanding in the classroom." Teaching Tolerance provides information on the history of the civil rights movement and anti-bias resources to teachers and parents. Under this program, multimedia kits are provided free to schools and community groups. In 2001, the Center launched an online destination, Tolerance.org, to provide additional support for its Teaching Tolerance program. On this interactive website, information on understanding America's multiculturalism, tolerating differences among different social groups, fighting hate on campus, and a host of topics such as school mascots with Native American names and the Confederate flag are extensively provided. The website contains information on how concerned individuals and organizations can work for unity in their communities. It also provides information for parents encouraging them to embrace multiculturalism in raising their children, urging them to live in integrated neighborhoods, and advising them to use culturally sensitive language.

Deciding to memorialize those killed during the Civil Rights Movement, the Center in 1989 commissioned Maya Lin, who designed the Vietnam War Memorial, to design a Civil Rights Memorial that stands at a plaza facing the Center's building in Montgomery. The Memorial contains a black granite fountain with its waters flowing down over the words that Martin Luther King, Jr., had spoken at Riverside Church in New York City in 1967 (a year before his assassination)—"until justice rolls down like waters and righteousness like a mighty stream." The waters then roll over some of the names of those that died in the civil rights struggle. The Memorial is a popular place of attraction in Montgomery, drawing many visitors from around the world. The Center plans to add a new Civil Rights Memorial Center in 2005. Since its formal incorporation, the Center primarily funds its operations from contributions solicited from individuals through direct mail marketing, sometimes using graphic images from results of violent hate crimes in its solicitation letters.

Legal Fights

On the legal front, both Dees and Levin had handled several pro bono cases before the Center's incorporation. In 1969, Dees on behalf of two African-American cousins, and with the help of Fred D. Gray (the African-American attorney who represented Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. during the Montgomery bus boycott in 1955), filed a class action suit against the Montgomery branch of the YMCA to integrate the all-white facility (Smith v. YMCA, 1972). Although the case was highly unpopular in Montgomery's white communities, the YMCA was found to have violated the equal protection clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The YMCA was ordered to integrate all its facilities.

In other cases before the Center's formal incorporation, Dees and Levin represented a high school English teacher dismissed for teaching a Kurt Vonnegut story, "Welcome to the Monkey House"; she was subsequently reinstated. They defended a service-woman denied equal pay and other benefits received by her male counterparts, the Defense Department was ordered to change its discriminatory regulations. The case, Frontero v. Richardson (1973), reached all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court wherein the Court decided that the particular Air Force regulation was discriminatory and violated the Fifth Amendment guaranteeing due process under the law. The case is regarded as the first successful sex discrimination lawsuit against the federal government. Dees and Levin also filed a class action suit against the Montgomery Advertiser for its refusal to print a photo and wedding announcement of an African-American couple in the newspaper's society pages on Sundays instead of on Thursdays in the "negro editions." Arguing that the civil rights statutes did not cover such discrimination, the Court ruled for the newspaper. Nonetheless, the newspaper was shamed into changing its policy.

After the Center's incorporation, three African-American men were accused of raping a white woman in Tarboro, North Carolina, in 1973. They were found guilty and sentenced to death. At Dees's behest, the Center became involved in the case after the men were sentenced. Using the Center's massive resources, Dees hired local counsels, paid for expensive exhibits, and got the North Carolina Supreme Court to order a new trial because of prosecutor's prejudicial conduct. Although the men later agreed to plea nolo contendere to a six-year sentence for assault with intent to rape, Dees negotiated for them to be released immediately, less than two years after they were sentenced to death.

The Center, as well as Dees, first attracted national attention in 1974 as a result of another case involving an African-American woman inmate accused of murdering her white jailer in North Carolina. The prosecutor alleged that the inmate, Joan Little, on August 27, 1974, lured the jailer, Clarence Allgood, into her cell and killed him in cold blood with an ice pick that she had stolen from him earlier on the day of the incident. Little claimed that Allgood had tried to rape her and in her struggle to fend him off and flee, hit him with the ice pick that he had brought to her jail to use in his sexual attack. Little fled and Allgood was found dead in Little's cell with his pants off. Little was later captured and indicted by the grand jury for first-degree murder. Given the racial and sexual overtones of the case and after a New York Times article on the case on December 1, 1974, the national and overseas media picked up the story. While investigating the case, Dees interviewed one of Allgood's colleagues, Beverly King, who later became a state witness, and obtained a statement from her. On realizing that during King's testimony on the witness stand she contradicted what she had previously told him, Dees challenged her off the witness stand. When Dees later challenged King on the witness stand, she claimed that Dees had told her to falsely testify. Accusing Dees of subornation of perjury, the judge trying the case dismissed Dees as a defendant attorney from the case. Dees was subsequently charged with felonious subornation of perjury. Although the felony was later dropped, Dees was put off the case for good. Nonetheless, the Center continued to financially assist in Little's defense, and she was subsequently acquitted of the murder charge in 1975.

Employing vicarious liability tort law legal principles, the Center filed a civil suit on behalf of Beulah Mae Donald (Beulah Mae Donald, as Executrix of the Estate of Michael Donald, Deceased v. United Klans of America et al., 1984), mother of Michael Donald who was brutally murdered by two members of the United Klans of America. In 1981, in retaliation for the decision of a mixed jury to acquit an African-American man accused of killing a white man, two members of the United Klans of America, James Knowles and Henry Hays, picked up Michael Donald off a street in Mobile, Alabama, beat him, slit his throat, and hung him on a tree. It turned out that the Klansmen were acting at the urging of Bennie Jack Hays, the South Alabama Grand Titan of the Klan group, which was nationally led by Robert Shelton, its Imperial Wizard. In exchange for a life sentence, James Knowles turned state witness and testified against his co-murderer, Henry Hays. Hays was found guilty and sentenced to death. Notably, Hays was later executed on June 6, 1997, the first white to be put to death for killing an African American in Alabama since early twentieth century.

Not satisfied with the punishment for the two killers, the Center decided to sue the Klan group. Arguing that the two killers and Bennie Hays were acting as conspiratorial agents to further the history of Klan violence, the Center filed a suit on behalf of Beulah Mae Donald seeking $10 million in damages against the men, the United Klans of America, and Robert Shelton, the group's national leader. To the Klan's surprise, a federal jury found the defendants liable and awarded $7 million in damages. Because the Klan group could not provide the damage amount, all its assets (primarily its national headquarters) were sold and transferred to the Donald family. The judgment effectively bankrupted the United Klans of America and put it out of operations while Beulah Mae Donald used the money collected from the sale of the group's assets to buy a new house. During the course of its investigation, the Center also discovered new evidence that was used to obtain indictments against Frank Cox, a third man present during Donald's murder, and Bennie Hays. Cox was subsequently convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment, and Hays died before he could be tried.

Typical of the class action suits that the Center would become famous for filing is the case against the Klan in 1987 (McKinney, et al. v. Southern White Knights et al., 1987). In February 1987, members of white supremacist groups the Invisible Empire, Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, and the Southern White Knights attacked African-American and white peaceful demonstrators honoring Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., in Forsyth County, Georgia. The Center on behalf of scores of plaintiffs filed a class action against the white supremacist groups. In 1989, the federal court awarded the plaintiffs $940,000, ordered all the assets and trademarks of the Invisible Empire turned over to the plaintiffs, and asked the Klan group to destroy its membership and publication subscription lists containing approximately 10,000 names. In addition, the court ordered all the Invisible Empire's non-cash assets turned over to the plaintiffs be assigned to a branch of the NAACP and asked the group's leaders to attend a class on race relations. By 1994, the Southern White Knights was equally forced by the court to destroy its membership lists.

Relying on the same vicarious liability law principles used in the Donald case, the Center, joined by the Anti-Defamation League, filed a wrongful death lawsuit against the White Aryan Resistance (WAR) and some of its leaders in 1989 on behalf of the family of Mulugeta Seraw (Berhanu v. Metzger, 1990). Seraw was a twenty-seven-year-old Ethiopian-born black student who was beaten to death in Portland, Oregon, by three members of East Side White Pride, a local group of skinheads that advocated Anti-Semitism and racial separatism. Seraw was spotted being dropped off by two friends. The skinheads attacked Seraw and his friends, repeatedly hit Seraw on his head with a baseball bat. Seraw was pronounced dead at the hospital shortly afterward. As a result of plea bargains, the killers received ten to twenty years' jail sentences each. Nonetheless, the Center decided to institute a civil suit against the convicted killers, Thomas Metzger, the president of WAR, and other leaders of the group. During the civil trial, the Center produced a surprise witness, David Mazella, a WAR member, persuaded by Dees to testify against the skinheads. Mazella testified to being a "direct link" between the local skinhead group and WAR. Claiming that he was 1,200 miles away from the place the murder took place and that the only thing he did was to exercise his First Amendment right of free speech, Metzger argued that he was not responsible for Seraw's death. Rejecting Metzger's argument, the jury returned a verdict of $12.5 million in damages for Seraw's family. In an amicus curiae brief, the Oregon chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union maintained that the civil suit might have violated Metzger's First Amendment rights. The jury rejected the argument. The defendants appealed the verdict all the way to the U.S. Supreme Court, which denied certiorari.

In 1993, the Center successfully challenged the flying of the Confederate battle flag by the Alabama governor over the State Capitol. Relying on old statute authorizing the flying only of the U.S. and Alabama flags, the Center forced the state to remove the confederate flag. The Center also convinced the state to abandon the reintroduction of chain gangs enacted by the state governor in 1995. Whereas the Center continues to litigate various cases on behalf of people who have suffered some form of racial or other form of injustice, it remains popular for instituting civil suits against alleged hate and white supremacist groups.

The History of Morris Dees

Chronicling the history and work of the Center without highlighting Morris Dees makes its story incomplete. Winner of various humanitarian and legal awards but despised (and at various times targeted for assassination) by white supremacist organizations and its leaders, Dees's personal story is intertwined with the Center's history and achievements. Born on December 16, 1936, in Shorter, Alabama, to farmers, Dees grew up in the segregated South. At an early age, Dees decided that he was going to make himself more financially secure than his parents did for themselves. Thus, by the time he graduated from high school, he had engaged in different activities such as newspaper delivery and farming to earn money. Dees was particularly good at farming, and he was named the Star Farmer of Alabama by the Alabama Future Farmers of America in 1955. Although Dees grew up in a segregated environment, his parents, by his recollections, were never hostile to African Americans. In his autobiography, A Lawyer's Journey: The Morris Dees Story, Dees recounted an incident when he was five years old and refused to get off a mule he was riding. Wilson, an African-American field hand, had gently prodded Dees to get off the mule. Dees responded, "You black nigger, you can't tell me what to do." Unknown to Dees, his father happened to be standing behind the mule. Dees's father gave Dees his first whipping in his life and warned him never to call anyone a "black nigger," while ordering him to obey Wilson.

Dees graduated from the University of Alabama at Tuscaloosa in 1958 despite getting married right before he graduated from high school in 1952 and having two children with his first wife during his college years. Dees later graduated from the University of Alabama law school in 1960. While in college, he and Millard Fuller, a college and law school colleague, established a birthday-cake delivery business that they expanded to a business selling fundraising products to clubs and organizations. By the time Dees and Fuller finished law school, they were on their way to becoming wealthy men.

In 1960, Dees and Fuller formed a law partnership in Montgomery, Alabama, while still pursuing various business interests. Because their business interests were flourishing, they did not put that much time into their law practice. In 1963, Dees and Fuller compiled and published Favorite Recipes of Home Economics Teachers, which became a popular cookbook. They later established a mail order and book publishing business, Fuller & Dees Marketing Group, which turned out to be one of the largest and most successful publishing companies in the South. Fuller sold out his interest in the business to Dees in 1964 for $1 million, donated most of his profits to charities, and later founded Habitat for Humanity, an organization that builds housing for the poor. As he recounted in his autobiography, while stranded in a Cincinnati airport in 1967, Dees had an epiphany to become more involved in civil rights. As a result of his epiphany, Dees increasingly devoted his time to practicing civil rights law and sold the book publishing company to Times Mirror, the parent company of the Los Angeles Times, in 1969.

It was after the sale of the business that Dees teamed up with Joseph Levin, Jr., to form a civil rights law firm that later became the Center. Dees has also been actively involved in politics. He was the finance director for the George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign, helping to raise huge amounts of money from small donors. Dees later served on President Jimmy Carter's 1976 presidential campaign as national finance director, and on Senator Edward Kennedy's 1980 presidential campaign as national finance chairman.

As a result of Dees's efforts leading the Center's court victories against hate groups, Dees became the subject of a made-for-television movie, Line of Fire: the Morris Dees Story, which aired on NBC on January 21, 1991. He has also been a recipient of numerous death threats and was reportedly listed at one time as number one on the hit list of the hate group that killed Denver talk show host Alan Berg, an antigay advocate.

Criticisms of the Center

The Center's history is not without controversy, with most centering on Dees's salesmanship and the Center's fundraising tactics. In a highly publicized story in the Montgomery Advertiser in 1994, the newspaper, after a two-year investigation, alleged that the Center had not hired enough African Americans in top and leadership positions, that Dees stacked the Center's board with his close friends, and that Dees had offended the civil rights community by lobbying for the appointment of a prodeath penalty federal judge. Among other claims, the Montgomery Advertiser complained that during the 1984 to 1994 ten-year period, the Center had raised close to $62 million in contributions but spent only $21 million on its poverty and discrimination fighting activities, and that sometimes the Center never spent more than 20 percent on its programs, whereas many nonprofit organizations spent as much as 75 percent on programs. However, the newspaper was unable to cite any specific instance of financial impropriety.

In another article written by Ken Silverstein in Harper's Magazine in 2000, Silverstein accused the Center of spending less time defending prisoners facing capital punishment and more time on "relentless fundraising campaign.” Referencing the Montgomery Advertiser article, Silverstein repeated the newspaper’s report that although Beulah Mae Donald ultimately netted $51,875 from the sale of United Klan of America’s assets, the Center made $9 million from fundraising activities solicitations related to the case. Other critics of the Center’s financial wealth (more than $100 million endowment) have accused the Center (and particularly Dees) of profiting from the pain of people that have suffered society’s injustices. Despite these accusations, the Center remains an influential organization in helping various government agencies track down hate groups throughout the nation.

SALMON A. SHOMADE

References and Further Reading

- Chalmers, David. Backfire: How the Ku Klux Klan Helped the Civil Rights Movement. Lanham, MD: Rowman & Littlefield, 2003.
- Dees, Morris with Steve Fiffer. A Lawyer’s Journey: The Morris Dees Story. Chicago, IL: ABA, 2001.
- Klebanov, Diana, and Franklin L. Jonas. People’s Lawyers: Crusaders for Justice in American History. Armonk, NY: M.E. Sharpe, Inc., 2003.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Beulah Mae Donald, as Executor of the Estate of Michael Donald, Deceased v. United Klans of America et al.* No. 84-0725-C-S (S.D. Ala., filed June 14, 1984)
- Berhanu v. Metzger*, No. A8911-07007, Multnomah County Circuit Court, Oregon (October 25, 1990)
- Frontero v. Richardson*, 411 U.S. 677 (1973)
- McKinney et al. v. Southern White Knights et al.*, No. 1:87-565-CAM (N.D. Ga., filed March 24, 1987)
- Smith v. YMCA*, 462 F.2d 634 (5th Cir. 1972)

SPANO v. NEW YORK, 360

U.S. 315 (1959)

On the evening of February 3, 1957, Vincent Joseph Spano, indicted for first-degree murder, surrendered to the police. Immediately after Spano’s accompanying counsel had departed, police initiated an intensive interrogation that involved multiple officials and lasted throughout the night and into the following morning. As advised by counsel, Spano initially refused to respond and was denied repeated requests to contact his attorney. To facilitate a confession, investigators sought the assistance of a police trainee, an acquaintance of Spano’s, who falsely solicited Spano’s sympathy. In the predawn hours, Spano capitulated, providing written and oral statements of guilt along with the location of his discarded weapon. Spano was subsequently convicted and sentenced to death. The New York Court of Appeals affirmed.

On certiorari, the Supreme Court unanimously reversed. Writing for the Court, Chief Justice Warren ruled the confession involuntary under the totality of the circumstances. Although noting multiple factors, including Spano’s foreign-born status and limited education, Warren’s opinion gave particular emphasis to the relentless, overnight questioning that continued in the absence of requested counsel. This prolonged, postindictment questioning, in combination with the investigators’ ruse, was sufficient to overcome the defendant’s will, thereby rendering his statements impermissible self-incrimination in violation of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments. In addition to illustrating the application of the “totality of the circumstances” test in determining the voluntariness of confessions, this case also reveals the Court’s burgeoning recognition of the importance of counsel’s presence during custodial interrogation—a development that would ultimately culminate in Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966).

LISA K. PARSHALL

Cases and Statutes Cited

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

See also Coerced Confessions/Police Interrogations; Due Process; Miranda Warning

SPAZIANO v. FLORIDA, 468

U.S. 447 (1984)

Spaziano was indicted and convicted of first-degree murder more than two years after the offense occurred. Under Florida law, the statute of limitations for noncapital offenses was two years. The trial judge declined to instruct the jury on the lesser included offenses of second-degree and third-degree murder and manslaughter, because Spaziano refused to waive the statute of limitations for those offenses. After the jury recommended a life sentence, the trial judge imposed a death sentence. On appeal, Spaziano argued that the omission of lesser included offenses in the jury instructions denied him a fair trial and that judicial override of a life sentence recommendation violates the Fifth Amendment’s double jeopardy provision and the Sixth Amendment’s guarantee of a jury trial.

The Court held that although a lesser included offense instruction is ordinarily an element of a constitutionally fair trial, the principle does not apply where, as here, the defendant cannot be convicted of the lesser included offenses. Furthermore, the Court denied that the trial judge's rejection of the jury's sentencing recommendation violates a constitutional right. First, because the jury's recommendation is merely advisory, it does not constitute a judgment that triggers double jeopardy. In addition, regardless of whether most jurisdictions rest capital sentencing authority in juries, the Sixth Amendment does not preclude judicial determination of a capital sentence. In subsequent decisions, the Court has held that juries rather than judges must perform the fact-finding role but has left undisturbed its holding in Spaziano that the Sixth Amendment does not require jury sentencing.

MARY SIGLER

References and Further Reading

Ring v. Arizona, 536 U.S. 584 (2002).

See also Barclay v. Florida, 463 U.S. 939 (1983); Capital Punishment and Sentencing; Jury Trial Right

SPEECH AND EDUCATION

Countervailing Forces

In nineteenth-century America, organized religion frequently exercised its considerable influence to inhibit freedom of speech in higher education. The publication in 1859 of Charles Darwin's theory of evolution, for example, sparked clashes between supporters of the biblical creation story and college professors who sought to teach or write about evolution.

Since then, however, government entities and officials have been responsible for most efforts to control academic speech. Government entities include, for example, federal, state, or local legislative bodies; various nonacademic executive agencies; and public educational institutions themselves, speaking through their governing boards, top administrators, or faculty policy-making bodies. Government officials include, for example, police officers assigned to campus, and public school administrators or faculty members. In the twentieth and twentieth-first centuries, measures to control academic speech have frequently been motivated by desires to ensure loyalty to the government, to protect national security or support the military in times of international conflict, to protect members of the academic community from hate speech, and to promote an intellectual ideology supported by a majority of members of an academic unit.

Acting as constraints on efforts to control campus speech are several countervailing authoritative or persuasive forces. They include judicial enforcement of statutory or constitutional protections of speech, contractual obligations to protect speech, external pressures from organizations such as the American Association of University Professors (AAUP), and internal pressures stemming from an educational institution's desire to maintain sound educational policies and its reputation as a center of critical inquiry.

Academic Freedom, Educational Policies, and Contractual Obligations

Principles of academic freedom warrant discussion as a threshold matter, because the scope of constitutional protection arguably is influenced by widely accepted values of academic freedom and because those values may be embraced by private institutions that are not subject to constitutional mandates. Broadly defined, academic freedom encompasses (1) the freedom of academic institutions to define their educational missions; to decide who will teach, what will be taught, and who will be admitted to the student body; and to otherwise control their internal affairs; (2) the freedom of faculty to engage in scholarly inquiry and publish the fruits of their research, to control the content of their courses and lectures, and to express their views in other forums; and (3) the freedom of students to determine the course of their studies and to express their views on the topics of study. To some extent, these components of academic freedom constrain one another. For example, acting through its administration or its collective faculty, an institution can designate required courses for a degree program and can define the general content of such courses, partially constraining the freedom of individual faculty to define course content and the freedom of students to define their course of study. Moreover, a classroom instructor can designate the relevant issue for class discussion, thus partially constraining student freedom of expression in the classroom.

American universities imported European traditions of academic freedom in the decades after the Civil War, focusing on faculty freedoms. The AAUP maintained this focus on faculty freedoms when it issued its 1915 Declaration of Principles and when it later joined with the Association of American Colleges and Universities (AACU) to issue the 1940 Statements of Principles on Academic Freedom and Tenure. The publication and promotion of these general principles of academic freedom by the AAUP and the AACU did not transform the principles into binding law. Instead, the AAUP has sought to promote application of the principles through its power of persuasion and the threat of public censure for violations of academic freedom. Partly as a result of these efforts, principles of academic freedom have gained wide acceptance among academic institutions as an element of sound educational policy and sometimes as binding obligations assumed by educational institutions in employment contracts with faculty or tuition contracts with students.

Constitutional or Statutory Protections of Academic Speech

Overview

The First and Fourteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution prohibit governmental interference with freedoms of speech, of the press, and of assembly. These constitutional provisions operate only against government action, such as state or federal legislation, policies issued by public schools, or the coercive actions of individual government officials on campus. Thus, these constitutional provisions do not restrict the power of private colleges or universities to regulate speech on their campuses. Accordingly, some private institutions of higher education, particularly those with religious affiliations, have exhibited a desire to provide educational environments that protect their students from expression that is highly offensive or contrary to the religious tenets that help define the educational mission of the school. By regulating campus speech to a significantly greater extent than would be permissible in a public university, however, a private school risks its very identity as a center of critical inquiry and academic debate. Moreover, a legislature has the power to extend the equivalent of constitutional guarantees of freedom of speech to private campuses. For example, the California Legislature extended the equivalent of constitutional protection to student speech on private campuses by enacting California Education Code § 94367 in 1992.

Where it applies, the constitutional protection of speech is impressive but not absolute. For example, speakers are not constitutionally privileged to convey obscenity, to issue a credible threat of harm to another, or to incite an imminent and unlawful breach of the peace. So long as government regulates such categories of speech with precision and without selectively regulating a subset of such speech based on its political, religious, or other ideological content or viewpoint, the regulation should meet constitutional requirements. Beyond such categories of unprotected speech, the scope of freedom of speech on campus is a function partly of the context within which the speech takes place.

Student Speech

For example, student speech in public schools may be regulated, consistent with the Constitution, to the extent necessary to avoid disruption of the educational program or interference with the rights of other students. In class discussion, an instructor can require students to address a particular topic relevant to the lesson plan of the moment, rather than a different topic that is intensely important to the student but disruptive of the instructor's pedagogic goals. Indeed, the instructor may teach a mode of discourse that is intellectual in tone and civil in nature and accordingly can interrupt a student who violates the discourse rules of the class with personal insults or profane language.

Moreover, so long as a public school acts neutrally, without regard to the social, political, religious, or other ideological content of speech, it can issue and enforce policies that impose reasonable restrictions on the time, place, and manner of speech on campus. For example, a school could force the relocation of demonstrations that would obstruct pedestrian traffic at a congested intersection on a university campus, and it could ban noisy speech forced on unwilling listeners who seek to study in the library or to rest in their college dormitory rooms.

Greater restrictions on student speech would be permissible in primary and secondary schools, particularly in the lower grades. Courts recognize that schools shoulder the burden of inculcating fundamental social values at those levels, and that the youngest students are not yet prepared to critically evaluate and debate diverse perspectives on provocative topics.

College-level students, however, are sufficiently mature to enter the marketplace of ideas, or at least to learn to do so with proper guidance. Moreover, many locations on a college campus may possess the attributes of traditional public forums in which a free exchange of ideas receives full constitutional protection, subject only to the kinds of restrictions on speech mentioned previously. For example, so long as they do not obstruct traffic or disturb others who are working or learning in offices, classrooms, or libraries, a group of students would enjoy the constitutional right to assemble at an appropriate place on a public campus, such as a square or lawn, and voice their views on a controversial topic without fear of censorship or disciplinary action. Their message would be available to all persons passing by who care to pause and listen rather than avert their eyes and move on.

Although obscenity is not constitutionally protected, the scope of protected speech in such a campus forum is sufficiently broad to encompass speech that is uncivil and offensive to others, such as the expression of views that others might deem to be profane, unpatriotic, sacrilegious, sexist, racist, heterosexist, or harassing. For example, when campus policies restricting hateful speech became popular in the late 1980s and in the 1990s, courts struck down the policies of several public schools on grounds that the policies permitted administrators to regulate speech that was merely offensive or permitted them to disfavor some speech on the basis of its ideological content or viewpoint. In some ways, the breadth of this conception of freedom of expression is unique to the United States and reached its full fruition only in the latter half of the twentieth century.

Evaluation of Academic Work

Even when speech in an academic forum of a public school, such as student or faculty research or classroom utterances, is constitutionally protected from immediate censorship or discipline, it nevertheless may be subject to academic evaluation. A professor of history, for example, may have a constitutional right to publish his arguments that previous literature has exaggerated the magnitude of the Holocaust; however, this protection from censorship and immediate discipline does not shield the author from critical evaluation of the author's research and analysis. Acting through faculty review committees and academic administrative officers, for example, the educational institution may ultimately deny the author tenure or promotion after finding that the research or analysis fails to meet the standards of excellence of the academic unit. Similarly, a student may be protected from censorship or discipline for expressing a controversial but relevant statement in class or in a research paper, but the student is not entitled to a top grade simply because the speech is protected; the instructor may apply politically neutral standards to award the student a low grade for inadequate research or faulty analysis.

Of course, a student or faculty member would be constitutionally protected from adverse government action if critical evaluations were motivated by the evaluators' ideological opposition to the viewpoint of the student or faculty member, without regard to an objective assessment of the quality of the student or faculty work. A public school's denial of tenure to a faculty member, for example, would violate principles of free speech if it were based on the political unpopularity of the tenure candidate's published findings about gender-based differences in athletic capabilities, particularly if the school's evaluators conceded that the publication was a model of excellence in research, analysis, and expression. Differentiating between good-faith critiques of the quality of student or faculty work, on the one hand, and discrimination against the work on the basis of its ideological viewpoint, on the other, is often a difficult task. In close cases, however, courts are likely to defer to the professional judgment of academic evaluators if apparently exercised in good faith.

Control of Speech as a Function of Management of the Workplace

In addition to limitations on freedom of academic speech outlined previously, much of the speech of instructors, administrators, and other employees of a school is subject to their employer's managerial control. A public employer has greater constitutional license to control the speech of government employees while managing its workplace than to suppress the speech of others while acting outside of a managerial role. Thus, the First Amendment permits a public school to control the speech of its employees to a greater extent that it permits a police officer to suppress the speech of a nonemployee protestor in a city park.

An employer, of course, can and should prohibit its supervisory employees from using speech or conduct to violate antidiscrimination statutes. A faculty member, for example, has no constitutional privilege to repeatedly subject his secretary to egregious verbal sexual harassment or to instruct African-American students to sit in the back of the classroom.

Those examples of unprotected discriminatory speech, however, are easy cases, because regulation of the speech can be based not so much on the ideological content or viewpoint of the speech as on the speaker's selectively targeting others for adverse treatment because of their membership in a protected class. More deserving of a measure of constitutional protection, and a better test of the constitutional limits of a public employer's managerial control of speech, is public employee speech directed to the general public on a political issue.

The U.S. Supreme Court has defined the degree of protection afforded to public employee speech in a balancing test developed in its 1968 decision on Pickering v. Board of Education and further delineated as a two-part test in its 1983 decision, Connick v. Meyers, and its progeny. Under Pickering/Connick, public employee speech is constitutionally protected only if (1) the employee is addressing a matter of public concern in the employee's role as a citizen of the community, and (2) the employee's speech interests outweigh the employer's managerial interests in efficiently carrying out its mission. Thus, for example, a public employer can discipline an employee for the employee's circulating speech relating to a workplace grievance that is personal to the employee, for the employee's complaining – as part of his employment duties – to a supervisor about misrepresentations in an affidavit or even for the employee's engaging in speech as a citizen on a political topic of public concern if the employee's interests in speaking on the matter of public concern are outweighed by legitimate managerial concerns that the speech would impede the accomplishment of the employer's mission. If the employer issued a policy banning future speech by employees, thus erecting a prior restraint on speech, a wider array of interests of employees and potential audiences would be weighed against the employer's managerial interests.

The dawning of the twenty-first century has witnessed a division of opinion among different courts and scholarly commentators over the extent to which academic speech by faculty in public schools receives special constitutional protection beyond that provided by the Pickering/Connick balancing test. Some passages in twentieth-century Supreme Court opinions seem to support the argument that freedom of thought, inquiry, and expression is more centrally important in the university setting than in other government employment contexts and that principles of academic freedom enjoy elevated status within the First Amendment. Accordingly, several scholarly commentators have argued that faculty comments in the college classroom, for example, should be constitutionally protected if relevant to the course and if conveyed in good faith as part of a pedagogic strategy, without limiting protection to that of the Pickering/Connick test.

Other courts or commentators have argued that the statements by Supreme Court justices most strongly supporting special constitutional protection for faculty academic freedoms have appeared in dictum or in dissenting, concurring, or plurality opinions. These courts and commentators have opined that elevated constitutional protection for academic freedom, if any, is limited to special protection for institutional academic freedom. Under this approach, adopted in cases such as Urofsky v. Gilmore, the Pickering/Connick test would determine the legitimacy of a public school's restrictions on the academic speech of faculty or other employees, and courts would respect institutional academic freedom by deferring in close cases to the judgments of educational institutions regarding the need to administratively regulate faculty speech. Such deference would be particularly great in primary and secondary schools, allowing school boards to closely control curriculum and to inculcate fundamental community values.

In 2006 the Supreme Court expressly left open the question whether its Pickering/Connick test would apply to teaching and scholarship in the same way it applies to other student government. One would not be reckless in predicting, however, that the Supreme Court will develop a standard that recognizes the importance of freedom of faculty thought, inquiry, and expression in academic contexts, at least at the university level. Even if the test of Pickering/Connick is destined to apply to faculty speech, it likely will be applied with sensitivity to these values, giving special weight to a faculty member's interests in academic speech.

Moreover, constitutional doctrine defines the minimum protection for academic speech in public schools. To promote intellectual inquiry and the exchange of ideas, educational institutions are free, of course, to adopt policies and even to assume contract obligations that protect academic speech to a greater degree than is required by the First Amendment.

Promotion of an Educational Institution's Views and Noncoercive Appeals for Civil Discourse

The First Amendment is generally not offended if a public educational institution limits the participation of others in the institution's own speech. If a public school conveys its mission and values, for example, in its own newsletter, website, or office bulletin board, the institution may control the message that it conveys, and it thus may exclude the proposed contributions of students or faculty that are inconsistent with the institution's desired message.

Similarly, even when the First Amendment precludes a public school from suppressing controversial speech on campus, the school remains free to voice its own policies and values on the matter in controversy. For example, a university could not discipline a student for appearing in an appropriate forum to express disagreement with the university's affirmative action programs, but university administrators could respond with their own speech, conveying the university's arguments supporting affirmative action. Moreover, a public university would be free to use its verbal powers of persuasion to encourage members of its community to debate the issues of the day in a civil manner befitting a place of intellectual inquiry, even though the university could not force student protesters in a public forum on campus to adopt its recommendations.

In extreme cases, an administrator's expression of institutional values might be sufficiently coercive in tone and substance to implicate First Amendment principles or at least to offend broader principles of academic freedom and sound educational policy. For example, if the Provost and President of a university not only expressed the institution's support for diversity in its student body but also announced that "arguments against affirmative action are analytically bankrupt," their speech might influence tenure committees to discount the analytic merit of a tenure candidate's publication critiquing affirmative action programs, and it thus might create a chilling effect on academic inquiry. In general, however, an institution's expression of its own policies and values will not interfere with the free speech rights of other members of the campus community.

CHARLES R. CALLEROS

References and Further Reading

- Bird, R. Kenton, and Elizabeth Barker Brandt, Academic Freedom and 9/11: How the War on Terrorism Threatens Free Speech on Campus, Communication Law and Policy 7 (2002): 431–459.
- Buss, William G., Academic Freedom and Freedom of speech: Communicating the Curriculum, Journal of Gender, Race & Justice 2 (1999): 213–278.
- Chang, Ailsa W., Resuscitating the Constitutional "Theory" of Academic Freedom: A Search for a Standard Beyond Pickering and Connick, Stanford Law Review 53 (2001): 915–966.
- Calleros, Charles R. Reconciliation of Civil Rights and Civil Liberties after R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul: Free Speech, Antiharassment Policies, Multicultural Education, and Political Correctness at Arizona State University, Utah Law Review 1992 (1992): 1205–1333.
- Golding, Martin P. Free Speech on Campus. MD: Rowman & Littlefield Publishers, Inc., 2000.
- Gordon, Lee, Achieving a Student-Teacher Dialectic in Public Secondary Schools: State Legislatures Must Promote Value-Positive Education, N.Y. Law School Law Review 36 (1991): 397–426.
- Hiers, Richard H., Institutional Academic Freedom v. Faculty Academic Freedom in Public Colleges and Universities: A Dubious Dichotomy, Journal of College and University Law 29 (2002): 35–109.
- Hofstadter, Richard, and Walter P. Metzger. The Development of Academic Freedom in the United States. New York: Columbia University Press, 1955.
- Jackson, Jim, Express and Implied Contractual Rights to Academic Freedom in the United States, Hamline Law Review 22 (1999): 467–499.
- O'Neil, Robert. Free Speech in the College Community. Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1997.
- Smith, Stacy E., Who Owns Academic Freedom?: The Standard for Academic Free Speech at Public Universities, Washington & Lee Law Review 59 (2002): 299–359.

Van Alstyne, William W., Academic Freedom and the First Amendment in the Supreme Court of the United States: An Unhurried Historical Review, Law and Contemporary Problems 53 (Summ. 1990): 79–154.

Weidner, Donald J., Academic Freedom and the Obligation to Earn It, Journal of Law & Education 32 (2003): 445–473.

Weinstein, James, A Brief Introduction to Free Speech Doctrine, Arizona State Law Journal 29 (1997): 461–471.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Garcetti v. Ceballos*, 126 S. Ct. 1951 (2006)
- Connick v. Meyers*, 461 U.S. 138 (1983)
- Pickering v. Board of Education*, 391 U.S. 503 (1968)
- Urofsky v. Gilmore*, 216 F.3d 401 (4th Cir. 2000)

See also Campus Hate Speech Codes; Categorical Approach to Free Speech; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Public Forum Doctrines; Public/Nonpublic Forums Distinction; Public Officials; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992); State Action Doctrine; Teacher Speech in Public Schools; Time, Place, and Manner Rule; Universities and Public Forums; Viewpoint Discrimination in Free Speech Cases

SPEECH AND ITS RELATION TO VIOLENCE

Few problems involving the First Amendment have generated as much dispute as the relationship between speech and violence. May the government punish the advocacy of revolution? What about teaching that revolution is desirable, or even inevitable? May speakers induce others to commit criminal acts against vulnerable minorities or insult others, knowing one will provoke a violent reaction?

Suppose someone contends that the government is corrupt, and the only solution is violent revolution. Does the First Amendment protect the speaker? One might argue that punishing expression of an opinion is never justified, even if inciting words are spoken while standing before an angry crowd carrying weapons, which then riots. This approach has never been followed in the Supreme Court but allows the greatest breathing room for free expression. However, it would allow those who stir angry mobs to violence to escape responsibility for resulting criminal acts.

Alternately, one could punish the speaker, no matter how unlikely the expression will lead to violence. The latter approach maximizes the government's power over all expression, for even innocuous speech might be thought to curry violent thoughts in others. The risk with this latter approach is that the government will use its power to define "violent expression" to repress unpopular speech, and especially to control dissidents.

Over the past eighty-five years the Court has defined tests that have oscillated between these two extremes. The Court's treatment of speech advocating violence has ranged from extremely deferential to governmental fears, under the "bad tendency" test, to the less deferential—and current—Brandenburg approach.

Historical Development: From Clear and Present Danger to 1960s

In the early twentieth century, the Supreme Court allowed the government much leeway to punish unpopular expression. The Court frequently took the position that if the underlying conduct could be forbidden, then advocacy of the conduct could also be forbidden. In Schenck, for example, the Court affirmed the conviction of defendants who been convicted of attempting to disrupt the military draft by distributing leaflets that urged potential draftees to "assert your rights" and referred to the recruiting services as the embodiment of despotism.

Writing for the Court, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., framed the "clear and present danger" test: "The question in every case is whether the words used are used in such circumstances and are of such a nature as to create a clear and present danger that they will bring about the substantive evils that Congress has a right to prevent." Although framed as a "test," the standard allows a great deal of flexibility in application.

The "clear and present danger" standard was used sporadically and inconsistently by the Court until Brandenburg was decided in 1968. Indeed, the same year Schenck was decided, both Holmes and Brandeis dissented from a case that affirmed the conviction of Russian anarchists who published leaflets objecting to the 1918 American invasion of Russia and calling for a general strike. In Holmes' view, the government had failed to prove that the "danger" of violent revolution was imminent or even that the speaker desired such a result. In a stirring passage, Holmes explained why the government should not ordinarily be permitted to punish the expression of opinion:

[W]hen men have realized that time has upset many fighting faiths, they may come to believe even more than they believe the very foundations of their own conduct that the ultimate good desired is better reached by free trade in ideas, that the best test of truth is the power of the thought to get itself accepted in the competition of the market, and that truth is the only ground upon which their wishes safely can be carried out.

A few years later, in Gitlow, the Court rejected Holmes' "clear and present danger" test in a case involving distribution of a manifesto urging general strikes in violation of a "criminal syndicalism" law declaring it a crime to advocate, advise, or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of overthrowing organized government by force or violence. There was no evidence that the tract had any effect on anyone or that its distribution posed any threat whatsoever. Yet, in affirming the defendants' conviction, the Court defined what became known as the "bad tendency" test: "the general provisions of the statute may be constitutionally applied to the specific utterance of the defendant if its natural tendency and probable effect was to bring about the substantive evil which the legislative body might prevent."

The Supreme Court's willingness to defer to legislative judgment regarding the danger of speech advocating violence reached its apex in 1927, in Whitney v. California. In Whitney, the Court affirmed a conviction under California's criminal syndicalism statute. The defendant, a member of the Communist Party, had attended a Party convention of the where other members voted over her opposition to support change through violence.

As Whitney illustrates, one problem with deferring to a legislature's definition of "dangerousness" is that it acts in an ideological way. A legislature will jail even those who promote controversial ideas through the democratic process. As Holmes said, dissenting in Abrams, "[p]ersecution for the expression of opinions seems to me perfectly logical. If you have no doubt of your premises or your power and want a certain result with all your heart you naturally express your wishes in law and sweep away all opposition." Yet, Holmes also argued that such an approach is inconsistent with democratic governance.

In a separate opinion concurring in Whitney, Justice Brandeis objected to the Court's deference to the legislative judgment of danger. He also put teeth to the "clear and present danger" test, emphasizing that abstract "advocacy" of violence short of "incitement" could not be punished. Brandeis also emphasized the importance of requiring proof of imminent harm before the speaker may be restrained. "[E]ven advocacy of [law] violation however reprehensible morally, is not a justification for denying free speech where the advocacy falls short of incitement and there is nothing to indicate that the advocacy would be immediately acted on."

In the 1950s, with the advent of the cold war and the many repressions spawned by McCarthyism, the United States prosecuted the leadership of the Communist Party under the Smith Act, which criminalized advocating the overthrow of the government of the United States by force and violence. In Dennis v. United States, the Supreme Court affirmed the convictions of Party leaders, the crux of the case coming down to the teaching of four volumes of Communist ideology. Seeking to explain the result, a plurality of the Court led by Chief Justice Fred M. Vinson argued that the case must be judged under a “balancing” test—weighing “whether the gravity of the ‘evil’ discounted by its improbability” warrants suppressing the speech and punishing the speaker.

This reformulation of “clear and present danger” meant that any doctrine that taught the desirability of the overthrow of duly constituted government—no matter how remote the possibility—could be criminalized, because it would always be seen as an horrendous threat to the survival of the nation. As Vinson argued, the Government need not “wait until the putsch is about to be executed.”

Several other appeals involving criminal prosecutions under the Smith Act followed Dennis, but the Court became somewhat less deferential to government fears of Communism. In later cases, the Court reinterpreted Dennis to require proof that the defendant had advocated specific violent actions, even if in the future, and not merely the abstract teaching of doctrine. Yet, the Court remained willing to criminalize advocacy of violence. In Scales, a criminal conviction for mere membership in the Communist Party—even in the absence of a realistic risk that any violence would take place—was upheld. As Justice Douglas pointed out in Noto, unless the Court required proof that the advocacy risked imminent violence, the Court in effect was permitting prosecution for mere belief.

Brandenburg* and Current Law

In 1969, the Supreme Court transformed the constitutional understanding of the relationship between speech and violence. In Brandenburg, the Court reversed the conviction of a Ku Klux Klan leader for violating Ohio’s criminal syndicalism law, advocating political change through violence. The leader had urged a march on Washington and suggested that violence might be required to forestall desegregation. A similar criminal syndicalism statute had been upheld in Whitney, and Brandenburg overruled Whitney.

Brandenburg held that advocacy of violence is protected by the First Amendment provided that the advocacy is not directed to inciting others to immediate unlawful action and likely to produce such action. To criminalize such speech, the government must satisfy four requirements: first, that the words used go beyond mere advice or teaching of abstract doctrine, and are understood to incite to action; second, that the speaker intends by his words to incite; third, that the speech is likely to produce imminent lawless action; and fourth, that the words are in fact likely to produce imminent violence.

Cases that have arisen since Brandenburg confirm the new and important direction the Court has taken. In Hess v. Indiana, the police were clearing the streets of participants in an antiwar demonstration when Hess yelled, “we’ll take the fing street later (or again).” Witnesses testified that Hess was facing the crowd, but that his voice, although loud, was no louder than other demonstrators. On appeal to the Supreme Court, Hess’ conviction for disorderly conduct was reversed. The Court evaluated Hess’ words carefully: “At best, the statement could be as counsel for present moderation; at worst it amounted to nothing more than advocacy of illegal action at some indefinite future time.” Thus, because Hess’ advocacy was not directed to producing “imminent lawless action,” Indiana could not criminally punish him.

In Claiborne Hardware, the Court confronted a civil rights case that stemmed from a series of boycotts and pickets in the community of Port Gibson, Mississippi. In 1966, a local branch of the NAACP organized a boycott of white businesses to pressure the businesses and the local government into improving the conditions for African Americans in the community, including eliminating segregation, hiring black police officers, and the local stores to hire more black employees. In speeches, demonstrations, and pickets, many in the community were induced to stop dealing with the merchants. Blacks who continued to do business were identified and solicited to halt. Some were pressured by threats of ostracism. In speeches, the head of the NAACP threatened violence against those who did not comply with the boycott. On some occasions over the seven-year period of the boycott, on a number of occasions, blacks who continued to deal with merchants were made the target of violence.

The state courts imposed damages on the NAACP and organizers of the boycott, including seven years of lost profits. Overturning the damage award, the Court found that the ends sought (desegregation; more jobs for African Americans) were lawful, and most of the means (picketing; boycott; persuasion) were also lawful. That some participants had been persuaded to join the boycott by speech, by the presence of pickets, by identification, or by threats of social ostracism, did not deprive the communications of protection under the First Amendment. “Speech does not lose its protected character . . . simply because it may embarrass others or coerce them into action.”

More difficult were the acts of violence. As to these, the Court held that anyone who committed acts of violence could be punished or made to pay damages their acts had caused. However, the state courts had lumped the violent acts together with speech-protected acts, and the Supreme Court held that was impermissible. When violent conduct occurs in the context of constitutionally protected activity, "precision of regulation" is required. The state courts may award damages against anyone who committed violent acts, but not for the consequences of constitutionally protected acts. Furthermore, the boycott organizers could not be held responsible for others' violent acts absent a showing they specifically authorized or instigated the violence or knew about the violence and had an intent to promote it. The speeches advocating violence could not be made the basis of liability, because whatever acts of violence that occurred were unconnected in time, and punishing such advocacy did not satisfy the Brandenburg test.

Fighting Words, Hostile Audiences, and Threats of Violence

In many of the cases discussed thus far, a speaker is charged with inciting others to violence. But what about contexts in which the speaker insults others, provokes others to fight with the speaker, confronts a hostile audience, or threatens others with violence? The Court has confronted many cases of threatened responsive violence instigated by a speaker, and the issues raised are somewhat different from the advocacy of violence cases.

In the 1940s, the Supreme Court's Chaplinsky decision defined a class of "fighting words" whose utterance the state could punish: "those personally abusive epithets which, when addressed to the ordinary citizen, are, as a matter of common knowledge, inherently likely to provoke violent reaction." The defendant in Chaplinsky was prosecuted for saying to the City Marshal of Rochester that he was a "God damned racketeer and a damned fascist." Note that today those exact words might not be construed as "fighting words"—commonly understood to trigger fisticuffs—but the Court's holding indicates that in 1942, when Chaplinsky was decided, the words were, indeed, inflammatory.

Subsequently, the Court has repeatedly referred to the fighting words doctrine, but has also emphasized that any fighting words statute must be drafted with care so not to include in the definition inflammatory or merely "offensive" speech. In R.A.V., for example, the Court reversed a "fighting words" conviction where the ordinance under which the defendant had been prosecuted discriminated among the class of slurs that warranted condemnation.

A more problematic case arises when a speaker confronts an audience that is hostile to the speaker's ideas. Should the speaker be shut down because of the risk that the audience would commit violent acts? Or, should the audience be controlled, because it, not the speaker, threatens violence? Should the heckler have veto power over speech?

The Supreme Court's approach to the "hostile audience" problem has not always been consistent. In Terminiello, the Court overturned a breach of peace conviction of a defrocked priest who spoke to a large crowd inside an auditorium while hundreds of opponents chanted and screamed outside. The priest denounced Jews and blacks and referred repeatedly to those assembled outside as "scum." The trial judge had instructed the jury that speech violates the statute if it "stirs the public to anger, invites dispute, brings about a condition of unrest or creates a disturbance." In reversing the conviction, Justice Douglas pointed out that a free speech "may indeed best serve its high purpose when it induces a condition of unrest, creates dissatisfaction with conditions as they are, or even stirs people to anger. Speech is often provocative and challenging."

Although the Terminiello case suggested that a speaker has significant leeway in challenging his audience, the Feiner case, decided two years later, seemed to contradict Douglas' ringing endorsement of the importance of protecting speech that "stirs the public to anger." In Feiner, a corner soapbox speaker had attracted a crowd by urging blacks to "rise up in arms and fight for equal rights." He also described various public officials as "bums," and the American Legion as "Nazi Gestapo." The crowd was mixed in their response, and there was some pushing and shoving. A police officer later described the crowd as "stirred up." One onlooker told an officer that if they didn't stop the speaker, he would. The officers thereupon asked Feiner to stop speaking, and when he refused, they arrested him. The Supreme Court upheld Feiner's conviction, the majority arguing that he had passed the bounds of persuasion and had "undertake[n] incitement to riot." The Terminiello and Feiner cases are difficult to square.

The fighting words and the hostile audience reaction cases have required the Court to address the relationship between a vociferous speaker and an auditor who potentially threatens violence. In contrast, the Court has also considered threats of violence cases that potentially inflict injury on a victim but do not necessarily risk responsive violence. In Watts v. United States, the Court considered an interpretation of the statute making it a crime to threaten the life of the president. After a public rally against the Vietnam War, a demonstrator was convicted of making such a “threat” when he said, “If they ever make me carry a rifle the first man I want to get in my sights is L.B.J They are not going to make me kill my black brothers.” The Supreme Court reversed Watts’ conviction, holding that his only offense was a “kind of very crude offensive method of stating a political opposition to the President.”

A different type of case is presented where a defendant truly “threatens” another person with violence. In such cases, the state is attempting to protect victims from the fear of violence and to forestall threatened violence. In Virginia v. Black, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a Virginia statute banning cross burning undertaken with “an intent to intimidate a person or group of persons.” The decades-long history of violence preceded by Klan-inspired cross-burning supported the determination that burning a cross as a mechanism of intimidation is a particularly virulent threat to one’s safety.

Although the Court’s current direction in addressing the relationship between speech and violence is more speech protective than the approach followed before the 1960s, a better test of that proposition will come when speech that “threatens” violence to widely held, core social values comes to the Court. The Smith Act prosecutions occurred during an era of deep mistrust of Communism. Perhaps tomorrow’s “threat” will arise from vitriolic speakers who stoke the fire of disenchanted groups. The central question remains: to what extent is the society willing to tolerate speech that has the potential of provoking violence?

JOHN T. NOCKLEBY

References and Further Reading

- Blasi, Vincent, The Pathological Perspective and the First Amendment, Columbia Law Review 85 (1985): 449.
 Nockleby, John T., Hate Speech in Context, Buffalo Law Review 42 (1994): 653–713.
 Pope, The Three-Systems Ladder of First Amendment Values: Two Rungs and a Black Hole, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 11 (1984): 189.
 Rabban, David M. Free Speech In Its Forgotten Years Cambridge, U.K.: Cambridge University Press, 1997.
 Stone, Geoffrey R., Content Regulation and the First Amendment, William and Mary Law Review 25 (1983): 189.
 Tribe, Laurence H. American Constitutional Law. 2nd ed. Mineola, NY: Foundation, 1988.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abrams v. United States*, 250 U.S. 616 (1919)
Bachellar v. Maryland, 397 U.S. 564, 567 (1970)
Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942)
Cohen v. California, 403 U.S. 15 (1971)

- Cox v. Louisiana*, 379 U.S. 559 (1965)
Dennis Edwards v. South Carolina, 372 U.S. 229 (1963)
Feiner v. New York, 340 U.S. 315 (1951)
Forsyth County v. Nationalist Movement, 505 U.S. 123, 137 (1992)
Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925)
Gregory v. City of Chicago, 394 U.S. 111 (1969)
Hague v. CIO, 307 U.S. 496 (1939)
Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973)
NAACP v. Claiborne Hardware Co., 458 U.S. 886 (1982)
Noto v. United States, 367 U.S. 290 (1961)
R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992)
Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961)
Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919)
Terminiello v. City of Chicago, 337 U.S. 1 (1949)
Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003)
Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927)
Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 298 (1957)

See also Abortion Protest Cases; Anti-Anarchy and Anti-Syndicalism Acts; Bad Tendency Test; Balancing Approach to Free Speech; Brandenburg Incitement Test; Brandenburg v. Ohio, 395 U.S. 444 (1969); Captive Audiences and Free Speech; Chaplinsky v. New Hampshire, 315 U.S. 568 (1942); Clear and Present Danger Test; Communism and the Cold War; Communist Party; Content-Based Regulation of Speech; Content-Neutral Regulation of Speech; Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559 (1965); Cross-Burning, Extremist Groups and Civil Liberties; Fighting Words and Free Speech; Freedom of Access to Clinic Entrances (FACE) Act, 108 Stat. 694 (1994); Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Gitlow v. New York, 268 U.S. 652 (1925); Hague v. C.I.O., 307 U.S. 496 (1939); Hate Speech; Heckler’s Veto Problem in Free Speech; Hess v. Indiana, 414 U.S. 105 (1973); Holmes; Oliver Wendell, Jr.; Ku Klux Klan; National Security and Freedom of Speech; R.A.V. v. City of St. Paul, 505 U.S. 377 (1992); Red Scare of the Early 1920s; Scales v. United States, 367 U.S. 203 (1961); Schenck v. United States, 249 U.S. 47 (1919); Smith Act; Speech versus Conduct Distinction; Terrorism and Civil Liberties; Threats and Free Speech; Time, Place, and Manner Rule; Traditional Public Forums; Vinson Court; Vinson Fred Moore; Virginia v. Black, 538 U.S. 343 (2003); Watts v. United States, 394 U.S. 705 (1969); Whitney v. California, 274 U.S. 357 (1927); World War I, Civil Liberties in; Yates v. United States, 354 U.S. 343 (2003)

SPEECH OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

For many years, government employment was considered a privilege rather than a right, and, as a result, the government could place restrictions on employee speech that would be unconstitutional if applied to citizens. An oft-quoted description of this rule is that offered by Justice Holmes in McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford: “The petitioner may have a constitutional right to talk politics but he has no constitutional right to be a policeman.” This doctrine began to erode in the 1950s and by 1967, the Court in Keyishian v. Board of Regents could firmly state that the doctrine allowing public employers to condition employment on waiver of constitutional rights had been rejected. Accordingly, public employees retain their First Amendment rights.

Nevertheless, the government as an employer has an interest in regulating employee speech that is greater than its interest in regulating citizen speech. The government must be able to control employee speech to ensure effective and efficient delivery of government services. Thus the task becomes determining which governmental restrictions on employee speech are permissible to serve the governmental purposes. The Supreme Court has attempted, with mixed success, to provide the government with traditional employer rights without unduly restricting employee First Amendment rights.

Protected Speech

To warrant First Amendment protection, employee speech must relate to a matter of public concern. Determining what is a matter of public concern has proven to be a difficult task for the courts. The speech must relate to issues of concern to the community and not to personal grievances of the employee or matters of internal office policy. To determine whether speech is protected courts must look to the content, form, and context of the speech. The speech need not relate to the employee’s job duties or the functioning of the government to be protected, although the Supreme Court has noted that government employees may be in a position to contribute importantly to public debate by virtue of the knowledge and information they possess.

Government Regulation Burdening Employee Speech

When government regulation broadly burdens the speech of government employees, the government must show that the interests of potential audiences for government employee speech and the free speech interests of the employees are outweighed by the impact of the speech on the operation of the government. Applying this test, the Supreme Court struck down a federal statute that barred federal employees from accepting honoraria for speeches or articles in U.S. v. National Treasury Employees Union. The Court rejected the government’s argument that the ban was necessary for government efficiency, finding it too broad to constitute a reasonable response to a legitimate concern about misuse of power. The court noted particularly that the ban applied even where the speech was unrelated to the employee’s service.

Employee Discipline Based on Speech

When the issue involves discipline of an individual employee for speech, the government’s burden of justification is less onerous. The Court in Pickering v. Board of Education held that the employee’s free speech rights must be balanced against the employer’s interest in “promoting the efficiency of the public services it performs” to determine whether an employer’s discipline of an employee for speech violates the constitution. The Court noted the importance of allowing government employees who have informed opinions on matters of public concern to speak without fear of employer retaliation. Employees can even make public statements critical of their superiors so long as they are not knowingly false or recklessly made and do not interfere substantially with the employee’s job performance or the employer’s operations. Because the test is generally applied after employee discipline for speech, the court will assess the level of disruption or threat of disruption caused by the employee’s speech, that is, did it interfere with his or her job performance or that of others, hamper employee discipline, or damage personal relationships in the workplace necessary to efficient functioning of the operation. If the damage or potential damage is sufficiently severe, discipline will be upheld despite the protected nature of the speech.

When the government claims that the employee discipline was based on reasons other than speech, the employee must show that the protected speech was a motivating factor in the employer’s decision to discipline, Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle. If the employee proves that the speech motivated the employer, the employer can avoid liability by showing that it would have disciplined the employee for legitimate reasons even if the employee had not engaged in the protected speech.

Independent Contractors

These principles for determining the legality of government retaliation for employee speech have been applied to termination of independent contractors as well, Board of County Comm'rs v. Umbehr.

Government Employees and Political Activity

Although political speech has a high value under the First Amendment, restrictions on the political participation of government employees have been found constitutionally permissible. The federal Hatch Act, which in its earlier iterations barred virtually all federal employees from engaging in political management or political campaigns, survived constitutional challenge in United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers. Accordingly, similar restrictions by state and local governments are also constitutional. The Hatch Act does not bar employees from expressing opinions on political subjects and candidates, however. In addition, in 1993, the Hatch Act was revised to permit most federal employees to participate in political campaigns, with specified exceptions. However, with very limited exceptions, federal employees are still barred from running for partisan political office, campaigning while on duty, and soliciting political contributions.

Government employees are free to join political parties and cannot be discriminated against on the basis of their political affiliation unless they serve in high-level positions where party affiliation is a legitimate job qualification, Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois. Elected politicians should be able to appoint high-level advisers and officials that agree with their policy agendas, but employees without such responsibilities are free to choose their party affiliation without fear of retribution from their employer.

In addition, government employees cannot be forced to subsidize political speech with which they disagree, either through union dues, Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, or direct political contributions, Acevedo-Delgado v. Rivera.

ANN C. HODGES

References and Further Reading

- Deskbook Encyclopedia of Public Employment Law*. Malvern, PA: Center for Education and Employment Law (2005).
- Hudson, David L., Jr.. Balancing Act: Public Employees and Free Speech, First Amendment Center (2002).

Smolla, Rodney A. Smolla and Nimmer on Freedom of Speech. Vol. 2, Eagan, MN: Thomson/West, 2005.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Abood v. Detroit Board of Education*, 431 U.S. 209 (1977)
Acevedo-Delgado v. Rivera, 292 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. 2002)
Board of County Comm'rs v. Umbehr, 518 U.S. 668 (1996)
 Hatch Act, 5 U.S.C. Section 7321, et seq
Keyishian v. Board of Regents, 385 U.S. 589 (1967)
McAuliffe v. Mayor of New Bedford, 155 Mass. 216 (1892)
Mt. Healthy City School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977)
Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968)
Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)
United States Civil Service Commission v. National Association of Letter Carriers, 413 U.S. 538 (1973)
U.S. v. National Treasury Employees Union, 513 U.S. 454 (1995)

See also Abood v. Detroit Board of Education, 431 U.S. 209 (1977); Matters of Public Concern Standard in Free Speech Cases; Mt. Healthy School District Board of Education v. Doyle, 429 U.S. 274 (1977); Pickering v. Board of Education, 391 U.S. 563 (1968); Political Patronage and First Amendment; Rutan v. Republican Party of Illinois, 497 U.S. 62 (1990)

SPEECH VERSUS CONDUCT DISTINCTION

Perhaps one of the most controversial issues is whether the part of the First Amendment that protects free speech should ever protect conduct. In other words, can conduct be a form of speech for First Amendment purposes? A typical model of free speech protection unfolds this way: I stand on my soapbox in the park and share with the world my opinion on a contentious topic of the day. A police officer walking by might like to poke me with his nightstick and encourage me to move on. But the First Amendment can be interpreted as preventing a public authority from interfering with my reasonable use of public space to air my views.

Now consider my using the same soapbox but to stand on while I light and then burn an American flag. One way of distinguishing this case from the previous one is to point out that far more people may be offended by my burning the flag than would be by my views on any given subject, even if shouted at the top of my lungs. Or maybe the key should be the difference between speech and conduct—in the first instance it was “only” speech in which I was engaged, whereas in the second, I was not speaking at all but, instead, doing something physical and engaging in a form of conduct highly repugnant to many citizens walking by, watching me on the evening news, and so forth.

In one (actually two) of the Supreme Court's most notorious decisions, the justices have ruled that neither state government (Texas v. Johnson) nor the federal government (U.S. v. Eichman) can criminalize flag desecration without violating the free speech clause of the First Amendment. What was protected by the Constitution in the state case was Joey Johnson's "expressive speech," his act of burning the flag. When Congress, in response to the Court's ruling, passed a federal law authorizing punishment of flag burners it was promptly overruled by the Court as well.

So some forms of conduct constitute acts of expression and even without conventional speech being part of the act, or conduct, may be protected speech. Perhaps the most important question, however, is not what forms of conduct may take on the appearance, or at least categorization, of speech but, more precisely, what forms of conduct may constitute First Amendment-protected speech—in other words, conduct that the courts believe should be given legal protection under the First Amendment free speech clause.

The Vietnam War-era case, U.S. v. O'Brien, 391 U.S. 367 (1968), provides a useful counterpoint to the flag burning cases. O'Brien and several comrades, in 1966, burned their draft cards—Selective Service registration certificates—on the steps of the South Boston Courthouse. Their act was witnessed by a large group of people who, fortunately for O'Brien, included FBI agents who rushed him to safety when attacked by several violent onlookers. O'Brien was prosecuted and convicted of transgressing the Universal Military Training and Services Act of 1948, Section 462(b)(3), amended by Congress in 1966 to make it an offense if anyone "forges, alters, knowingly destroys, knowingly mutilates, or in any manner changes" a draft card. The law was amended because of the Vietnam War, and O'Brien publicly burned his draft card because of the Vietnam War. He knowingly destroyed his registration certificate as a means of expressing his view that America's war in Southeast Asia was wrong.

Like Johnson and Eichman, O'Brien engaged in an act of speech—political speech—for the purpose of communicating an unpopular but sincere political opinion. If the First Amendment protects one's right to express political views and the language of the Constitution's free speech clause is interpreted to include forms of expressive conduct as speech, then (in theory) O'Brien should receive as much constitutional protection as Johnson and Eichman. Although O'Brien's conduct on the courthouse steps seemed to anger some in the crowd, it could hardly be said that draft card burning is any more offensive than U.S. flag burning, even in time of war when draft laws are in effect.

But O'Brien's speech was not protected by the Constitution, or so said the Supreme Court. Why? Because the government had a legitimate, non-speech-related reason for criminalizing his behavior. True, O'Brien burned his card to express an opinion. True, even though O'Brien's opinion was expressed through conduct, some forms of conduct can be classified as speech. The Court has been willing to use the First Amendment to protect speech even, on occasion, when that speech comes in the form of expressive conduct—so long as it is designed to communicate the same kind of point of view as a political tract or newspaper headline or stump speech from the courthouse steps.

But O'Brien's Selective Service certificate burning was not only that. It also violated a law that was not designed to interfere with free speech but, rather, to help the government keep track of those young men it would like to send abroad to fight. Some federal legislators may have been pleased that in doing their constitutionally allotted work (raising an army for the national defense, in this instance) they made draft card burning by antiwar critics like O'Brien a little more costly, a little more painful. But that did not change the fact that the law criminalizing flag burning had no legitimate government interest or purpose behind it. Laws against flag burning have as their sole purpose the prohibition of a particularly repellant form of political speech. In the end, the distinction between speech and conduct may not be as crucial as that between speech/conduct violating laws solely designed to prohibit speech and speech/conduct violating laws designed to secure a constitutionally legitimate governmental aim.

ANTHONY CHASE

SPEEDY TRIAL

Although the Sixth Amendment right to a speedy trial is considered to be a fundamental right that applies in both federal and state courts, there are relatively few cases dealing with the topic. It was not until 1972, in the leading case of Barker v. Wingo, that the Supreme Court first attempted to establish the standards with which to judge speedy trial claims. An analysis of the right to speedy trial must begin with an analysis of this decision.

In Barker the Court pointed out several features of this right that distinguish it from the other procedural rights. First, society's interest in bringing criminal cases to trial is distinct from the defendant's interests. Delay enhances a defendant's bargaining position and for a defendant on pretrial release, the delay increases the risk of reoffending. Second, being denied a speedy trial does not necessarily disadvantage the defendant. It will benefit the defendant when the delay undermines the state's case as, for example, when a prosecution witness dies, making it a common defense tactic. Third, the speedy trial right is more vague than other procedural rights in the sense that it is "impossible to determine with precision" when it has been violated. Finally, compared with other procedural violations, such as the denial of right to counsel where the remedy would be a new trial, the only possible remedy for a violation—dismissal of the criminal charges—is quite drastic.

The Court considered, but rejected, two competing approaches. Establishing a specific period of time, such as six months, was rejected as a constitutional standard, because the right cannot be quantified, although the Court noted that this rule-making approach is appropriate for legislatures and state courts. At the same time, the Court rejected a "demand waiver" approach in which the defendant was obligated to demand a trial and failure to do so constitutes a waiver of the delay. The Court was unwilling to permit the waiver of a fundamental right through inaction. Moreover, inasmuch as a speedy trial is the government's responsibility, it was inappropriate to put on the defendant the entire burden of demanding one. Having rejected these approaches, the Court went on to establish a balancing test.

In each case the Court should consider four factors, none of which is a necessary or sufficient condition to finding a speedy trial violation. The first factor is the length of delay. The length of time that must pass before the delay is considered problematic depends on the circumstances, including the nature of the crime. The more complex a case is the more delay can be expected. The second factor is the reason for the delay. The prosecutor's intentional delay for the purpose of pressuring a defendant not on pretrial release to plead guilty, for example, should weigh heavily against the state. A more neutral reason such as crowded court dockets should be given less weight, but in light of the government's responsibility to provide a speedy trial, should still be considered. Some reasons, such as the illness of a necessary witness should excuse some amount of delay. Although the Court decided not to make a speedy trial violation depend solely on whether the defendant made a demand for a trial, the Court found that a demand was sufficiently relevant to make it the third factor. The defendant's demand for a trial should weigh heavily in favor of finding a speedy trial violation. The failure to demand a trial will make it difficult for a defendant to successfully claim a speedy trial violation. The fourth factor is the matter of prejudice or harm to the defendant that results from any delay. The most serious prejudice is found in cases where the delay undermines the defendant's case. But it is also found where the defendant is incarcerated during the delay and where mental and emotional stress and other problems result from the delay.

In applying the balancing test to the facts of the Barker case the Court found that the delay was substantial: more than five years elapsed between Barker's arrest and trial. However, only a small portion of this delay could be classified as justifiable. Balanced against the substantial delay and its problematic justification, the Court found two factors, prejudice and demand, weighed more heavily in the government's favor. Barker was incarcerated for ten months, only small portion of the five-year period, and there was no evidence that the delay otherwise resulted in prejudice. Most important was the fact that Barker's lawyer failed to demand a trial until very late in the period, after the government moved for eleven continuances. This suggested that Barker hoped to gain from the delay. In ruling against Barker the Court held that in cases such as this, where the defendant's failure to demand a trial indicates that he did not want one, violation of the speedy trial right would be found only in extraordinary circumstances, something that did not exist in this case.

In the relatively few speedy trial cases decided subsequent to Barker, the Court has applied the same balancing test. The only significant modification is found in the 1992 case of Doggett v. United States. In this case, which involved a delay of more than eight years between indictment and arrest, the Court held that with a lengthy delay prejudice might be presumed.

In light of the uncertainties with applying the balancing test, most jurisdictions have enacted speedy trial statutes to address the problem of pretrial delay. Typically, these statutes specify that unless the trial must begin within a specified period of time, 180 days, for example, from arrest for formal charges, the criminal charges must be dismissed. The time period set out in these statutes offers the precision that the Barker test lacks, but in practice these statutes do not provide most protection for defendants because typically they include an array of excuses for the delay. If the delay is excused under the statute, the defendant's only recourse is to make a speedy trial claim under Barker.

STEVEN B. DOW

References and Further Reading

- Allen, Darren, Note: The Constitutional Floor Doctrine and the Right to a Speedy Trial, Campbell Law Review 26 (2004): 101–122.
- Elmore, Christopher S, Note: Glover v. State: A Misinterpretation and Misapplication of the Barker Speedy Trial Balancing Test Results in the Weakening of a Criminal Defendant's Right to a Prompt Trial, Maryland Law Review 62 (2003): 573–598.
- LaFave, Wayne R, Jerold H. Israel, and Nancy J. King. Criminal Procedure. 4th ed. St. Paul: Thomson/West, 2004.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Barker v. Wingo*, 407 U.S. 514 (1972)
- Doggett v. United States*, 505 U.S. 647 (1992)
- Klopper v. North Carolina*, 386 U.S. 213 (1967).
- United States Constitution, Amendment VI

See also Bill of Rights: Structure

SPYING ON CITIZENS

The United States government has long spied on its own citizens. Since World War I, multiple government agencies have collected information on citizens through secretive means. The methods have evolved over time, often incorporating newly developed technologies; however, a singular pattern has emerged in which governmental surveillance, sometimes authorized directly by the president, has expanded during times of perceived danger. Only after the discovery of large-scale operations has Congress placed restrictions on the powers of executive agencies to spy on American citizens, while presidents have continued to authorize new expansions of surveillance.

During World War I, Attorney General Thomas Gregory appealed to the public for information on disloyalty. The Justice Department received a flood of reports and volunteer organizations, such as the American Protective League and the Boy Spies of America, were formed to encourage citizen surveillance. The Federal Bureau of Investigation (FBI) first became involved in surveillance after the Bolshevik revolution. Attorney General A. Mitchell Palmer instructed J. Edgar Hoover to create an index tracking radicals. Hoover's list of more than 200,000 suspected radicals was used during the "Palmer raids" in which thousands of leftists were arrested, with more than 3,000 deported. However, in 1924, Attorney General Harlan Fiske Stone ordered the FBI to cease investigating individuals because of their political activities. Stone's order was reversed by President Franklin Roosevelt in a secret 1936 directive. The FBI began collecting information on both communists and fascists using undercover agents and informants with the aim of identifying individuals who should be detained to prevent espionage during the coming World War II.

The FBI's interest in Communists only intensified after World War II. In 1954, Attorney General Brownell provided the FBI with broad authorization to use microphones to spy on possible foreign agents, saboteurs, and subversives. Operating without warrants, the FBI, along with the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), also opened and photographed hundreds of thousands of items of personal mail moving within the United States in twelve different programs conducted between 1940 and 1973. Illegal FBI searches, surveillance, and wiretapping were widespread, targeting the Party, other organizations, and individuals. The FBI often did not obtain warrants, even where obtainable, because its primary objective was the development of intelligence about subversive groups and individuals rather than criminal trials.

The FBI also collected intelligence on suspected communists from former communists, many of whom were on the government payroll, and dispatched undercover agents and paid informers to infiltrate Party meetings. COINTELPRO, an acronym for Counter Intelligence Program, began in 1956 with a focus on the Communist Party and combined surveillance with tactics intended to disrupt target organizations by spreading misinformation, provoking illegal acts, and sowing distrust among members. COINTELPRO was later expanded to target groups as diverse as the Ku Klux Klan, the Socialist Workers Party, Students for a Democratic Society (SDS), and the Black Panther Party. One operation placed Martin Luther King, Jr., under close surveillance on the justification that he was influenced by several alleged communists in his organization. King's home and office telephones were wiretapped, and the FBI placed microphones in King's hotel and motel rooms. Tapes of King's encounters with female admirers were prepared for delivery to King's wife, and tapes of his discussions with advisers were sent to his office to create paranoia. COINTELPRO was ended in 1971 after a burglary at an FBI office revealed many of its operations.

The C.I.A. and the U.S. Army also conducted domestic surveillance during the Vietnam War. The CIA's most extensive effort, entitled CHAOS, ran from 1967 to 1974; it compiled and analyzed information regarding foreign influence on American protest movements, including, but not limited to, the Black Power and anti-war movements. CHAOS also monitored the overseas movements of many Americans at the request of the FBI. In Project MERRIMAC, CIA agents infiltrated Washington area peace and black activist groups, while Project RESISTANCE compiled information about radical groups around the country. Both programs had stated purpose of identifying threats to CIA installations and activities.

The U.S. Army began intelligence activities in the South in 1963, concerned that it would be asked to calm civil unrest in the region. Later, the Army expanded its intelligence operations to urban areas where military force might be required to end riots. By the late 1960s, Army intelligence had penetrated many major protest demonstrations and dissident groups in virtually every American city, placing an estimated 100,000 individuals under surveillance. The Army's intelligence reports were sometimes distributed to federal and local law enforcement agencies until 1971, when press reports exposed the program, leading to a congressional investigation.

The modern legal framework for domestic surveillance began in 1967, when the Supreme Court found that a warrant was needed for wiretaps in Katz v. United States. In 1968, Congress passed the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, which prohibited domestic eavesdropping without a warrant while recognizing the "constitutional power of the President" to engage in warrantless surveillance of foreign sources and for national security purposes. In United States v. United States District Court (1972), the Supreme Court found that the Fourth Amendment required a warrant for all searches, including electronic surveillance, performed for domestic intelligence purposes. The Privacy Act, passed in 1974, prohibited all federal agencies, including the military, from maintaining records regarding individuals' political and free speech activities.

In 1974, Seymour Hersh of the New York Times published a lengthy article detailing the CIA's collection information on U.S. citizens' political activities and covert operations abroad. Sensitized by the Watergate scandal, which had begun with a White House-authorized illegal search of Democratic Party headquarters, the Senate formed the Select Committee to Study Governmental Operations with Respect to Intelligence Activities, better known as the Church Committee after its chairman, Frank Church of Idaho. Holding hearings in 1975 and 1976, the Church Committee published fourteen lengthy reports covering a broad array of activities by intelligence agencies both within the United States and abroad including assassinations of foreign leaders.

In response to the Church Committee, President Ford ordered the CIA to cease surveillance of American's domestic activities and prohibited National Security Agency interceptions of communications beginning or ending in the United States. Ford's attorney general, Edward Levi, instituted guidelines restricting FBI investigations to criminal conduct and specifically prohibiting the agency from monitoring organizations or individuals' political activities. In 1978, Congress passed the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, or FISA. FISA created a special court which, operating in secret, would hear government petitions for warrants to engage in surveillance against foreign governments or their agents within the United States; a special appellate court would also hear any appeals when warrants were denied. Those warrants do not have to show "probable cause" that a crime is being committed but rather that the target is the agent of a foreign power. FISA closed the loophole for, under the 1968 Crime Control Act, allowing for presidential discretion to allow domestic intelligence operations without warrants.

After the terrorist attacks of September 11, 2001, President George W. Bush and the Congress moved to expand legal authority for surveillance. The USA PATRIOT Act (2001) eliminating old barriers between information gleaned from domestic and foreign intelligence operations under the original FISA statute by allowing FISA warrants in cases where foreign intelligence is not the primary purpose, so long as there is some relationship to foreign intelligence, or where the target is a nonresident alien. Attorney General John Ashcroft also rescinded the Levi guidelines that had prohibited FBI investigation of political activities.

Since the 2001 attacks, government agencies' attempts to use computer algorithms to search through multiple databases for patterns of suspicious behavior have drawn protest. The technique, also called "data mining," reverses the usual presumptions for searches under the Fourth Amendment, looking through large data set patterns that might incriminate otherwise unsuspected individuals. The Defense Department envisioned one such program, named Total Information Awareness or TIA, which would have used both government databases and many of the large commercial databases, such as credit histories and mailing lists. Both the program's location in the military and its seeming comprehensiveness alarmed many Americans, and Congress prohibited any further spending in 2003. Another program, the Multi-State Anti-Terrorism Information Exchange, or MATRIX, was funded by the federal departments of Justice and Homeland Security but was led by the Florida Department of Law Enforcement. The project envisioned the pooling of the collective databases held by state law enforcement agencies for purposes of identifying patterns of criminal activity. Although it was officially limited to criminal investigative purposes and only used already available government databases, MATRIX became controversial when it received publicity in 2003. Officials in participating states withdrew from the program, and MATRIX was officially terminated in 2005.

The Bush administration has also encouraged Americans to report on each other. In 2002, Attorney General Ashcroft proposed a Terrorism Information and Prevention System (TIPS) that would train gas and electric meter readers, mail carriers, cab drivers, as well as private citizens to identify suspicious behavior and report it to the authorities. TIPS was abandoned after congressional reaction. A Pentagon office, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, or CIFA, has continued to collect information from civilians and military personnel who suspect others to be potential terrorists. CIFA's system grew from an Air Force program known as "Eagle Eyes" that recruited military personnel, family members, military contractors, and community groups to report suspicious activity near Air Force bases.

In December 2005, the New York Times reported on a secret Bush administration program that had used the National Security Agency (NSA) to eavesdrop on communications between individuals in the United States and foreign countries as part of the War on Terrorism. Part of the Defense Department, the NSA's operations, had been explicitly limited to foreign surveillance only. The Bush administration defended the operation as necessary and claimed two legal justifications.

The first justification was the president's constitutional authority as commander-in-chief and obligation to defend the nation from enemy attack. This justification is problematic given Congress's ability to establish law and its purposeful limitation of executive power in the 1968 Crime Control Act and FISA. However, language in the only published appellate opinion by the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court of Review, In re Sealed Case (2002), speaks of an assumption that the president has "inherent authority to conduct warrantless searches to obtain foreign intelligence information."

The second justification was drawn from congressional passage of the Authorization for Use of Military Force (AUMF) (2001) that preceded U.S. operations in Afghanistan. The AUMF included language that empowered the president to "use all necessary and appropriate force" against terrorists and their sponsors. The administration's broad interpretation of the AUMF has not been shared by the Supreme Court. In Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), a case involving indefinite military detention of a U.S. citizen without legal representation, the Supreme Court considered the administration's argument that the AUMF authorized such detentions and declared that a "state of war is not a blank check for the President."

Congressional investigations and legal challenges to the Bush surveillance program were pending at the time this article went to press.

DANIEL LEVIN

References and Further Reading

- Bazan, Elizabeth B., and Jennifer K. Elsea. Presidential Authority to Conduct Warrantless Electronic Surveillance to Gather Foreign Intelligence Information. Washington, D.C.: Congressional Research Service, 2006.
- Theoharis, Athan. Spying on Americans: Political Surveillance from Hoover to the Huston Plan. Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1978.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Authorization for Use of Military Force, 115 Stat. 224 (2001)
- Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act, 92 Stat. 1796 (1978)
- Hamdi v. Rumsfeld*, 542 U.S. 507 (2004)
- In re Sealed Case*, 310 F.3d 717 (U.S. Foreign Intell. Surveillance Ct. Rev. 2002)
- Katz v. United States*, 389 U.S. 347 (1967)
- Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act, 82 Stat. 211 (1968)
- Privacy Act, 88 Stat. 1896 (1974)
- United States v. United States District Court*, 407 U.S. 297 (1972)

STANDING IN FREE SPEECH CASES

Article III of the Constitution limits the jurisdiction of federal courts to "cases and controversies." Because of this limit, a litigant must have standing to challenge government conduct. That is, the litigant must show how government conduct directly harms him or her (Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife). Excluding some narrow conceptions, a plaintiff may not litigate the interests of parties not before the court. Justice White wrote in Broadrick v. Oklahoma: "Embedded in the traditional rules governing constitutional adjudication is the principle that a person to whom a statute may constitutionally be applied will not be heard to challenge that statute on the ground that it may conceivably be applied unconstitutionally to others, in other situations not before the Court. A closely related principle is that constitutional rights are personal and may not be asserted vicariously."

Thus, when a person raises a constitutional objection to some law, he may raise it only as it applies to him or her. There is an important exception to this rule.

In free speech cases, a party may seek to vindicate the rights of parties not before the court: that is, the litigant has third-party standing. Even if the law could be constitutionally applied to the party before the court, the law may nonetheless be struck down if it could be unconstitutionally applied to others. The rationale for the free speech exception is that speech might be chilled, and free speech is delicate and needs breathing room. In Broadrick v. Oklahoma, Justice White wrote “that facial overbreadth adjudication is an exception to our traditional rules of practice.”

MICHAEL C. CERNOVICH

Cases and Statutes Cited

Broadrick v. Oklahoma, 413 U.S. 601, 610 (1973)

Lujan v. Defenders of Wildlife, 504 U.S. 555 (1992)

See also Overbreadth Doctrine; Vagueness Doctrine

STANLEY v. GEORGIA, 394 U.S. 557 (1969)

The First Amendment protects freedom of speech, yet the Supreme Court has stated in cases such as in Miller v. California and Roth v. United States that obscenity and obscene materials are not speech and therefore may be banned and made illegal. However, may the government make the mere possession of obscenity in the privacy of one’s own home illegal? In Stanley v. Georgia, the Court said no.

In general, the First Amendment guarantees that neither Congress nor state and local governments via the Fourteenth Amendment may infringe or place limits on free speech. Yet what free speech is exactly is not always clear. Over time, the Court has sought to clarify what types of speech the Constitution protects, with political utterances and statements given the most protection, and other types of communication, such as commercial advertising, given less. Yet the Supreme Court has also declared that some types of communication are not protected by the First Amendment, including blackmail, extortion, and, most importantly, obscene materials. Although there is some disagreement regarding exactly what constitutes obscenity, cases such as Miller v. California and Roth v. United States have both outlined ways to determine what is obscene and declared that such material is not protected under the First Amendment.

At the same time that the Constitution has exempted obscenity from First Amendment protection, the Court has also stated that the right to privacy is a fundamental right. In cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut and Mapp v. Ohio, the Court has declared, as Justice Louis Brandeis once stated in Olmstead v. United States, that we have a “right to be left alone.” How can this constitutional right to be left alone be reconciled with the criminalization of obscenity?

In Stanley v. Georgia, Robert Stanley’s house was subject to a valid search, with a warrant having been issued to look for evidence of illegal bookmaking. During the search, police discovered three reels of films that they believed to be obscene. He was charged with violation of a state law making it illegal to possess obscene materials. Stanley challenged the law, claiming that its application to the private possession of obscene materials violated his First Amendment rights. The Supreme Court agreed.

Writing for the majority in a nine-to-zero decision, Justice Thurgood Marshall first noted that past decisions made it clear that obscenity was not protected under the First Amendment. Yet citing cases such as Griswold v. Connecticut, which had upheld the right of married couples to receive information about birth control, he also stated that individuals have a constitutional right to receive information and ideas, regardless of their social worth or value. In addition, the Court also declared that the Constitution protects a right to privacy in one’s home. Together then, the right to receive information and the right to privacy outweighed any interest the state of Georgia had in making the private possession in one’s home of obscenity illegal.

The Court rejected arguments by the state that obscenity corrupts individuals, asserting that this claim is nothing more than arguing that the government has the right to control the moral content of what people think. For Marshall, the First Amendment unambiguously protects the right of individuals to think what they want, regardless of its value. Finally, the Court also rejected claims that the state could prosecute the private possession of obscenity on the claim that it leads to sexual violence or crimes. Marshall pointed out that there was no proof for this claim and that if it does lead to sex crimes, then criminal punishment was the solution.

Stanley v. Georgia was an important decision rejecting censorship and affirming the right to privacy in the home. However, the decision was limited in future application. In Bowers v. Hardwick, the Court upheld a Georgia law that criminalized sodomy among consenting adults of the same sex that takes place in the home, although that decision was overruled in Lawrence v. Texas. However, in Osborne v. Ohio, the Court ruled that the mere private possession of child pornography in the home was not protected under Stanley.

DAVID SCHULTZ

References and Further Reading

Hentoff, Nat. Free Speech for Me—But Not for Thee. New York: Harper Perennial, 1993.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Bowers v. Hardwick, 478 U.S. 186 (1986)
Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
Lawrence v. Texas, 539 U.S. 558 (2003)
Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)
Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973)
Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928)
Roth v. United States, 354 U.S. 476 (1957)

See also Freedom of Speech: Modern Period (1917–Present); Griswold v. Connecticut, 381 U.S. 479 (1965); Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973); Obscenity; Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928); Osbourne v. Ohio, 495 U.S. 103 (1990); Right of Privacy

STANTON, ELIZABETH CADY (1815–1902)

Elizabeth Cady Stanton was the chief feminist and legal philosopher of the nineteenth-century women's movement. Her work catalyzed the demand for civil, political, and social rights for women. Although best known today for her work on behalf of women's suffrage, Stanton advanced a broad platform of civil liberties for women as individuals and citizens, which she argued were distinct from their incidental relations of wife and mother. She sought equal rights for women in marriage and divorce, employment, and education. In addition, she advocated for the reciprocal obligations of citizenship for women, seeking the right of women to sit on juries and to own the marital property for which they were taxed. The vote, for Stanton, was simply one mechanism to obtain a voice for women with which to alter the existing legal and social structure.

Stanton's holistic approach to legal and social liberties grew out of her own experiences. Born on November 12, 1815, in Johnstown, New York, Stanton was the daughter of lawyer and jurist Daniel Cady. Under the tutelage of her father and the law apprentices he trained, Stanton obtained a de facto legal education. In her father's law office, she experienced the injustices of women clients under the law of coverture that denied any legal existence or rights to married women. Educated more than most women of the day, Elizabeth Cady continued to study law with her father until the age of twenty-five when she married abolitionist and lawyer, Henry B. Stanton. Elizabeth had seven children, five boys and two girls, for whom she assumed primary parenting responsibility, because Henry worked away from home for most of their marriage. Stanton dabbled in temperance and abolition reforms, but always as they related to her prime concern of women's rights. She was a brilliant, witty, and engaging woman who used speeches, political conventions, and written articles to advance women's rights. Her newspaper, The Revolution, published from 1869 to 1871, and her eleven years as a lecturer on a national tour, made Stanton a household name as the leader of the women's rights movement.

Stanton's first and most famous act occurred in July 1848 at Seneca Falls, New York, where she organized the first convention on women's rights and drafted its Declaration of Sentiments for women's rights. Analogizing to the Declaration of Independence and playing on the accepted rhetoric of the time of women as sentimental rather than rational creatures, Stanton drafted a legal text calling for systemic legal change to break down the patriarchal structure and create civil liberties for women. Her calls for equality in marriage and divorce, property rights for married women, and access to education and employment were unanimously accepted by the convention; only the demand for the vote for women was seen as extreme and even laughable.

Three years later, Stanton teamed up with Susan B. Anthony and together they promoted the right of women's suffrage. After the Civil War, Stanton and Anthony's demand for the vote for women became more radical as they opposed the Fifteenth Amendment enfranchising African-American men. Their opposition stemmed from the passage of the Fourteenth Amendment and its inclusion of language restricting the new civil rights to "male citizens." Stanton rebelled against this "aristocracy of sex" and the betrayal by abolitionist colleagues who had previously worked together for equal suffrage regardless of race or sex. Stanton's opposition to the Fifteenth Amendment, sometimes couched in vitriolic and racist language, alienated her abolitionist colleagues and led, in part, to the division of the women's political movement into Lucy Stone's conservative American Woman Suffrage Association and Stanton and Anthony's more radical National Woman Suffrage Association.

Although the women's movement narrowed in on the right to vote, Elizabeth Cady Stanton continued her broader social agenda of reforming the rights of women within the family. She used arguments from the realm of political liberty and religious tolerance to make the case for individual autonomy and choice in private life. The true focus of reform, she said, was on the marriage relation. Stanton attacked the denial of married women's property rights that were an important component of full citizenship rights in the United States. She advocated for a partnership theory of marriage that encompassed marital property rights, the elimination of dower, and access to divorce. Stanton saw divorce as the escape route for women from marriages dominated by intemperance, domestic violence, and patriarchy, and thus argued for reform of divorce laws to permit no-fault divorce for the incompatibility of the partners. In the late nineteenth century, Stanton actively opposed the attempts at a constitutional marriage amendment that would have allowed for a national law restricting the right of divorce. In addition, Stanton attacked the symbolic denial of women's liberties in marriage, calling for women to retain their own name at marriage and to refuse to promise "to obey" their husbands in the wedding ceremony. Although Stanton argued for equality of women in the marriage partnership, she focused on a maternal difference to argue for a mother's preference in the custody rights of children on separation or divorce of the parents. At the time, children were legally the property of the father, who was awarded custody of the children regardless of the circumstances of the separation.

In 1889, after decades of feminist agitation, Stanton confronted the core issue that seemed to be the stumbling block for all reforms she sought—the then-accepted biblical commands of women's subordination. Stanton challenged these patriarchal notions by rewriting the Bible with a feminist lens to reveal a Christian theology grounded in equality of genders and individual empowerment. It was this perceived attack on the Bible that resulted in Stanton's ultimate ostracism from the women's movement and from history.

Elizabeth Cady Stanton's work foreshadowed the legal rights that women would ultimately obtain by the late twentieth century. Stanton's legacy is the holistic vision of civil rights as a combination of the norms of law, society, and religion as necessary to achieve individual liberty and autonomy for women.

TRACY A. THOMAS

References and Further Reading

- Clark, Elizabeth B., Self-Ownership and the Political Theory of Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Connecticut Law Review 21 (1989): 4: 905–941.
- Gordon, Ann D., ed. The Selected Papers of Elizabeth Cady Stanton and Susan B. Anthony, Vols. I–III. New Brunswick, NJ: Rutgers University Press, 1997–2003.
- Griffith, Elisabeth. In Her Own Right: The Life of Elizabeth Cady Stanton. New York: Oxford Univ. Press, 1984.
- Stanton, Elizabeth Cady. Eighty Years and More: Reminiscences, 1815–1897 (1898). Amherst, NY: Humanity Books, 2002.
- . The Woman's Bible (1895). Boston: Northeastern University Press, 1993.

STAPLES v. UNITED STATES, 511 U.S. 600 (1994)

———, and Susan B. Anthony and Matilda Joselyn Gage, eds. History of Woman Suffrage, Vols. I–III. Rochester, NY: 1881–1886.

See also Anthony, Susan B.; Bible in American Law; Voting Rights (Compound)

STAPLES v. UNITED STATES, 511 U.S. 600 (1994)

Harold Staples had been found in possession of an assault rifle that as manufactured had been only capable of firing one bullet with each separate pull of the trigger. However, at the time of his arrest, the firing mechanism had been modified, with the result that the weapon was now capable of full automatic fire. Staples was charged with violating 26 U.S.C. § 5861(d) of the National Firearm Act, which provides that it is unlawful for any person "to receive or possess a firearm which is not registered to him in the National Firearms Registration and Transfer Record." Pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 5845(a)(6) a "firearm" is defined as, among others, a "machine gun" and pursuant to 26 U.S.C. § 5845(b) a "machine gun" is defined as "any weapon which shoots . . . automatically more than one shot . . . by a single function of the trigger . . ."

At his trial, Staples argued that he was unaware of the modification and that he had never fired the rifle automatically while in his possession. Staples contended that his ignorance of the automatic firing capabilities of the rifle protected him from criminal liability for not registering his rifle as a "firearm." Staples requested that the district court instruct the jury that to convict him under Section 5861(d), the government must prove beyond a reasonable doubt that he knew that the weapon fell within the statutory definition of a machine gun. The district court denied his request, and he appealed.

The Supreme Court held that, before an individual can be convicted of possessing an unregistered firearm under Section 5861(d), where it was alleged that the "firearm" in question was a machine gun under the statute, the government would have to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant knew that the weapon in question had the peculiar characteristics that brought it within the statutory definition of a "machine gun."

The Court explained that given the silence of § 5861(d) concerning a mens rea element requiring that an accused know the facts making the accused's conduct illegal, the role of the common law favoring a requirement of mens rea should govern the interpretation of that section in this case. The Court noted that the severe potential penalty involved in violation of § 5861(d) (ten years) confirmed that the Court's reading of the statute is not involving an attempt by Congress to eliminate a mens rea requirement.

PATRICK H. HAGGERTY

See also Right to Bear Arms (II); United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976)

STARE DECISIS

Stare decisis, literally, "to rest upon what has been decided." Stare decisis describes the English and American system of adherence to precedent. When an American appellate court reaches a decision in a dispute, it publishes its report of the decision and its reasons for the decision. Later, in cases that have similar facts and similar disputes, the appellate court will follow and apply the rule of the earlier case to reach a like decision.

The principle of stare decisis, therefore, acts as a check on arbitrary judicial decisions. Although this protects individual rights against arbitrariness, strict adherence to an unjust precedent may abridge individual rights. This was the case between 1896 and 1954, when United States courts adhered to the "separate but equal" precedent of Plessy v. Ferguson (1896) to uphold the legal and customary practices of racial segregation. In Brown v. Board of Education, the Court overruled Plessy, declining to follow the principle of stare decisis. Plessy's long life shows the strength of stare decisis; Brown shows that it is not an inflexible rule, but a general principle that can be overcome for compelling reasons.

Nevertheless, stare decisis ensures a degree of fairness. The doctrine of equal protection of the laws teaches that the law ought to treat people in like circumstances in the same way. In a legal dispute, parties may expect to be treated like those in the earlier case by reason of the doctrine of stare decisis.

Finally, stare decisis advances the values of standardization and predictability of the law. When an appellate court describes a rule or interprets legislation, its decision educates the public about the law's requirements and prohibitions. Stare decisis permits an individual or organization to rely on the decision in their everyday affairs, confident that they are obeying the law.

JEFFREY T. RENZ

References and Further Reading

Allen, Carlton K. Law in the Making, 7th ed. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1964.
Cardozo, Benjamin N. The Nature of the Judicial Process. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1949.

Douglas, William O., Stare Decisis, Columbia Law Review 49 (1949): 6: 735–758.

Posner, Richard A., and William M. Landes, Legal Precedent: A Theoretical and Empirical Analysis, Journal of Law & Economics 19 (1976): 2: 249–307.

Pound, Roscoe, What of Stare Decisis? Fordham Law Review 10 (1941): 1: 1–13.

Radin, Max, Case Law and Stare Decisis, Concerning Präjudizienrecht in Amerika, Columbia Law Review, 33 (1933): 1: 199–212.

Schauer, Frederick, Precedent, Stanford Law Review 39 (1987): 3: 571–605.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Plessy v. Ferguson, 163 U.S. 537 (1896)

See also Due Process; Judicial Review

STATE ACTION DOCTRINE

With one exception, the provisions of the United States Constitution, including its amendments, apply to branches, departments, agencies, and officials of government and not to private individuals, groups, or organizations. (The exception is the Thirteenth Amendment, which simply outlaws slavery in the United States and its territories.) The primary, if not sole, purpose of any constitution is to create, organize, empower, and limit a government, and to the extent that private persons/groups/organizations need to be aided or controlled, a government, once formed by a constitution, can do that through statutes and other kinds of civil laws. If, moreover, the provisions in the U.S. Constitution that restrict the government were interpreted as applying to private entities, that would give the courts in the United States a significant amount of power over private individuals, groups, and organizations, because the courts are responsible for enforcing the Constitution. To limit its own power, among other reasons, the Supreme Court has enunciated the State Action Doctrine, which says that the Constitution, except for the Thirteenth Amendment, applies only to government and not to private entities.

The first case in which the Court explicitly stated the State Action Doctrine was the Civil Rights Cases (1883). The issue was whether Congress could pass a law making it a crime for public accommodations, for example, hotels, to discriminate against persons because of their race. Because the Fourteenth Amendment gives it the power to enforce the clause that prohibits states from denying persons "equal protection of the laws," Congress thought it could pass an antidiscrimination law that applies to private businesses and organizations. The Court, however, said that it could not, because the equal protection clause limits only state governments.

Since then, the Court has consistently adhered to the State Action Doctrine but many times has had to address the issue of what distinguishes government action from private action. Even before deciding the Civil Rights Cases, the Court had addressed that issue in Ex parte Virginia (1880) and held that even unauthorized actions by officials and agencies of government are state actions. In later cases, the Court held that what might seem to be private action classified as state action if it is officially encouraged by the government, located on public property, receives significant public funding or assistance, is heavily regulated by the government, or performs a function normally performed by government. Just how much government involvement is enough to constitute state action has varied from case to case.

Perhaps the most extreme and controversial expansion of the meaning of state action occurred in Shelley v. Kraemer (1948), which held that judicial enforcement of private contracts, including restrictive covenants (private contracts not to sell houses to blacks), is state action and, therefore, violates the Fourteenth Amendment's equal protection clause. The decision implied that private persons cannot rely on government agencies, such as the police, to enforce their actions if, were they government actions, they would violate the Constitution. The decision seemed to restrict the freedom of association protected by the First Amendment.

ELLIS M. WEST

References and Further Reading

- Buchanan, G. Sidney, A Conceptual History of the State Action Doctrine: The Search for Governmental Responsibility, Houston Law Review, Pt. I, 34 (Summer 1997): 333–424; Pt. II, 34 (Fall 1997): 665–775.
- Kauper, Paul G. "Private and Governmental Actions: Fluid Concepts." In Civil Liberties and the Constitution, Chap. 4, Ann Arbor, MI: University of Michigan Press, 1966, pp. 127–166.
- Rotunda, Ronald D., and John E. Nowak. "State Action." in Treatise on Constitutional Law: Substance and Procedure, Vol. 2, Chap. 16. St. Paul, Minn.: West Group, 1999, pp. 758–821.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Civil Rights Cases, 109 U.S. 3 (1883)
Ex parte Virginia, 100 U.S. 339 (1880)
Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948)

See also Amalgamated Food Employees Union v. Logan Valley Plaza, 391 U.S. 308 (1968); Company Towns and Freedom of Speech; Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972); Restrictive Covenants

STATE AID TO RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

Public financial assistance to religious schools represents one of the thornier and longer-standing controversies in First Amendment law. Traditionally, the school funding issue has involved requests by Catholic parochial schools for a share of the state public school fund. During the nineteenth century, the controversy over funding parochial schools often pitted Protestant nativists against Catholic immigrants and occasionally resulted in violence. As government involvement in education grew in the twentieth century, Catholic schools increasingly participated in federal and state supplemental funding programs. At the same time that Catholic schooling was becoming more mainstream, there was an expansion in Protestant fundamentalist, Orthodox Jewish, and Muslim religious schools, which also put demands on state assistance.

Since 1947, the United States Supreme Court has issued approximately two dozen decisions on the constitutionality of public funding of religious schools. Over the years, the Supreme Court's approach to the establishment clause's prohibition on the funding of religious institutions has evolved from a separationist "no-aid" position to one that is more accommodating of religious participation in funding programs. More recently, the Supreme Court has upheld the constitutionality of "vouchers" for private school funding. Finally, the Court has consistently distinguished between funding programs that aid religious elementary/secondary schools and religious colleges, finding few constitutional restrictions with aid to the latter institutions.

Background

At the time of the nation's founding, "public" education was essentially nonexistent. Free education was available in a few northeastern cities, usually under a joint public-private-religious operation that involved both public and private financial support. Outside of the northeast, most schooling took place in privately funded church schools that emphasized religious instruction and limited enrollment to children of that particular faith. Early educational reformers such as Benjamin Franklin, Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Rush, Daniel Webster, and Thomas Knox began calling for universal education with a more secular-based curriculum. In the early nineteenth century, educational reformers created free "common schools," often modeled after the British Lancasterian system, that offered a nonsectarian curriculum designed to attract children of all faiths and backgrounds. In reality, the early common schools had a Protestant orientation, reflecting the background and biases of the educational leaders.

Initially, the early common schools competed for public assistance with denominational schools. As the common schools grew, they were able to convince public officials to defund the competing religious schools. One of the first controversies occurred in New York City in 1822 where the Free School Society opposed a funding request by a Baptist school. In addition to touting the superiority of its nonsectarian program that was accessible to children of all faiths and backgrounds, the Society claimed that funding of religious schools violated notions of separation of church and state. After considering the Society's memorials and those of several churches and officials, the New York Common Council in 1824 recommended the state legislature discontinue funding for religious schools, opining "whether it is not a violation of a fundamental principle . . . to allow the funds of the State, raised by a tax on the citizens, designed for civil purposes, to be subject to the control of any religious corporation." The following year, the Common Council voted to end the funding of religious schools.

The primary conflict over whether to fund religious schools arose within the context of Catholic parochial schools. With the rise in Irish immigration in the 1830s and 1840s, Church leaders began to create parochial schools as an alternative to the common schools with their Protestant-oriented curriculum and worship exercises. In 1841, New York Catholic Bishop John Hughes, with the support of Governor William H. Seward, petitioned the New York legislature requesting that a portion of the school monies be allocated to his parochial schools. Opposition this time came not only from the Public School Society and Protestant churches—which insisted that only nonsectarian schools should receive public funding—but also from nativist groups that had sprung up in response to the recent Catholic immigration. Despite the support of Seward and State School Superintendent John Spencer, the New York legislature enacted a law in 1842 that prohibited the granting of public funds to any school where "religious sectarian doctrine or tenet shall be taught, inculcated, or practiced." The legislature amended the law in 1843 to prohibit public funds from going to schools "in which any book or books containing sectarian compositions shall be used," thereby inserting into the public policy the notion of nonsectarian education. The pattern of New York was replicated in other places along the eastern seaboard, most notably in Massachusetts, where in 1827 the legislature enacted a law making it unlawful to teach the doctrines of particular sects in the common schools of Massachusetts, effectively ending public funding of religious schools.

Despite such state laws and constitutional provisions, the funding controversy or "School Question" simmered throughout the nineteenth century as sympathetic elected officials sought to respond to the requests of the growing Catholic immigrant population. At the same time, public school teachers and officials occasionally punished or expelled Catholic students who refused to participate in the nonsectarian exercises, only heightening tension over the issue. In 1875, the controversy came to a head as President Ulysses S. Grant, hoping to secure the Republican nomination for a third term, proposed an amendment to the U.S. Constitution to prohibit the diversion of public funds for parochial school education while requiring universal public education. The idea was championed by Congressman James G. Blaine (R-ME), also a presidential hopeful, who introduced a more modest amendment in Congress in December 1875 (prohibiting only the diversion of monies from state school funds). The School Question became a leading issue in the 1876 campaign, with Republicans seeking to appeal to Protestant and nativist groups by highlighting traditional Democratic ties to the Catholic and immigrant populations. Even though a version of the "Blaine Amendment" passed the House of Representatives, it failed in August 1876 to garner the necessary two-thirds vote in the Senate. In addition to charges that the proposed amendment was anti-Catholic, many people were concerned that the amendment would increase federal involvement in local education. On the other side, many supporters of the amendment sincerely believed that public funding of religious schools would threaten the financial security of public schools and violate the constitutional principle of church-state separation. Later attempts to pass a similar amendment also failed in Congress (the "Blair Amendment" of 1888). However, after 1876, several states enacted their own constitutional provisions prohibiting funding sectarian schools and institutions.

Modern Developments

Although most states prohibited the public subsidy of religious schools by the early twentieth century, a handful of state legislatures enacted modest programs that supplemented the educational expenses of private and religious schools. In 1930, the U.S. Supreme Court upheld a decision by the Louisiana State Board of Education to furnish free textbooks to children attending religious schools, declaring that the appropriations benefitted the children, not the schools, and thus were for a public purpose (Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education). In 1947, the Court first considered the constitutionality of a funding program under the establishment clause (Everson v. Board of Education). The issue there was the state of New Jersey's reimbursement of transportation costs to parents of parochial school children. Speaking for a slim majority of the justices, Justice Hugo Black wrote in strong terms that: "Neither a state nor the Federal Government . . . can pass laws which aid one religion, aid all religions, or prefer one religion over another No tax in any amount, large or small, can be levied to support any religious activities or institutions, whatever they may be called, or whatever form they may adopt to teach or practice religion." Despite this seemingly absolutist language, the Court majority upheld the program on the ground that the establishment clause does not prohibit people from receiving "the benefits of public welfare legislation" because of their religious affiliation.

The Everson decision ushered in the modern era of religious funding issues. The question raised by Everson was how far state legislatures could go in including religious schools as beneficiaries in supplemental educational funding programs. On the one side, Catholic and libertarian groups lobbied state legislatures to experiment with more funding programs, whereas on the other side, groups opposed to religious school funding such as the National Education Association, the American Civil Liberties Union, the American Jewish Congress, and the newly formed Protestants and Other Americans United for Separation of Church and State challenged the programs in the courts. In 1968, the Supreme Court again upheld the loan of state textbooks to children attending parochial schools, this time under the establishment clause (Board of Education v. Allen). Beginning in the 1970s, however, opponents of religious school funding gained the upper hand. Led by attorney Leo Pfeffer of the American Jewish Congress and the Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty (PEARL), separationists successfully challenged a host of funding programs, including state salary supplements for parochial school teachers of secular subjects (Lemon v. Kurtzman, 1971), grants for maintenance and repair of parochial schools (PEARL v. Nyquist, 1973), tuition reimbursements and tax credits for parents of parochial school children (Nyquist; Sloan v. Lemon, 1973), reimbursements for state mandated testing (Levitt v. PEARL, 1973), and the loan of instructional equipment and materials to parochial schools (Meek v. Pittenger, 1975). The latter decision was highly criticized as the Court struggled to distinguish the loan of instructional equipment (prohibited) from the loan of textbooks (permitted). In Meek, the Court also announced that some religious schools were so "pervasively sectarian"—in that they integrated religion throughout the entire curriculum—that it would be impossible for states to fund the arguably secular functions of the schools.

Between 1975 and 1997, the Supreme Court began to moderate its stance on permissible funding of religious schools. In 1977, the Court reaffirmed the substance of Meek but allowed for state-subsidized medical and diagnostic services within parochial schools and therapeutic, guidance, and remedial services for parochial school students conducted off parochial school sites (Wolman v. Walter). Three years later, the Court modified its earlier stance by allowing reimbursements for state-mandated and prepared tests given to parochial school students (PEARL v. Reagan, 1980). However, in 1985 the Court struck down federal and state programs that sent public school employees into parochial schools to provide supplemental remedial and enrichment courses and paid parochial school employees to teach voluntary enrichment courses after the school day (Grand Rapids School District v. Ball; Aguilar v. Felton).

By the 1990s, the more conservative Supreme Court appointees of Presidents Nixon and Reagan were having a greater impact on the direction of the Court's establishment clause jurisprudence. In 1993, the high court upheld the constitutionality of a provision of the federally funded Individuals with Disabilities Education Act that allowed a publicly paid sign language interpreter to assist a hearing-impaired student attending a parochial school (Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District). The most significant shift came, however, in the 1997 case of Agostini v. Felton. In Agostini, the Court reconsidered its holdings in Grand Rapids School District v. Ball and Aguilar v. Felton, which had prohibited state-paid employees to enter parochial schools to provide supplemental educational services. Under Title I of the federal Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA), school districts were obligated to provide remedial education services to disadvantaged children, irrespective of the school they attended. However, the Grand Rapids and Aguilar decisions had forced school districts to offer those services to parochial school students in mobile classrooms off school property, increasing overhead costs. In Agostini, the Court took the extraordinary step of reversing portions of its earlier holdings. As Justice Sandra Day O'Connor wrote for the majority, the criteria for determining whether a funding program violated the establishment clause had "significantly changed" over the years. Rather than relying on assumptions that all direct state aid would advance religion or result in excessive entanglement between church and state, the Court would now look to see whether the aid program results in “government-sponsored indoctrination.” The Court would also look to a program was directed toward religious schools or was generally available to public and non-public beneficiaries alike.

Agostini was a watershed case in the high court’s establishment clause jurisprudence. It dispensed with the general presumption of unconstitutionality of funding programs and replaced it with an emphasis on the neutrality and availability of the benefit flowing under the program. This approach was followed three years later in another case involving the ESEA, which provided computers, educational equipment, and library books to religious schools (Mitchell v. Helms, 2000). A four-justice plurality voted to uphold the constitutionality of the program solely on the general availability of the benefit. A two-justice concurrence, written by Justice O’Connor, agreed on the importance of program neutrality but emphasized the additional requirement that the educational items were not diverted for religious activities. The ultimate effect of the holding was that the Court reversed its earlier decisions in Meek and Wolman.

A second significant strain in the development of the Court’s funding jurisprudence has involved the issue of “private choice.” Under private choice funding programs, such as involving a voucher, the public funds are disbursed to a private third party—usually a parent—who then determines how and where to apply the benefit. Economist Milton Friedman popularized the notion of educational vouchers in the 1950s as a way of expanding educational options and creating competition between public and private schools. Not until the 1970s, however, did the notion of private choice programs gain a following, primarily among Catholic groups who viewed vouchers as a possible exception to the Court’s funding holdings and conservative and libertarian groups interested in breaking the public school “stranglehold” on education. In the 1973 Nyquist and Sloan decisions, however, the Supreme Court struck down two private choice programs—a tuition reimbursement and a tax credit for tuition expenses—holding that the Court would look more to the ultimate effect of the aid rather than to the mechanism of disbursement: “the fact that aid is disbursed to parents rather than to the schools is only one among many factors to be considered.” Ten years later, however, the Court upheld the constitutionality of a state tax deduction for educational expenses, even though the primary allowable expense was for religious school tuition (Mueller v. Allen, 1983). Although deductions for other expenses were arguably available to parents of public school children, the Court majority was less concerned than in Nyquist and Sloan that the primary effect of aid program was to benefit religious schools. As the Court noted, any benefit to religion resulted from the “numerous private choices of individual parents of school-age children.”

After the Mueller case, a unanimous Court in 1986 upheld the constitutionality of allowing a disabled college student to use his vocational scholarship in a seminary program (Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind). There, the Court emphasized the breadth of possible uses of the scholarship, such that there was no financial incentive to undertake religious education, and that the ultimate benefit accrued to the religious college only as a result of “the genuinely independent and private choices of aid recipients.” The private choice aspect was also crucial in the Court’s 1993 decision allowing a state-paid sign-language interpreter accompany a disabled student to his religious school (Zobrest).

After the Mueller and Witters cases, several state legislatures enacted experimental voucher or tax credit programs for low-income parents with children attending low-performing public schools. The first comprehensive voucher program was established in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, in 1989, followed by programs in San Juan, Puerto Rico, Cleveland, Ohio, and in Florida. Under all such programs, religious schools represented the primary alternative to the public schools. Education and civil liberties groups challenged the various programs, usually in state courts raising both federal and state constitutional claims. After ten years of litigation, the Supreme Court finally heard a challenge to one of the programs. In Zelman v. Simmons-Harris (2002), a sharply divided Court upheld the constitutionality of vouchers. The Court majority held that funding programs that are not skewed toward religious uses are generally available and rely on the private choice of recipients to determine how the benefits are used are “not readily subject to challenge under the establishment clause.” Although Zelman settled the question about the constitutionality of vouchers under the First Amendment, in 2004 the Court affirmed the ability of states to prohibit vouchers for religious education based on independent state constitutional provisions (Locke v. Davey).

The final area of public aid to religious schools has occurred at the college level. Since the mid-twentieth century, federal and state governments have provided financial assistance to public, private, and religious colleges in the form of research and construction grants, revenue bonds, scholarships, and governmentally insured loans to students. One of the earlier programs was the federal Higher Education Facilities

Act of 1963, which provided grants and loans to colleges for the construction of academic buildings. In 1971, the Supreme Court upheld participation in the program by church-related colleges, based on language in the law that excluded funds for any building used for religious instruction or worship (Tilton v. Richardson). In so holding, the Court distinguished most church-related colleges from elementary and secondary parochial schools, noting that college students are less impressionable and less susceptible to religious indoctrination than younger students and that the colleges primarily taught secular academic subjects and were committed to academic freedom. In two subsequent cases involving public assistance to religious colleges, the Court adhered to this distinction between colleges and elementary and secondary schools (Hunt v. McNair, 1973; Roemer v. Board of Public Works, 1976). Although the Court did not rule that under no circumstance could a church-related college be considered pervasively sectarian, and thus ineligible for aid, its higher education decisions created the opposite presumption from that attached to religious elementary and secondary schools.

STEVEN K. GREEN

References and Further Reading

- Bolick, Clint. Voucher Wars. Washington, D.C.: Cato Institute, 2003.
- Green, Steven K. The Illusionary Aspect of "Private Choice" for Constitutional Analysis, Willamette Law Review 38 (2002): 549–577.
- Hamburger, Philip. Separation of Church and State. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2002.
- Jeffries, John C., and James E. Ryan, A Political History of the Establishment Clause, Michigan Law Review 100 (2001): 279–370.
- Lupu, Ira C., and Robert W. Tuttle, Zelman's Future: Vouchers, Sectarian Providers, and the Next Round of Constitutional Battles, Notre Dame Law Review 78 (2003): 917–994.
- Peterson, Paul E., ed. The Future of School Choice. Stanford, CA: Hoover Institution Press, 2003.
- Sugarman, Stephen D., and Frank R. Kemerer, eds. School Choice and Social Controversy: Politics, Policy, and Law. Washington, D.C.: Brookings Institution Press, 1999.
- Tushnet, Mark, Vouchers after Zelman, Supreme Court Review 2000 (2000): 1–39.
- Uderkuffler, Laura S., Vouchers and Beyond: The Individual as Causative Agent in Establishment Clause Jurisprudence, Indiana Law Journal 75 (2000): 167.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Agostini v. Felton*, 521 U.S. 203 (1997)
- Aguliar v. Felton*, 473 U.S. 402 (1985)
- Cochran v. Louisiana State Board of Education*, 281 U.S. 370 (1930)
- Committee for Public Education v. Nyquist*, 413 U.S. 756 (1973)

- Committee for Public Education v. Regan*, 444 U.S. 646 (1980)
- Everson v. Board of Education*, 330 U.S. 1 (1947)
- Grand Rapids School District v. Ball*, 473 U.S. 373 (1985)
- Hunt v. McNair*, 413 U.S. 734 (1973)
- Lemon v. Krutzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
- Levitt v. PEARL*, 413 U.S. 472 (1973)
- Locke v. Davey*, 540 U.S. 712 (2004)
- Meek v. Pittenger*, 421 U.S. 349 (1975)
- Mitchell v. Helms*, 530 U.S. 793 (2000)
- Mueller v. Allen*, 463 U.S. 388 (1983)
- Roemer v. Board of Public Works*, 426 U.S. 736 (1976)
- Sloan v. Lemon*, 413 U.S. 825 (1973)
- Tilton v. Richardson*, 403 U.S. 672 (1973)
- Witters v. Washington Department of Services for the Blind*, 474 U.S. 481 (1986)
- Wolman v. Walter*, 433 U.S. 229 (1977)
- Zobrest v. Catalina Foothills School District*, 509 U.S. 1 (1993)
- Zelman v. Simmons-Harris*, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

See also Americans United for Separation of Church and State; Blaine Amendment; Locke v. Davey, 540 U.S. 712 (2004); Mitchell v. Helms, 530 U.S. 793 (2000); Zelman v. Simmons-Harris, 536 U.S. 639 (2002)

STATE AND FEDERAL REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION

Since the end of the nineteenth century, the federal government has regulated the movement of individuals into the United States under the umbrella of immigration law. This regulation has directly implicated the civil liberties of aliens seeking to enter or remain in the United States, as a constraint on the freedom of movement. Federal regulation of immigration has had broader implications for civil liberties as a context in which well-established constitutional norms have been found inapplicable. Immigration law continues to be constitutionally exceptional, a realm in which rights have been diluted to the extent that they are recognized at all.

The states have played a much less significant, although not inconsequential, role in the regulation of immigration. For more than a century, state participation in immigration control has been bounded by the preemptory federal interest in conducting national foreign relations. Consistent with devolutionary trends in other contexts, however, the states may come to play a greater role in immigration regulation.

Before the advent of federal regulation, such control of immigration as existed was found in a patchwork of state laws variously regulating the entry of convicts, the poor, and the sick. Many of these state laws applied to internal as well as international migration, and they were not well enforced. Enacted in 1872 and 1882 and mirroring the criteria of state exclusion measures, the first federal immigration measures prohibited the entry of prostitutes, idiots, lunatics, and persons likely to become a public charge. The Contract Labor Law of 1885 prohibited engaging the services of aliens before their embarkation to the United States.

But it was with respect to the so-called Chinese Exclusion laws of the 1880s and 1890s that the courts laid the constitutional foundations of immigration exceptionalism. The laws imposed a bar on new immigration from China and provided for the removal of Chinese aliens who could not demonstrate the legality of their presence in the United States. The Supreme Court recognized the federal government's constitutional authority to regulate immigration—a power not specified in the constitutional text—in the 1889 decision in the Chinese Exclusion Case.

In Fong Yue Ting v. United States, the Court rejected the rights-based claim of a Chinese resident facing deportation. The Court found deportation not to constitute punishment for constitutional purposes, thus eluding a due process challenge. As the Court held in the Cold War era decision in United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy, “[w]hatever the procedure authorized by Congress is, it is due process as far as the alien denied entry is concerned.” On the same basis, the Court has rejected invocation of jury trial and Eighth Amendment rights in immigration proceedings. It has also rejected Equal Protection-based challenges to the scheme of federal immigration control, most notably in the modern-era decision in Fiallo v. Bell. Only in the context of the removal of legally admitted aliens has the Court held immigration enforcement to the standards of procedural due process.

These decisions aggregate as the plenary power doctrine under which the courts have deferred to the authority of the political branches. “Over no conceivable subject,” the Supreme Court intoned in Kleindienst v. Mandel, “is the legislative power of Congress more complete than it is over” the regulation of immigration. The plenary power doctrine is long on the rhetoric of sovereignty, dismissive of otherwise applicable constitutional protections and modest in the assertion of judicial power. The result has been a realm in which civil liberties have been more persistently vulnerable than perhaps any other.

Among examples of practices tolerated in the face of this judicial reticence were the Chinese Exclusion and other race-based exclusions; the national origins quota system applicable to admissions from the 1920s through 1965, which favored immigrants from Northern European countries; and other classifications that would not withstand constitutional scrutiny in other contexts, for instance on the basis of gender, legitimacy, or disability. Aliens have been excluded on the basis of political speech that would otherwise enjoy core First Amendment protection.

Admissions continue to be subject to national quotas, thus comprising a form of national origins discrimination. Aliens are effectively discriminated against on the basis of wealth, insofar as they must demonstrate adequate sources of support as a condition to entry. Aliens have no right of judicial review when denied visas to travel to the United States. Major immigration reform legislation enacted in 1996 has resulted in the deportation of longstanding legal resident aliens for relatively minor crimes, with no possibility for discretion on the part of immigration enforcement authorities.

The plenary power regime has been the target of withering criticism by academics and immigrant rights advocates. Although the doctrine remains in place, there have been recent signs of slippage. The Court expressed serious constitutional doubts about the indefinite detention of deportable aliens whose home countries refused to take them back in Zadvydas v. Davis and applied an ordinary, nonplenary power analysis on the way to upholding a gender classification in the naturalization law in Nguyen v. INS. On the other hand, the national security implications of immigration in the wake of the September 11 attacks may retard the mainstreaming of constitutional rights doctrine as applied in the immigration law context.

State regulation of immigration remains of subsidiary importance. Framing the issue as one of national foreign relations, the Supreme Court in Chy Lung v. Freeman (1875) denied the capacity of the states to engage in immigration control. In Hines v. Davidowitz (1941), the Court struck down a state scheme requiring the registration of aliens on the eve of World War II. The Court has been solicitous of claims brought by aliens challenging discriminatory state benefits regimes, both on preemption and equal protection rationales. The courts show no sign of transplanting new federalism rationales to the immigration law context.

The political branches, however, seem inclined to experiment with state participation in immigration law enforcement. The 1996 welfare reform act delegated to states the authority to determine noncitizen eligibility for certain federally funded benefits. The Immigration and Nationality Act now provides for undertaking cooperative agreements with state and local enforcement agencies with respect to enforcement of federal immigration laws and provides for the deputization of state and local officials in the face of a “mass influx” of aliens. A controversial 1996 opinion of the Office of Legal Counsel, Department of Justice, concluded that state and local law enforcement officers could undertake immigration enforcement activity even in the absence of expressly delegated authority. As yet, none of these capacities has been significantly exploited. Perceived security priorities in the wake of September 11 have prompted some to argue for greater state participation in immigration enforcement.

PETER J. SPIRO

References and Further Reading

- Chin, Gabriel J., Is There a Plenary Power Doctrine? A Tentative Apology and Prediction for Our Strange But Unexceptional Constitutional Immigration Law, Georgetown Immigration Law Journal 14 (2000): 257.
- Hutchinson, E. P. Legislative History of American Immigration Policy 1798–1965. Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1981.
- Henkin, Louis H., The Constitution and United States Sovereignty: A Century of Chinese Exclusion and Its Progeny, Harvard Law Review 100 (1987): 853.
- Legomsky, Stephen H., Immigration Law and the Principle of Plenary Congressional Power, Supreme Court Review 1984 (1985): 255.
- Neuman, Gerald L. Strangers to the Constitution: Immigrants, Borders, and Fundamental Law. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1996.
- , The Lost Century of Immigration Law (1776–1875), Columbia Law Review 93 (1993): 1833.
- Schuck, Peter H., The Transformation of Immigration Law Columbia Law Review 84 (1984): 1.
- Spiro, Peter J., Explaining the End of Plenary Power, Georgetown Journal of Immigration Law 16 (2002): 339.
- , The States and Immigration in an Era of Demi-Sovereignties, Virginia Journal of International Law 35 (1994): 1: 121.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Chinese Exclusion Case, 130 U.S. 581 (1889)
- Chy Lung v. Freeman*, 92 U.S. 275 (1875)
- Fiallo v. Bell*, 430 U.S. 787 (1977)
- Fong Yue Ting v. United States*, 149 U.S. 698 (1893)
- Graham v. Richardson*, 403 U.S. 365 (1971)
- Harisiades v. Shaughnessy*, 342 U.S. 580 (1952)
- Hines v. Davidowitz*, 312 U.S. 52 (1941)
- The Japanese Immigrant Case, 189 U.S. 86 (1903).
- Kleindienst v. Mandel*, 408 U.S. 753 (1972)
- Landon v. Plasencia*, 459 U.S. 21 (1982)
- Nguyen v. INS*, 533 U.S. 53 (2001)
- Shaughnessy v. United States ex rel. Mezei*, 345 U.S. 206 (1953)
- United States ex rel. Knauff v. Shaughnessy*, 338 U.S. 537 (1950)
- Zadvydas v. Davis*, 553 U.S. 678 (2001)

See also Aliens, Civil Liberties of; Citizenship; Immigration and Nationality Act Amendments of 1965; 9/11 and the War on Terrorism; Race and Immigration

STATE CONSTITUTION, PRIVACY PROVISIONS

The words “privacy” and “private” do not appear in the text of the United States Constitution. Accordingly, the Supreme Court in Griswold v. Connecticut had to rely on “penumbras, formed by emanations” from other constitutional provisions to establish a basis for the federal constitutional right of privacy. The absence of an explicit textual foundation for the federal privacy right has engendered a continuing debate regarding the propriety of its recognition. But, under the constitutions of ten states, no such debate exists. These states—Alaska, Arizona, California, Florida, Hawaii, Illinois, Montana, Louisiana, South Carolina, and Washington—have adopted state constitutional provisions explicitly guaranteeing an individual’s “privacy,” “private life,” or “private affairs.”

These state privacy provisions were ratified in two separate eras, taking three basic forms. The first ones appeared in the Washington and Arizona constitutions during the Progressive movement in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. Washington Constitution article I, section 7, and Arizona Constitution article II, section 8, both guarantee in identical language that “[n]o person shall be disturbed in his private affairs, or his home invaded, without authority of law.” The motivation behind these provisions, as the Washington Supreme Court noted in Kelleher v. Minshull, was “to protect individuals in the sanctity of their homes and privacy of their books and papers” from unreasonable governmental searches and seizures.

Eight other states ratified their privacy provisions between 1968 and 1980, in the years after the Supreme Court recognized a federal right of privacy in Griswold. Yet, despite their common temporal relationship, provisions adopted during this period are of two distinct types. Five states separated their guarantees from constitutional clauses regarding searches and seizures, thereby carefully enumerating an individual autonomy and informational privacy right. Although none of these five state constitutional provisions are identical—Alaska recognizes a “right of the people to privacy” that “shall not be infringed,” California merely lists “privacy” as one of the “inalienable rights” protected by its state constitution, Florida guarantees a “right to be let alone and free from governmental intrusion into the person’s private life,” and Montana protects a “right of individual privacy,” and Hawaii a “right of the people to privacy” that both cannot “be infringed without the showing of a compelling state interest”—each of these state privacy rights has been granted a textual status divorced from the search and seizure context.

However, the other states that added privacy provisions between 1968 and 1980—Illinois, Louisiana, and South Carolina—incorporated such rights within their constitutional protections against unreasonable searches and seizures. Illinois Constitution article I, section 6, is representative of these clauses, guaranteeing the people a “right to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and other possessions against unreasonable searches, seizures, invasions of privacy or interceptions of communications.” Although it now has a freestanding privacy right as well, Hawaii’s constitution contains a similar clause, now at article I, section 7, to protect the people’s right to “be secure . . . against unreasonable searches, seizures and invasions of privacy.”

Three separate protections—against unreasonably invasive governmental investigations and detentions, interference with personal autonomy, and collection and disclosure of private information—are evident in the text of these various state constitutional provisions. Nevertheless, courts do not always limit their interpretation to the component or components that a particular guarantee seems to address. As an illustration, although South Carolina embedded its privacy text within its prohibition against unreasonable searches and seizures, the South Carolina Supreme Court in Singleton v. State held that this section protected the individual autonomy right of an inmate to refuse to take medication that would render him competent for execution.

Thus, the text of these provisions alone does not define their scope, but an examination of precedent is also necessary for each of the privacy components.

Protection against Searches and Seizures Invading Private Affairs

Most states with explicit privacy guarantees proclaim that their state constitutions provide additional protections from governmental searches and seizures than that provided by the Fourth Amendment. However, although some states have, indeed, established an independent analysis on the basis of their privacy provisions, the supposed difference in others is more often an empty promise.

Washington and Hawaii have used their privacy rights to develop the most independent search and seizure jurisprudence. Washington has rejected the Fourth Amendment’s touchstone of a reasonable expectation of privacy, instead analyzing, under its constitutional text, whether the state unreasonably intruded into a defendant’s private affairs. Hawaii has opined that its explicit privacy guarantee establishes that a primary purpose of the state exclusionary rule is to protect privacy rights, not merely to deter governmental misconduct as under the Fourth Amendment. These distinct rationales underlying Washington and Hawaii’s search and seizure jurisprudence has led both states to frequently deviate from federal standards. For instance, Washington in State v. Boland and Hawaii in State v. Tanaka both determined that a warrantless search of a person’s garbage constituted an unreasonable privacy intrusion, although the Supreme Court held in California v. Greenwood that there is no reasonable expectation of privacy in garbage. Both states, in State v. Gunwall (Washington) and State v. Rothman (Hawaii), held that the use of a pen register without a warrant violated their state constitutions, despite Smith v. Maryland’s holding that this device did not implicate the federal Constitution. Both states have also rejected the Supreme Court’s holdings in a number of other contexts, typically using their privacy guarantees to explicate these results.

Two other states, Alaska and Montana, have also frequently relied on their privacy clauses to broaden the protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. These states essentially reason that their explicit guarantees correlate into their citizens possessing a heightened reasonable expectation of privacy. Hence, Montana invalidated a warrantless search of an open field in State v. Bullock contrary to the Supreme Court’s holding in Oliver v. United States, declined in State v. Sawyer to follow South Dakota v. Opperman allowing automotive inventory searches, and placed additional limitations on using drug-sniffing dogs in State v. Tackitt. Alaska decisions have likewise often rejected holdings under the Fourth Amendment when interpreting its state constitutional protection against searches and seizures in conjunction with its privacy clause.

Yet in other states with privacy provisions, the purported difference has only rarely been evident. Illinois in In re May 1991 Will County Grand Jury Subpoena stated that its “Constitution goes beyond Federal constitutional guarantees by expressly recognizing a zone of personal privacy,” thereby precluding the grand jury from subpoenaing, in the absence of individualized suspicion, physical evidence from non-suspect witnesses. But despite this occasional willingness to state that its guarantee goes beyond the federal Constitution, Illinois courts have not developed an independent privacy jurisprudence to protect this supposed greater right in the typical search and seizure context, instead almost always treating it as coextensive with the Fourth Amendment.

Such coextensive treatment is in fact required in California and Florida as a result of state constitutional conformity amendments. California Constitution article I, section 28(d), precludes the California courts from developing a state exclusionary rule, leaving only the federal Constitution to govern evidence exclusion for improper searches. Florida Constitution article I, section 12, is even more explicit, requiring that state constitutional search and seizure issues be construed in conformity with the Fourth Amendment as interpreted by the United States Supreme Court. Thus, California and Florida courts cannot use their privacy guarantees to create any independent state constitutional protection against invasive searches and seizures.

The effect of a privacy guarantee on a state's constitutional search and seizure jurisprudence is thus somewhat muddled. Even among the states with similar types of clauses, the holdings cannot be reconciled. Moreover, some state courts without privacy provisions have likewise rejected the Supreme Court's search and seizure holdings when interpreting their own state constitutions. As a result, a privacy clause, while providing a potential argument for recognizing an enhanced expectation of privacy against governmental searches and seizures, is neither necessary nor sufficient to establish such protection.

Personal Autonomy Rights

Another dimension of privacy protects individual autonomy in making decisions and engaging in conduct related to certain personal and intimate matters, such as marriage, procreation, contraception, abortion, medical care, family relationships, and child rearing. State privacy clauses are frequently asserted as a basis to extend such autonomy rights to new contexts or to heighten the protection of individual liberty for previously recognized rights.

The Alaska Supreme Court's decision in Ravin v. State is a famous early example. There, the court held that adult citizens possessed a right to privacy that extended to the possession and ingestion of marijuana for personal use while in their home, "a place where the individual's privacy receives special protection." Although the practical import of Ravin today is minimal because the federal Controlled Substances Act preempts its holding, subsequent Alaska cases have refused to extend the right to other drugs such as cocaine, and it has not been followed by any of the other states with privacy clauses, Ravin still constitutes an early recognition of the state's role in defining liberty through a privacy guarantee.

The Florida Supreme Court interpreted its privacy provision in a series of decisions involving abortion rights. Under the federal right to an abortion, state statutes requiring a minor to notify or obtain consent from her parents before obtaining an abortion are constitutional if a judicial bypass procedure exists. The Florida legislature enacted such a parental consent statute, but the state supreme court held in In re T.W. that, because Florida's explicit privacy clause embraces more interests and extends more protection than the federal Constitution, a minor had a state constitutional right to an abortion without being hindered by obtaining parental consent or a judicial bypass. The Florida legislature subsequently enacted a parental notification statute, which the court again invalidated. In response, the Florida legislature proposed, and Florida citizens ratified, a state constitutional amendment requiring a minor's right to an abortion to be interpreted in accordance with the decisions of the U.S. Supreme Court. Yet because the amendment only explicitly applies to a minor's right to an abortion, T.W.'s adoption of the rigid trimester framework from Roe v. Wade, instead of the less protective undue burden standard from Planned Parenthood v. Casey, apparently remains the legal standard governing abortion under the Florida Constitution.

Other states with privacy clauses have also extended additional protections to the right to choose under their state constitutions. California relied on its privacy provision to hold a parental consent statute unconstitutional in American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren and to require public funding of abortions in Committee to Defend Reproductive Rights v. Myers. Alaska held in Valley Hospital Association v. Mat-Su Coalition for Choice that its privacy guarantee created broader protections for reproductive autonomy than the federal Constitution such that a "quasi-public institution" could not decline to perform abortions because of moral disapproval. Montana similarly concluded in Armstrong v. State that its privacy clause necessitated a heightened strict scrutiny analysis of legislation infringing on procreative autonomy rights.

Several jurisdictions have used privacy clauses to establish a state constitutional right to sexual privacy and right to die. The contours of such liberty rights at the federal level are still in flux, as the Supreme Court's holdings in Lawrence v. Texas invalidating a statute criminalizing certain same-sex sexual activity and in Cruzan v. Missouri upholding a clear and convincing evidence requirement for an incompetent patient's wishes to discontinue life-sustaining treatment left many issues unresolved. Yet several states, including Arizona, California, and Florida, have addressed such issues more frequently under their state constitutions, providing a more thorough jurisprudence.

Each of the states with freestanding privacy rights has thus recognized some autonomy rights exceeding federal protection. Although the states with privacy provisions embedded within search and seizure clauses are more likely to conclude that no greater individual autonomy protection is intended than that provided by federal law, even these states have occasionally provided additional rights. Yet, once again, the existence of a privacy clause is not dispositive. Several other states without such clauses have recognized privacy rights through penumbras or implications from other constitutional provisions, guaranteeing additional or more extensive autonomy rights under their state constitutions than protected by the federal privacy right. A privacy clause thus provides textual support for urging greater autonomy rights, but does not dictate the outcome.

Informational Privacy

Another aspect of privacy is informational privacy, which precludes unreasonable surveillance, collection of personal information, and disclosure of such information. The U.S. Supreme Court has only addressed this component of privacy on a couple of occasions, but the states with privacy clauses have had more opportunities to define this guarantee.

California is at the forefront of protecting this right. Indeed, soon after the adoption of California's privacy provision, White v. Davis concluded its primary purpose was precluding unnecessary surveillance and data collection by government and private businesses. California decisions have protected a variety of interests under the privacy clause (sometimes aided by related statutes), including barring intrusive discovery concerning a litigant's sexual history without a showing of need in Vinson v. Superior Court, providing a cause of action against a defense attorney for disclosing a victim's confidential mental health records in Susan S. v. Israels, and recognizing that some drug testing even by nongovernmental employers may violate privacy rights in Hill v. National Collegiate Athletic Association.

California's recognition of constitutional privacy rights against private actors has not typically been accepted by the other states with privacy guarantees. Yet many of these other states do agree that state privacy provisions may shield discovery of confidential information in litigation. For example, Alaska in Gunnerud v. State precluded a criminal defendant from invading a witness's privacy by discovering her psychiatric report that was irrelevant to her credibility. Florida held an AIDS victim could not obtain the identity of blood donors because of their privacy interests in Rasmussen v. South Florida Blood Services. Montana used its privacy provision and a statutory privilege in State ex rel. Mapes v. District Court to limit the discoverability of a plaintiff's therapy records to those related to his claims, and Illinois in Kunkel v. Walton invalidated on constitutional privacy grounds a statute waiving all claims of medical confidentiality for litigants asserting a claim for bodily injury. These and other cases confronting similar issues necessitate a delicate balance between a litigant's need for the information and its confidentiality. In those states with an explicit privacy guarantee, this balance is often slightly shifted in favor of privacy rights.

Nevertheless, other states without privacy clauses have reached similar holdings. Thus, as with other components of the privacy right, explicit clauses are not dispositive. The states with privacy provisions are generally more inclined than other states to provide additional protections under their state constitutions than required by federal law, which seems appropriate, because there would be little purpose in adding a constitutional privacy clause if it did not provide expanded protection at least occasionally. But there is not a consensus on which privacy rights should be recognized or expanded.

CHARLES W. "ROCKY" RHODES

References and Further Reading

- Friedelbaum, Stanley H., The Quest for Privacy: State Courts and an Elusive Right, Albany Law Review 65 (2002): 4: 945-989.
- Friesen, Jennifer. State Constitutional Law: Litigating Individual Rights, Claims, and Defenses. 3rd ed. Charlottesville, Va.: Matthew Bender & Company, 2000.
- Gormley, Ken, and Rhonda G. Hartman, Privacy and the States, Temple Law Review 65 (Winter 1992): 1279-1323.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- American Academy of Pediatrics v. Lungren*, 940 P.2d 797 (Cal. 1997)
- Armstrong v. State*, 989 P.2d 364 (Mont. 1999)
- California v. Greenwood*, 486 U.S. 35 (1988)
- Committee to Defend Reproductive Rights v. Myers*, 625 P.2d 779 (Cal. 1981)
- Cruzan v. Director, Missouri Dep't of Health*, 497 U.S. 261 (1990)
- Griswold v. Connecticut*, 381 U.S. 479 (1965)
- Gunnerud v. State*, 611 P.2d 69 (Alaska 1980)
- Hill v. National Collegiate Athletic Ass'n*, 865 P.2d 633 (Cal. 1994)
- In re May 1991 Will County Grand Jury*, 604 N.E.2d 929 (Ill. 1992)

In re T.W., 551 So.2d 1186 (Fla. 1989)
Kelleher v. Minshull, 119 P.2d 302 (Wash. 1941)
Kunkel v. Walton, 689 N.E.2d 1047 (Ill. 1997)
Lawrence v. Texas, 123 S.Ct. 2472 (2003)
Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S.170 (1984)
Planned Parenthood of Southeastern Pennsylvania v. Casey,
 505 U.S. 833 (1992)
Rasmussen v. South Florida Blood Servs., 500 So.2d 533
 (Fla. 1987)
Ravin v. State, 537 P.2d 494 (Alaska 1975)
Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973)
Singleton v. State, 437 S.E.2d 53 (S.C. 1993)
South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976)
Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979)
State v. Boland, 800 P.2d 1112 (Wash. 1990)
State v. Bullock, 901 P.2d 61 (Mont. 1995)
State v. Gunwall, 720 P.2d 808 (Wash. 1986)
State v. Rothman, 779 P.2d 1 (Haw. 1989)
State v. Sawyer, 571 P.2d 1131 (Mont. 1977)
State v. Tanaka, 701 P.2d 1274 (Hawaii 1985)
State v. Tackitt, 67 P.3d 295 (Mont. 2003)
State ex. rel. Mapes v. District Court, 822 P.2d 91 (Mont.
 1991)
Susan S. v. Israels, 67 Cal. Rptr. 2d 42 (Cal. Ct. App.
 1997)
Valley Hosp. Ass'n v. Mat-Su Coalition for Choice, 948 P.2d
 963 (Alaska 1997)
Vinson v. Superior Court, 740 P.2d 404 (Cal. 1987)
White v. Davis, 533 P.2d 222 (Cal. 1975)

See also Penumbra; Privacy; Search (General Definition); State Constitutions and Civil Liberties

STATE CONSTITUTIONAL DISTINCTIONS

Every state's constitution contains many provisions, typically found in its bill of rights, protecting civil liberties. Sometimes these provisions closely resemble provisions of the U.S. Constitution, yet in many cases they differ, sometimes substantially, from provisions found in the federal Constitution or in the constitutions of other states. As a result, state constitutions may protect rights different from those protected by the federal Constitution. For example, the right to an education receives protection under most state constitutions, but not under the U.S. Constitution. State constitutions also may protect the same rights protected by the federal Constitution, but to a greater extent. Thus, police wishing to search for evidence of criminal activity in certain circumstances need not first obtain a warrant under the U.S. Constitution, but must do so under the constitutions of many states. Because of these kinds of distinctions, state constitutions often protect the civil liberties of citizens of their states more robustly than the U.S. Constitution protects the liberties of citizens of the nation.

The scope and distinctiveness of state constitutional rights has varied over time. During the earliest phase of state constitution making, from 1776 to 1789, state constitutions often differed from one another dramatically. After 1790, when new states began seeking admission to the Union, and when older states periodically decided to revise or replace their constitutions, drafters looked frequently to the U.S. Constitution, as well as to the constitutions of the existing states, for models. The routine copying of civil liberties provisions from one constitution to another led slowly to a growing convergence of constitutional texts. This process of convergence was strengthened during the nineteenth century by the influence among state court judges of a natural-law philosophy of individual rights. According to this philosophy, the rights that citizens hold against their governments are dictated by universal principles of Natural Law, and the way in which constitutional drafters happen to express them in various constitutional provisions is thus not particularly significant. As a result, state judges often interpreted provisions of state constitutions to mean the same thing as equivalent provisions of the national or other state constitutions regardless of their actual wording.

The process of state and national convergence in the protection of civil liberties was strengthened again in the mid-twentieth century when the U.S. Supreme Court developed the Incorporation Doctrine, under which provisions of the federal Bill of Rights are deemed to apply to the states. After incorporation, state governments found themselves obliged to observe not only state constitutional provisions protecting liberty but federal constitutional provisions as well. This doctrine made the constitutional protection of civil liberties more uniform across the nation by invalidating any state constitutional provision to the extent it failed to protect liberty as expansively as the corresponding provision of the federal Bill of Rights. Moreover, many state courts increasingly deferred to the Supreme Court's leadership on civil liberties issues, deliberately construing state constitutional provisions to mean whatever the Supreme Court had held the analogous provision of the U.S. Constitution to mean. By the mid-1970s, a judicial consensus seemed to be coalescing around the idea that the United States has essentially a single constitutional regime of civil liberties and that the scope and meaning of individual rights are determined for all Americans by the U.S. Supreme Court.

This consensus soon broke down, however, when the Supreme Court began during the late 1970s and early 1980s to construe federal constitutional rights more narrowly than it had during previous decades. As the Court retreated from the protection of individual rights, some state judges began to reexamine rights provisions of their state constitutions as potential sources of additional protection. Because the Incorporation Doctrine does not prevent state constitutions from granting greater protection for civil liberties than the U.S. Constitution requires, some state courts began to assert their independence from the Supreme Court by construing state constitutional provisions to protect rights that the Supreme Court had ruled were unprotected by the federal Constitution.

Today, state courts have most actively expanded rights beyond the boundaries protected by the federal Constitution in the area of criminal procedure. Numerous state courts have construed their state constitution's search and seizure provision to bar warrantless searches by state and local police in circumstances in which the Fourth Amendment of the U.S. Constitution permits them. Some courts have construed state constitutions to protect the right to counsel, the right to confront witnesses, and the prohibition on double jeopardy more broadly than the Supreme Court has construed equivalent rights under the U.S. Constitution.

Outside the field of criminal procedure, several state courts have ruled that their state constitutions provide broader protection than does the federal Constitution for the rights of free speech and equal protection. For example, unlike the federal First Amendment, the free speech provisions of the constitutions of California, Colorado, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Oregon, and Washington have all been construed to protect a speaker's right of reasonable access to privately owned shopping malls. Some state courts have relied on state constitutions to expand the rights of gays and lesbians beyond federal boundaries, most recently with respect to the right to form civil unions. And courts in eighteen states have invalidated under their state constitutions aspects of those states' education and educational finance policies that easily pass muster under Supreme Court rulings construing the U.S. Constitution.

At the same time, many state courts have chosen to continue to follow rulings of the U.S. Supreme Court when construing civil liberties provisions of their state constitutions. Sometimes state courts follow federal rulings simply because the text and founding history of the state constitution are so similar to the text and history of the federal Constitution that the interpretive process leads directly to the same results. Other state courts have expressed a reluctance to depart from the path marked out by the Supreme Court, because they believe that uniformity in the enforcement of constitutional liberties is desirable or because they question the legitimacy of rejecting conclusions reached by the nation's highest court on a vital subject of mutual concern.

JAMES A. GARDNER

References and Further Reading

- Latzer, Barry. State Constitutional Criminal Law. New York: Clark, Boardman, Callaghan, 1995 (with Supplement, 2000).
Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1998.

See also State Constitutions and Civil Liberties; State Courts

STATE CONSTITUTIONS AND CIVIL LIBERTIES

When people debate the scope of our liberties, conversations often begin and end with the U.S. Constitution and the Supreme Court's interpretation thereof. This focus is partially legitimate, because our federal government imposes many standards on states. In addition, how the Supreme Court interprets civil rights guarantees influences how states determine their own, similar responsibilities. At the same time, rights protection remains an essential feature of state constitutionalism. Some liberties explicit in state documents are absent or less encompassing in their federal counterpart. Here, the Supreme Court permits states to use the national standard as a minimum and their own standards as a ceiling. Moreover, nationally mandated criteria are relatively new. For most of our history, states had near exclusive responsibility for protecting civil liberties. Their constitutions were initially designed with this purpose in mind, and they maintained this role relatively unimpeded for almost 200 years. Given the preceding, no study of civil liberties would be complete without a discussion of state constitutions.

Scholars generally define civil liberties in terms of the first eight amendments to the U.S. Constitution. This national benchmark partially favors state constitutions, which have, since their inception in 1776, promoted these enumerated liberties by emphasizing them as inalienable and uncontested based on nature and popular consent. The federal constitution's terse list pales in comparison to detailed state accolades. At the same time, states did not uniformly enforce their grandiose parchment guarantees, so much so that subsequent Supreme Court interference rendered many of their grand words insignificant. Yet, the rights provisions found in state constitutions tell an important story. They suggest how important states were—and still are—in protecting civil liberties.

State Guarantees of “National” Civil Liberties

America’s legal commitment to the civil liberties outlined in the first eight amendments has strong ideological and historical roots. Some principles, like guaranteed trial by jury of one’s peers, date back to the Magna Carta of 1215. Others, like those limiting government’s prosecution powers and those prohibiting excessive bail and cruel and unusual punishment, find their roots in the 1689 English Bill of Rights. Colonists incorporated these ideals and other, related British common law principles into their early charters, and then into their constitutions. Free conscience, a contentious right in Europe, was among the primary reasons people first journeyed to America. Reflective of this, seventeenth-century colonial charters and subsequent revolutionary constitutions codified this as an essential right. Finally, British settlers believed that free assembly, right of government petition, and the like were their English birthrights. Revolutionaries bitterly complained these were being denied them. Aiming to prevent similar tyranny in a newly independent America, constitution writers often incorporated these into founding documents as well.

These early legal protections remain a staple in American constitutional law today. The first eight amendments to the federal constitution, themselves based on state documents and the legal and philosophical traditions influencing them, remain unchanged. Moreover, although state constitutions are frequently amended and sometimes totally rewritten, their declared commitment to these explicit concerns has changed little since independence. Often, delegates meeting to revise existing documents simply reratified original rights declarations without much discussion or debate. Delegates meeting to write new documents or revise specific existing declarations usually looked no further than next door. They then debated which neighbor’s provisions were worthy of incorporating. This informal influence promoted ongoing similarities across civil rights protections.

Despite common philosophical roots and ongoing interdependence, each state has its own history and particular cultural and regional needs. This means not all constitutional features are shared among the fifty states or between them and the United States. Instead, provisions and their implementation have varied across the country, over time.

Life, Liberty, and Property

State documents grant special status to life, liberty, and property. The federal constitution protects their holdings with assurances of due legal process and just compensation. States offer similar legal provisions but often include additional, emphatic declarations that highlight commitment to these ideals. This tradition dates back to 1776 when states used their constitutions to reiterate their allegiance to the Declaration of Independence and to ground their revolutionary causes with righteousness from nature and God. Initially, more than half the states noted, as Virginia did, “[t]hat all . . . have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.” By reiterating that fundamental principle that the British had denied Americans, writers placed purpose and legitimacy into their constitutions. Without this foundation, states were as tyrannous as their motherland. Knowing this, constitutional designers sometimes added declarations like Alabama’s specifying that “the sole object and only legitimate end of government is to protect the citizens in the enjoyment of life, liberty, and property; and when the government assumes other functions, it is usurpation and oppression.”

States continue to emphasize the foundational value of life, liberty, and property. Some early entrants later modified their constitutions to pledge support to these ideals explicitly, as did South Carolinians nearly a century after they joined the union. Others attested to their value at inception, as did states across the mountainous west, where inhabitants still migrate specifically to live freely, far away from government intrusions and population clusters. Alaska, among the very last to write its own constitution, begins by noting its dedication to the principle “that all persons have a natural right to life, liberty, the pursuit of happiness, and the enjoyment of the rewards of their own industry.”

America’s early history suggests that states took their protective job seriously. Southern responses to slavery infringements, including early nullification and separation threats as well as later, actual succession, exemplify how far states were willing to go. Of course, from a contemporary perspective, states have always selectively enforced their declaratory commitments to life, liberty, and property. For generations, not only southern slaves, but also free men of color, hardly enjoyed a life of liberty and secure property holding. Like these Americans, other selected minorities, such as Chinese railroad workers during the turn of the last century or Japanese citizens during World War II, experienced state and national infringements of these fundamental liberties.

Historical transgressions aside, states have successfully used their declaratory commitments to life, liberty, and property to justify and explain certain actions. In fact, they have sometimes used them to extend citizen protections beyond what the Supreme Court requires of them. Although hard to comprehend today, protections to slave owners then constituted meaningful protection of property. Furthermore, early state security for western settlers was a form of property protection, even though it harmed the lives, liberties, and properties of Native Americans, then considered members of a separate, hostile nation. Likewise, the protection these declaratory commitments offer now sometimes causes harm to others. For example, this specific clause permits California and other states to justify excluding political canvassers from soliciting private shop owners.

First Amendment Protections

State constitutions also give preeminence to First Amendment concerns. The federal document lumps together freedoms regarding religious exercise, speech, press, assembly, and government petition, forbidding Congress to abridge any of them. In comparison, states generally list each concern separately and emphatically. This delineation originally reflected revolutionary dismay with British infringements. More than concerns deserving legal protection, these were considered natural, fundamental, inalienable rights, belonging to each and every individual by birth, not convention. For example, New Hampshire's first constitution noted that "among the natural rights, some are in their very nature unalienable . . . [O]f this kind are the RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE." Arkansas's first document specified that "[t]he free communication of thoughts and opinion is one of the invaluable rights of man." States commonly used several declarations—often eight—to iterate the value of First Amendment liberties. At the same time, most constitutions noted that these rights belonged to all except when individual actions disturbed the peace or common good. In concurrence with this caveat, states across America, over time, restricted—either through constitutional or ordinary law—the very liberties to which they declared such emphatic allegiance.

In the case of religious freedom, today we think of free conscience as the liberty to believe in the Almighty or not, to show humility by wearing a veil or not, to observe a Sabbath or not. This kind of religious freedom requires widespread tolerance of personal practices. However, original settlers escaping religious persecutions in Europe did not seek broad religious tolerance. Rather, they sought and created small religious communities, granting dissenting inhabitants freedom to exit, enter other, or start new societies. Colonial charters incorporated these ideals first by granting a right of conscience, a right reflecting the belief that no sword could engender faith, that true devotion to God was neither outwardly knowable nor truly controllable. Documents then outlined the colony's religious foundation and purpose, requiring individuals to accept these original principles, face penal consequences, or leave.

Although more secular than their colonial counterparts, early state constitutions still promoted religious faith, most often Protestantism. Virginia's first constitution was not exceptional in noting that practicing religion was "the duty which we owe to our Creator." Some states, like Pennsylvania, noted that no one "who acknowledges the being of a God" may be "deprived or abridged of any civil right as a citizen on account of his religious sentiments." Nonbelievers had no guarantees and depended on the mercy of legislators. In Massachusetts not only was it "the duty of all men in society . . . to worship the Supreme Being," but only Christians were granted equal protection of the law. Most state constitutions also restricted office holding, requiring leaders to profess the Christian faith, declare the Divine nature of the Bible, or attest to the Trinity or afterlife. Several did not prohibit church establishment, thereby permitting legislative enactment. Massachusetts constitutionally allowed taxpayer moneys to fund local churches and religious schools. Despite all this, however, revolutionary America secured a religious freedom unthinkable in Europe and worth a dangerous journey to experience.

During the antebellum period, states retracted many constitutional provisions favoring Christians. By the 1830s, no state gave money to a specific church. Constitutional provisions permitting or encouraging this were removed. By 1853, only Maryland and Ohio specifically extended civil rights to Christians only. None specifically required officeholders to proclaim faith in Christianity, although several continued to stipulate, as Mississippi did, that "no person who denies the existence of a Supreme Being shall hold any office in this State." Only a handful of constitutions extended free conscience only to those paying God homage.

Despite this shift, subtle religious biases remained for generations to come. For example, mid-nineteenth century constitutional reforms to secularize schools usually aimed to deny Catholics an education free of Protestant teachings. Similar education maneuverings arose at the turn of the century when immigrants arrived at record levels, and politicians worried about cultural stability. Today, some Judeo-Christian biases remain, such as prominent court displays of the Ten Commandments, government office closures on Sunday, and property tax exemptions for churches. Even so, religious diversity is a tolerated reality across America. The federal government helps ensure this outcome, but individual state acts play an ongoing role.

Other First Amendment liberties demonstrate similar patterns: early protections that were substantial yet restrictive. For example, since the Revolution, the press enjoyed great freedom covering elections and exercised it liberally. True, malicious claims against candidates required proof, unpleasant truths needed justification, and proven libel resulted in punishment. True too, early enforcements were politically motivated. Yet, since independence, electoral political campaigns have been colorfully covered, sometimes viciously. In contrast, other writings suffered. Until the Civil War, antislavery publications were outlawed across most of America. In the late nineteenth and early twentieth century, state courts upheld legislative banning of birth control topics, declaring them a form of obscenity. They sustained routine denial of speaker permits for socialists, unionists, and women's rights advocates, thereby effectively silencing their views. In all these cases, states constitutionally restrained these activities in the name of peace and the common good.

Most state constitutions still separately enumerate each First Amendment liberty and explicitly acknowledge each's fundamental status. However, some states have since adopted the language found in the U.S. Constitution. For almost two centuries, New York described free conscience in positive and emphatic terms. It separately honored freedom of speech and freedom of press. However, in the mid-twentieth century, New York collapsed these together and described their protective liability together, exactly as the federal document does. This change reflects a widespread phenomenon: Most states—even those with ongoing separately lauded rights—now willingly “lock in step” with the national understanding of First Amendment guarantees. For example, a Supreme Court “test” denies many obscene acts free speech protection. Most states endorse and use this measure. Some, however, rely on their own constitutions and common law practices to evaluate obscenity cases. Their investigations may sustain a particular national ruling, but they may not. Oregon, one of these independent states, has explicitly rejected the Supreme Court's obscenity standards, arguing its own free speech provisions unconditionally protect obscene acts.

Protections for the Accused

Largely because rights for the accused have theoretical grounding in a legal tradition dating back centuries, the union and its states share similar parchment guarantees. Although various states flesh out each right individually, sometimes having fifteen or twenty separately listed protections, they offer few extra parchment guarantees. For example, two-thirds of the states have search and seizure stipulations basically identical to the Fourth Amendment. About the same number prohibit warrants without probable cause in the same manner the United States does. In both instances, only a handful of state constitutions specify protections less inclusive than the federal document. Several offer more detailed provisions on just punishments, jury requirements, and trial procedures.

Because constitutional provisions for the accused originate from the same long-standing philosophical and legal traditions, each state has always extended numerous guarantees, protecting citizens from tyrannous government prosecution. Principles also led to enhanced practical applications. For example, prohibitions against cruel and unusual punishment led states across America to introduce penitentiaries and reduce the number of crimes requiring capital punishment. Some states even outlawed a death penalty. At the same time, variations and misapplications existed. During the antebellum period, juries were under attack. Scholars, jurists, and politicians began questioning whether ordinary people could or should determine the meaning of the law or even guilt in particular criminal cases. Limited constitutional guidelines enabled state legislators and judges to control jury effectiveness by imposing restrictions on the number of jurors, the nature of their deliberation, and the character of their grouping. Here began the new protocol: Judges would interpret law; juries could determine fact. The introduction of plea bargaining further diminished the value of guaranteed trial rights. Marginalized groups especially suffered then and throughout U.S. history. For more than 100 years, women and blacks could not serve as jurors. Men of color often required extra witnesses to prove another guilty. Several states did not offer the poor free legal counsel.

In the past fifty years, some states have revised their constitutions to comply with national standards. For example, Virginia's constitution now enumerates the criminal proceedings that the Supreme Court mandates. Even states without explicit written compliance generally abide by the court's rulings on this and similar matters. However, not all blindly follow directives from above. For example, the Supreme Court denies strong search and seizure protections to vehicles stopped for traffic violations. Many states nonetheless limit police actions in these circumstances. Moreover, while currently prosecutors may use evidence seized in good faith without a valid warrant, some states reject this privilege, arguing that such evidence is unconstitutional according to their own standards. Finally, certain states reject capital punishment regardless of the crime.

State Guarantees of Other “Civil” Liberties

States protect other liberties not outlined in first eight amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Some of these guarantees also originate from principles that English settlers brought with them to the Americas. Among these is the community’s right to govern itself, a liberty that necessitates voting privileges for individual citizens. No American can forget the revolutionary cry “No taxation without representation!” Pursuant with this exclamation, from declared independence onward, state constitutions have always embraced self-government, along with the franchise, as an essential liberty, necessary to prevent government infringement of all other coveted liberties. In addition, since colonial times, the legal rights and privileges of most everyday affairs have been regional concerns. For example, early charters detailed punishments for adultery and limitations on wife beating; they also included marriage and childrearing responsibilities. Independent states followed suit, constitutionally imposing some requirements and adjudicating others. For most of our union’s history, states determined matters dealing with sexual activity, marriage, divorce, and child rearing.

Self-Government

Nearly all state documents praise popular sovereignty. Most revolutionary constitutions echoed Virginia’s declaration that “all power is vested in . . . the people” and that to protect rights and the common good “a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it.” As with other civil liberties, this emphatic allegiance reflects the initial stature of popular sovereignty as a preeminent revolutionary cause. The Declaration of Independence proclaimed its fundamental nature, and state documents followed that example.

The vast majority of revolutionary and antebellum constitutions declared self-government foundationally important. More than half went further, acknowledging the purpose of popular political influence, proclaiming, as Missouri did, that the people had “the inherent, sole, and exclusive right of regulating the internal government . . . and of altering and abolishing their constitution and form of government whenever it may be necessary to their safety and happiness.” As a result of the Civil War, states now temper the proclaimed purpose of popular sovereignty by denying any secession privilege. Yet, this restriction is always noted separately, leaving original proclamations of self-government’s fundamentally innate and instrumental value unspoiled.

Over the years states have expanded the people’s practical decision-making influence. During the antebellum period, states eliminated property and taxpaying requirements for voters and officers. Many appointed positions became elective. During the progressive era, constitutions granted citizens opportunities to affect legislation directly, through initiatives and referenda. These changes certainly aimed to regulate government’s economic influence, preventing large debt or circumventing special interest development. Yet, everyone recognized that these reforms and the popular sovereignty ideal they reflected were intricately connected to civil liberties. Advocates contended that those without voting or decision-making privileges held their rights precariously, at the whim of the privileged. Critics feared that additional voters or newly offered avenues of popular influence would unwittingly destroy life, liberty, and property. Many documents reflect the reform view, using words similar to North Dakota’s that “[a]ll men . . . have certain inherent rights,” and “to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.” The revolutionary claim that civil liberty strongly depended on the people’s ultimate sovereignty remains a concept widely acknowledged in state constitutions.

Contemporary skeptics question this euphoric view, arguing that extensive popular control, especially over constitution making and judicial selections, potentially harms civil liberty protections. Permitting constitutional revision by simple ballot measure may obscure rights provisions, polluting constitutions by introducing into them ordinary legislation and even contradicting rights stipulations. For example, extensive restrictions on land development overwhelm property’s preeminence. Additions like California’s Victim’s Bill of Rights unwittingly trammel on the accused. Skeptics further argue that popular sovereignty, especially when unleashed, undermines constitutional government itself. The initiative permits citizens to rewrite protections as public opinion dictates. Judicial reliance on frequent reelection encourages men of law to heed the people’s whim and thereby treat provisions as pliable words rather than foundational law.

These concerns prohibit many from considering popular sovereignty among the state-protected liberties; yet this conclusion is premature. All rights sometimes conflict with another. Protecting one right, say political speech, sometimes comes at the expense of another, say property or privacy. Furthermore, some features of political voice, namely freedom of speech, assembly, and petition, are nationally recognized as civil liberties, valuable in part because they help prevent government tyranny. The federal constitution's initial silence on the franchise and its exercise does not diminish their equally foundational importance in a free society.

Like other constitutionally enumerated liberties, state implementation of the popular sovereignty ideal did not result in its universal enjoyment across America. Women lacked the vote until late into the nineteenth century, when states, beginning with Wyoming, began extending the privilege to both sexes. Only after the union's nineteenth amendment did all states enfranchise women. The case of African Americans entails an even harsher reality. Initially, many northern states extended suffrage regardless of color. However, the end of property restrictions and the feared migration of newly freed slaves led these states to include only whites. Even when U.S. constitutional edict declared African Americans free citizens, with voting rights privileges, clever state machinations prevented enforcement for generations to come.

Personal Rights

Other important liberties largely under state control include economic and privacy rights. Although ordinary and common law govern many aspects of these affairs, state constitutions also regulate them using stipulations in rights declarations and elsewhere. For example, around the mid-nineteenth century, in response to overzealous and party-motivated involvement in the economy and various industries, several states made just compensation a guiding constitutional principle of adjudication. They and others limited or abolished imprisonment for debt. At the turn of the century, state constitutions introduced rights protecting citizens from railroads, monopolies, and public utilities. Various laws protecting children and factory workers were then upheld by these and other constitutional guarantees.

States have long concerned themselves with privacy issues also. During the nineteenth century, common law principles guided state determinations in these regards. For example, judges ruled that married women jointly owned their husband's property and that men owed seduced women reparation. In the twentieth century, states introduced constitutional provisions affecting women and marriage. For example, half of the states constitutionally grant men and women equal protection under the law. In response to scattered local sanctions of same-sex marriage, many states added constitutional provisions defining marriage as a union between a man and a woman. Few statutes or constitutional stipulations concern child-rearing directly, but questions of divorce custody and adoption eligibility fall squarely under state jurisdiction, relying on judicial interpretation of ordinary and common law. Moreover, early education, an essential component of child development, is a constitutional matter. Many state documents declare education an inherent right, of fundamental value. Nearly all outline sources for its funding. The Supreme Court, through rulings such as condoning the Amish custom not to educate girls or rejecting mandatory education for illegal immigrant children, continues to reject the unqualified emphasis so many states grant education.

As with other civil liberties, who enjoyed protections, when and where, varied across states. Through much of the nineteenth century, Protestants alone enjoyed free education unencumbered. The practice of separate but equal education relegated many black children to second-rate, poorly funded schools. For more than a century states banned birth control and criminalized abortion. Until an early twenty-first-century ruling, many prohibited sodomy. For generations, states prevented individuals from seeking the mate of their choice. For a short time, western states outlawed marriages between Chinese and whites. In some places, interracial marriage remained a legal taboo until the mid-twentieth century, when the Supreme Court barred miscegenation laws. These restrictions loosened over time, often by state volition alone. Some remain. Segregated education continues, albeit through legal methods of tracking and the like. The majority of states currently forbid same-sex marriage.

Alongside these restraints, personal liberty flourished and expanded. For example, local courts throughout the country redefined common law so that nineteenth-century women gained equality and respect in and outside marriage. They banned marriage to young minors and between close blood relations. Later, these same courts sought to enforce legal and constitutional statutes aimed at protecting children and laborers from excessive factory demands. Throughout the progressive period, constitutions regulated railroads and public utilities as well as corporations, hoping to help citizens retain benefits of competition. Several permitted women suffrage before the federal amendment. Despite constitutional specifications to the contrary, some local judges continue redefining marriage. Moreover, several state constitutions describe privacy as a fundamental right.

Civil Liberty Protections Today

Because the nation has become the main protector of civil liberties, one easily forgets that for close to 200 years states exercised this job almost exclusively. How the federal government gained and retains this protective authority illuminates what future role states may play.

Neither the federal constitution nor its first twelve amendments sanctioned the government to sidestep states and protect individual liberties. In fact, initial designers of that now-powerful document explicitly argued that civil liberty protection remained eminent state domain. Yet, skeptics immediately recognized that the new government threatened regional autonomy. People then worried not that the federal government would take over rights protection, but that it would overstep its delegated arena of power, pass and enforce laws restricting citizen rights, dominate and destroy states along with their protective abilities, and thereby destroy any semblance of freedom in America. The very eight amendments currently delineating our civil liberties constituted the Federalist response to these fears. Although the initial wording of the First Amendment shows that some founders wanted the nation to help police liberties then under state supervision, the first Congress rejected this.

Despite Congressional insistence that all the initial amendments only restrict federal powers, the scope of the new government's control was soon brought to the Supreme Court. Here, Chief Justice John Marshall determined that the post-founding revisions aimed strictly at preventing national infringements on the people's liberty, that states had independent control in matters outlined in the first eight amendments. This view became the standard for nearly a century thereafter.

As already noted, early state dominance resulted in disparities across the union. Constitutional variations, particularly in implementation, proved harsh and suffocating for certain groups but remained sustainable and tolerable largely because state documents reflected cultural diversity and accommodated popular opinion. The dissatisfied could migrate to a state with preferable laws, mores, and opportunities. Runaway slaves often made this choice during the antebellum period, as did free men of color later that century. The relative ease of constitutional revision permitted another outlet for the dissatisfied. Citizens could respond to unwanted provisions through the amendment process, something they frequently did throughout our history.

Conflict over slavery, most particularly the war it instigated between the states, initiated the demise of state control over civil liberties. Victorious northerners orchestrated reconstruction amendments that authorized the federal government to delimit and define citizenship and its privileges. Drafters and defenders believed that the Fourteenth Amendment extended nationally the guarantees outlined in the first eight amendments. However, subsequent reality proved the folly of their expectations. Before the end of the century, the Supreme Court determined that the Fourteenth Amendment did not incorporate existing national guarantees. Pursuant with this, the Court overturned national civil rights legislation seeking to minimize racial discrimination. It maintained state laws prohibiting interracial marriage and integration in schools, transportation, and the like. Even in cases not involving race, the Court examined contested acts on a case-by-case basis, exploring individually whether disputed concerns were fundamental and substantive enough to merit national interference.

Fifty years later, the Court began empowering these reconstruction amendments. In the 1920s, it ruled that First Amendment stipulations regarding speech and press applied directly to the states. Only when words resulted in a clear and present danger could state restriction be justified. By the forties, the court began addressing state entanglement with religion, explaining that the First Amendment protected Jehovah's Witnesses who refused to salute the flag on religious grounds. Twenty years later, the Court deemed that mandatory prayer and Bible reading in schools were unconstitutional. In the thirties and again in the sixties, Supreme Court rulings ensured that those accused in state courts enjoyed the same rights as those accused in federal courts. It banned state use of evidence found through unreasonable searches and seizures, granted every American access to free legal counsel, and upheld the privilege against self-incrimination, requiring enforcement agents to remind arrestees across America of this right. Even privacy rights became a national concern, so that now practicing birth control, engaging in sodomy, aborting an unwanted pregnancy are all mandated guarantees.

These clear national directives took away much of the independent power states once had defining and protecting civil liberties. However, just when the power of the Supreme Court seemed final, scholars and notable judges offered a new directive, urging states to use nationally outlined protections to determine minimal guarantees and to use their own constitutional traditions to extend liberties beyond that. This plea led to subtle variations, with some states, like California and Oregon, granting their inhabitants greater protections than the federal government does. Although few states exercise this independence consistently, its possibility opens the door for future, expanded state involvement in civil liberty protection.

In addition to this potential for increased state influence, other unpredictable factors affect the future power states may have in protecting liberties. Jurisdictions depend on Supreme Court rulings. What currently remains a state concern, say marriage requirements, can easily be incorporated into the national fold. The Supreme Court need only declare that state differentiation between same and different sex couples goes against the equal protection clause, and overnight states would lose this domain. Likewise, any current nationally protected right may be returned to state jurisdiction. The Court has already accepted many state-legislated restrictions on abortion. Permitting even tighter ones could de facto return control to states.

Public opinion, not just Court whim, fosters confusion over the current and future role of state control in matters of civil liberty. History has shown that without voluntary compliance few Supreme Court pronouncements become accepted practice. States and the individuals composing them sometimes ignore national mandates. Presidents desiring reelection rarely go against such defiance. The Court, lacking the power of the sword, can offer no independent enforcement. For example, community schools often defy integration requirements through self-selecting tracking programs. Small religious communities, like the Hasidic ones in Brooklyn, effectively destroy businesses that do not close in observation of their Saturday Sabbath. Many states permit local communities to ban handgun ownership within their borders. In each case, enjoyed civil liberties differ from national standards.

Isolating the civil liberties under state jurisdictions is difficult. Much of the independent power states retain depends on whether the Supreme Court offers specific guidelines, whether local judges choose to "lock in step" with these guidelines, and whether communities exert independent influence. There exist few immutable directives outlining which level of government protects which civil liberty. That protective distribution largely hinges on the fourteenth amendment, which itself elicits ongoing, rigorous debate as to its scope. How much civil liberty protection states exert strongly depends on human determination.

Certainly where states currently have or might reinherit jurisdiction, there exist adequate constitutional guidelines, in place since the beginning of America's independent existence. However, only time will tell whether states—when asked to do so—will successfully and uniformly implement their extensively declared guarantees.

LAURA J. SCALIA

References and Further Reading

- Bryce, James. The American Commonwealth. Two Volumes. 1888, reprint ed., Indianapolis: Liberty Press, 1995.
- Cronin, Thomas E. Direct Democracy: The Politics of Initiative, Referendum, and Recall. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1989.
- Elazar, Daniel J. American Federalism: A View from the States. New York: Thomas J. Crowell, 1972.
- Finkelman, Paul, and Stephen Gottlieb, eds. Toward a Usable Past: Liberty under State Constitutions. Athens: University of Georgia Press, 1991.
- Fritz, Christian. Rethinking the American Constitutional Tradition: National Dimensions in the Formation of State Constitutions, Rutgers Law Journal 26 (summer 1995): 969–992.
- Hall, Kermit L. The Magic Mirror: Law in American History. New York: Oxford University Press, 1989.
- , ed. By and For the People: Constitutional Rights in American History. Arlington Heights, IL: Harlan Davidson, Inc. 1991.
- Kruman, Marc W. Between Authority and Liberty: State Constitution Making in Revolutionary America. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press, 1997.
- Latzer, Barry. State Constitutions and Criminal Justice. New York: Greenwood Press, 1991.
- Lutz, Donald S. Popular Consent and Popular Control: Whig Political Theory in the Early State Constitutions. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1980.
- . The Origins of American Constitutionalism. Baton Rouge: Louisiana State University Press, 1988.
- Rosenberg, Gerald. The Hollow Hope: Can Courts Bring About Social Change? Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1991.
- Scalia, Laura J. America's Jeffersonian Experiment: Remaking State Constitutions, 1820–1850. DeKalb: Northern Illinois University Press, 1999.
- Swindler, William F., ed. Sources and Documents of United States Constitutions. Ten Volumes. Dobbs Ferry, NY: Oceana Publications, Inc. 1973.
- Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1998.
- , ed. Constitutional Politics in the States: Contemporary Controversies and Historical Patterns. New York: Greenwood Press, 1996.

See also Abolitionist Movement; Accommodation of Religion; American Revolution; Application of First Amendment to States; Ballot Initiatives; Bills of Rights in Early State Constitutions; Child Custody and Foster Care; Church Property after the American Revolution; Defiance of Court's Ban on School Prayer; Disestablishment of State Churches in the Late Eighteenth Century and Early Nineteenth Century; Economic Regulation; Fourteenth Amendment; Freedom of Speech and Press; Nineteenth Century; Incorporation Doctrine; Jury Trial Right; Jury Trials and Race; Magna Carta; Natural Law, Eighteenth Century Understanding; Religion in Nineteenth-Century Public Education (Includes “Bible Wars”); Ratification Debate, Civil Liberties in; Religious Liberty under Eighteenth-Century State Constitutions; Same-Sex Unions; Self-Governance and Free Speech; Shopping Centers and Freedom of Speech; State Aid to Religious Schools; State Constitution, Privacy Provisions; State Constitutional Distinctions; State Constitutions, Modern History, Civil Liberties under; Ten Commandments on Display in Public Buildings; Theories of Civil Liberties; Virginia Declaration of Rights (1776)

STATE CONSTITUTIONS, MODERN HISTORY, CIVIL LIBERTIES UNDER

Civil liberties under state constitutions did not receive concerted attention from either modern scholars or the judiciary until the close of the Warren Court. From 1897 to 1969, as the Supreme Court federalized civil liberties through the incorporation doctrine that applied provisions of the federal Bill of Rights against the states through the Fourteenth Amendment’s due process clause, state courts seldom turned to the protections of the bills of rights in their own constitutions. Although there were notable exceptions, such as the state courts that adopted the exclusionary rule and the right to counsel before being required to do so, frequently the state courts merely followed the example set by the Supreme Court, even when interpreting their own constitutions. Not surprisingly, then, state constitutions were not a subject of academic interest during most of the twentieth century. In fact, in 1966, Professor Lester J. Mazor noted that no treatise existed on state constitutional law or civil liberties under state constitutions.

However, as the Burger Court replaced the Warren Court, a new awakening regarding the civil liberties protected by state constitutions emerged. Many scholars, state court judges, and even a Supreme Court justice urged the states to not merely parrot the federal interpretation of civil liberties but to engage in their own independent examination of the guarantees contained in their fundamental state charters. Such an independent scrutiny is permissible because, although the U.S. Supreme Court’s decisions are binding on questions of federal law, they are not dispositive of the rights provided by state constitutions, even with respect to provisions that protect similar rights. As the Supreme Court held in PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins (1980), state constitutions may protect a different scheme of constitutional values as long as the resulting liberty structure does not violate the provisions of the supreme federal Constitution.

PruneYard upheld the California Supreme Court’s determination that its state constitution protected free speech and petitioning rights at a privately owned shopping center, even though the Supreme Court had reached a contrary result under the U.S. Constitution in Lloyd Corporation v. Tanner (1972). The shopping center contended, among its other arguments, that Lloyd barred the state from granting free speech rights to citizens on its property. But the Supreme Court disagreed, reasoning that while Lloyd constrained the reach of free speech rights under the federal Constitution, it was well established that the state could adopt in its own constitution more expansive individual liberties so long as this state constitutional grant did not contravene any provision of the U.S. Constitution. This well-established principle authorizes an independent system of civil liberties under a state constitution. All that remained was to provide a reason to create one.

The New Judicial Federalism Movement

The impetus for an independent state civil rights jurisprudence stemmed at least partially from a desire to preserve the individual civil liberties established by the Warren Court against their erosion by the more conservative approaches used by the Burger Court and later the Rehnquist Court. Although the Burger and Rehnquist Courts did not explicitly overrule Warren Court landmarks, such as Griffin v. Illinois (1956), Mapp v. Ohio (1961), Gideon v. Wainwright (1963), and Miranda v. Arizona (1966), these decisions were frequently narrowed by later rulings creating exceptions to their principles. For some proponents, state constitutions, statutes, and judicial decisions held the only promise to continue the progressive liberties revolution of the Warren Court.

Yet it would be unfair to merely characterize this as an ideological movement. The call to examine state constitutions was motivated at least equally by the appropriate dual protection of liberty under the American federal system. James Madison envisioned in The Federalist Papers that a “double security” would arise to the “rights of the people” from the division of governmental power between the federal and state governments and among the branches of each. As the federal judiciary established a framework for judicial enforcement of civil liberties, Madison's federal vision could best be served by an independent judicial examination of the rights guaranteed by the state constitutions. The movement became known as the new judicial federalism, although sometimes either "new" or "judicial" is omitted.

New judicial federalism urged that state constitutional liberties should not be relegated to a subordinate position, especially considering that they were the original source of American freedoms. State bills of rights actually preceded the federal charter, their existence being one of the reasons that the Constitutional Convention of 1787 did not deem a federal statement of rights necessary. The Bill of Rights ratified in 1791 borrowed pervasively from state constitutions, appropriating almost every one of its provisions from an existing state bill of rights. Thus, from a historical perspective, state constitutions were the wellspring of the American conception of civil liberties. The adherents to the new judicial federalism contended this influence should continue even under modern American federalism. The states could secure rights based on the local concerns of their citizens, being more responsive to their needs. The states could also serve as laboratories of experimentation regarding the appropriate level of liberty, without having to establish a uniform federal rule applicable to all fifty states.

The best known and most cited piece of scholarship encouraging new judicial federalism, even though many of its ideas had previously been expressed, is Justice William J. Brennan's article State Constitutions and the Protections of Individual Rights. Brennan urged that, despite federal incorporation, the state constitutions should not be forgotten, as they too "are a font of individual liberties, their protections often extending beyond those required by the Supreme Court's interpretation of federal law." He continued that the Court's decisions should not be considered dispositive of civil liberties guaranteed by state law counterparts. Instead, he urged that, as the Burger Court's decisions had diminished protection of federal civil rights, the state courts needed to respond by increasing their own scrutiny to safeguard liberty.

Many others also provided scholarly commentary encouraging and defending the new judicial federalism, including notable contributions by Professor (later Oregon Supreme Court Justice) Hans A. Linde, California Supreme Court Justice Stanley Mosk, Wisconsin Supreme Court Justice Shirley Abrahamson, and Professor Robert F. Williams. However, not all the commentary has been favorable. Professor Earl M. Malz contended that the new judicial federalism actually does not further principles of federalism, but instead merely tends to subject state legislative determinations to another level of judicial review, thereby reducing governmental flexibility, breeding uncertainty, and increasing the costs of the legal system. Professor James A. Gardner objected that the very premise of state constitutionalism envisioned by new judicial federalism was flawed, evidenced by the conflict among state constitutional decisions and the refusal of thousands of decisions to engage in an independent analysis of state constitutional liberties. Even supporters of the new judicial federalism had to concede that the states had not consistently embraced the tenets of the movement.

State Judicial Interpretations

Although the number of state judicial decisions interpreting state civil liberties in a different manner than the federal Constitution is now large enough that most have stopped counting, such decisions still represent the minority approach. A 2000 study by Professor James N. G. Cauthen found that state supreme courts during a twenty-five-year period followed the federal analysis in more than two thirds of all cases raising an issue of individual liberties. Thus, although the quest for state judicial independence on civil liberties has met with some successes, it is not the norm.

Nevertheless, the new judicial federalism movement has significantly influenced the judiciary's interpretation of civil liberties in a number of states, including, among others, California, Florida, Massachusetts, Alaska, Hawaii, New Jersey, and Oregon. Some state court decisions even preceded Justice Brennan's article, rejecting or refusing to await federal constitutional decisions and relying instead on state constitutions to protect the rights of their citizens. The most famous early example was People v. Anderson (1972), where the California Supreme Court held that the death penalty violated the state constitutional prohibition on "cruel or unusual punishment." The court relied on the California constitutional convention's rejection of the Eighth Amendment's "cruel and unusual" language, the early history of the provision, and conceptions of fundamental justice. Although Anderson's result was later overturned by a California constitutional amendment reinstating the death penalty, the case still is an early recognition of the "responsibility to separately define and protect the rights of California citizens" later explicitly articulated by that same court in People v. Disbrow (1976).

Other early state court decisions came to similar conclusions. The Alaska Supreme Court in Baker v. City of Fairbanks (1970) rejected the application of the petty offense exception to the right to jury trial under its state constitution, concluding “we are under a duty, to develop additional constitutional rights and privileges under our Alaska Constitution if we find such fundamental rights and privileges to be within the intention and spirit of our local constitutional language and to be necessary for the kind of civilized life and ordered liberty which is at the core of our constitutional heritage.” The Hawaii Supreme Court in State v. Kaluna (1974) noted that it had and would continue to “extend the protections of the Hawaii Bill of Rights beyond those of textually parallel provisions in the Federal Bill of Rights when logic and a sound regard for the purposes of those protections have so warranted.” Over the decades since the 1970s, such state judicial declarations of independence have only become more common.

The resulting state court decisions have touched almost every aspect of American constitutional liberties. Particularly significant have been those holdings protecting additional rights for criminal defendants, dismantling unequal school financing schemes, authorizing free speech rights on private property, invalidating exclusionary zoning practices, extending the rights of privacy and equality, expanding religious liberty, requiring state funding for abortions, and recognizing same-sex marriage and unions. Yet, in almost all these situations, two to three times as many state courts have not read their state charters to protect such liberties.

Although many commentators bemoan this divergence, arguably it is an expected consequence of American federalism. The states will vary in the manner in which their citizens balance liberty against security, individual freedom against community morals, and private property against public needs. For some states, the United States Supreme Court has already protected individual rights as far, if not farther, than their preferred balance. For other states wanting to tip the balance more toward liberty, the new judicial federalism is another mechanism to do so. Nevertheless, the fixation on judicial interpretation should not obscure a more direct avenue—state constitutional amendment.

State Constitutional Amendments

Since 1970, some states have enshrined additional civil liberties for their citizens into their state constitutions either by adopting a new constitution or amending an older one. Several states have adopted state constitutional privacy provisions, which provide a textual basis for the protection of privacy in contrast to the unenumerated federal right of privacy. In addition, fourteen states adopted their own state equal rights amendments during the 1970s, which were very similar to the never ratified federal ERA. Finally, two states, California and Rhode Island, even adopted constitutional amendments specifying that their state constitutional rights were not dependent on the U.S. Constitution.

Conversely, though, other modern state constitutional amendments have been designed to limit or overturn rights previously recognized by judicial decision. In addition to the California constitutional amendment reinstating the death penalty, other California amendments have dispensed with the state constitutional exclusionary rule and limited bus-ing to what is mandated by the federal Constitution. Massachusetts, Florida, Pennsylvania, and Hawaii have also ratified amendments that have modified the judicial interpretation of provisions of their bills of rights.

Thus, in many respects, the modern history of civil liberties under state constitutions is a continuing dialogue. The proponents of the new judicial federalism helped awaken an interest in independent state constitutional adjudication. Although the reception has been mixed, this movement has succeeded in increasing awareness of the potential to secure liberty through either state judicial interpretation or state constitutional amendment.

CHARLES W. “ROCKY” RHODES

References and Further Reading

- Abrahamson, Shirley S., Reincarnation of State Courts, Southwestern Law Journal 36, (November 1982): 951–974.
- Brennan, William J., Jr., State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights, Harvard Law Review 90 (January 1977): 489–504.
- Cauthen, James N. G., Expanding Rights under State Constitutions: A Quantitative Appraisal, Albany Law Review 63 (2000): 4: 1183–1204.
- Gardner, James A., The Failed Discourse of State Constitutionalism, Michigan Law Review 90 (February 1992): 761–837.
- Linde, Hans A., First Things First: Rediscovering the States' Bills of Rights, University of Baltimore Law Review 9 (Spring 1980): 379–396.
- Maltz, Earl M., False Prophet—Justice Brennan and the Theory of State Constitutional Law, Hastings Constitutional Law Quarterly 15 (Spring 1988): 429–449.
- Mazor, Lester J., Notes on a Bill of Rights in a State Constitution, Utah Law Review 1966 (September 1966): 326–350.
- Mosk, Stanley, State Constitutionalism: Both Liberal and Conservative, Tex. L. Rev. 63 (March/April 1985): 1081–1093.
- Rossiter, Clinton, ed. The Federalist Papers. New York: Mentor, 1961.

Tarr, G. Alan. Understanding State Constitutions. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1998.

Williams, Robert F., In the Supreme Court's Shadow: Legitimacy of State Rejection of Supreme Court Reasoning and Result, South Carolina Law Review 35 (Spring 1984): 353–404.

Cases and Statutes Cited

Baker v. City of Fairbanks, 471 P.2d 386 (Alaska 1970)

Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335 (1963)

Griffin v. Illinois, 351 U.S. 12 (1956)

Lloyd Corp. v. Tanner, 407 U.S. 551 (1972)

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961)

Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966)

People v. Disbrow, 545 P.2d 272 (Cal. 1976)

People v. Anderson, 493 P.2d 880 (Cal.), cert. denied, 406 U.S. 958 (1972)

PruneYard Shopping Center v. Robins, 474 U.S. 74 (1980)

State v. Kaluna, 520 P.2d 51 (Hawaii 1974)

See also Bills of Rights and in Early State Constitutions; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties

STATE COURTS

State courts enforce both state and federal constitutional protections. State constitutions typically contain enumerations of protected liberties that echo the federal Bill of Rights, but the state provisions sometimes differ. State courts can interpret state constitutions as either the same or more protective than the federal constitution. Generally, however, identical state and federal provisions are applied to provide the same degree of protection.

State courts also uphold federal constitutional rights. The supremacy clause requires state courts to enforce all federal laws, including the federal constitution. For example, a state court must apply the due process clause to a state civil or criminal case.

State courts have jurisdiction over cases involving federal law. Although Congress can legislate to give federal courts exclusive jurisdiction over matters of federal law, if it does not do so, then state courts have “concurrent jurisdiction.” When jurisdiction is concurrent, state courts usually have the same power to decide federal actions that federal courts possess. For example, a state court can hear an action for damages under 42 U.S.C. section 1983 for civil rights violations.

Decisions by state courts on matters of federal law, including federal constitutional protections, are subject to review by the United States Supreme Court. To review a state court decision, the Court must find a federal question. But the Court will decline to reverse even an erroneous decision of a federal question if it can find a correct ground in state law for upholding the decision.

JEFFERSON L. LANKFORD

References and Further Reading

Abrahamson, Shirley S., Criminal Law and State Constitutions: The Emergence of State Constitutional Law, Texas Law Review 63 (March/April 1985): 1141–1193.

Brennan, William J., Jr., State Constitutions and the Protection of Individual Rights, Harvard Law Review 90 (June 1977): 489–504.

Clafflin v. Houseman, 93 U.S. 130 (1876) (state obligation to follow federal law).

Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat. 304, 4 L.Ed. 97 (1816) (Supreme Court authority to review state court decisions).

Murdock v. City of Memphis, 20 Wall. 590, 22 L.Ed. 429 (1875) (Supreme Court authority limited to federal questions; court will affirm on independent state law ground).

Cases and Statutes Cited

42 U.S.C. section 1983

See also Incorporation Doctrine; Jurisdiction of the Federal Courts; State Constitutions and Civil Liberties; State Constitutions, Modern History, Civil Liberties under; Supremacy Clause

STATE REGULATION OF RELIGIOUS SCHOOLS

Although “state” can refer to any level of government, for “state regulation of religious schools,” “state” refers to any one of the fifty states to local governmental entities. The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution guarantees that “No state shall make or enforce any law which shall . . . deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.” The United States has a uniquely decentralized educational system; it gives individual states the primary responsibility of balancing “fundamental divergence of views concerning the role of the family, the function of the state, and ultimately, the origin and nature of man.” Every state has some form of compulsory education law. In all states, attendance at a private school is permitted as an alternative to public school attendance.

Approximately 80 percent of America’s private schools are religious institutions. A parent’s right to choose a private education is reflected in the statutes of the fifty states; where its well established that the states have the power to regulate these institutions. Under the auspices of the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act of 2000, the Senate explicitly states that “[t]he right to build, buy or rent such a space [for religious exercise] is an indispensable adjunct of the core First Amendment right to assemble for religious purposes.” Those purposes extend to encompass social, charitable, and educational programs.

Under the law of the United States, religious education is forbidden in public schools, except from a neutral, academic perspective. For a teacher or school administrator to endorse one religion is considered an infringement of the “establishment clause” of the First Amendment. However, the U.S. Constitution gives parents the fundamental right to direct the education of their children. In 1925, the Supreme Court recognized that “liberty” protected by the Fourteenth Amendment includes the right to choose a private education. Confronted with an Oregon statute mandating public school attendance, the Supreme Court ruled the statute unconstitutional. In the words of the Court, “The fundamental theory of liberty upon which all governments in this Union repose excludes any general power of the state to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only” (Pierce v. Society of Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)). In Wisconsin v. Yoder, the Court defined the government’s interest in compulsory education as that “degree of education . . . necessary to prepare individuals to be self-reliant and self-sufficient participants in society.” In Runyon v. McCrary, the Court limited the Pierce holding by asserting that the Pierce’s holding “simply affirmed the right of private schools to exist and operate.” And in Employment Division v. Smith, the Supreme Court determined that a neutral, generally applicable law that “incidentally” burdens religion is evaluated under the “rational basis” test. The “rational basis” test, asserts the state need only demonstrate that the regulation in question is rationally related to, or reasonably designed to, accomplish a legitimate governmental objective. Challenges to government regulation of private religious schools tend to focus on the test initiated in Lemon v. Kurtzman 403 U.S. 602 (1971), the so-called “Lemon test.” Under the Lemon test government regulation violates the establishment clause if it fails any of the following three requirements. First, the regulation must have a “secular purpose.” A regulation motivated, in part, by a religious purpose may be upheld as long as it is “not motivated wholly by religious considerations.” However, the “mere existence of some secular purpose” will not satisfy the test if the policy or practice is “dominated by religious purposes.” The second requirement is that the primary effect of the regulation in question must not be either to advance or inhibit religion. The third part of the test requires that the regulation in question not result in excessive entanglement of the government in matters of religion.

The Supreme Court has upheld a New Jersey statute that made transportation equally available to both public and private education; upheld a New York statute providing free textbooks on loan to parochial school students; and upheld placement of public school teachers in parochial schools to provide remedial education services under a federal program. Twenty-seven states and the Virgin Islands have provisions permitting public funding of transportation; Idaho law dictates that the costs must be recovered. Seventeen states have the power or duty to loan free textbooks to private school students. Although some states provide significant assistance for health needs such as immunization, vision/hearing services and diagnostic testing. Actual regulation of private schools remains the prerogative of state governments. Successful challenges to governmental regulations usually implicate both a Free Exercise claim and an alleged violation of another constitutionally protected right this is the so-called hybrid claim.

G. L. TYLER

References and Further Reading

- Cookson, Peter. School Choice: The Struggle for the Soul of American Education. New Haven, CT: Yale University Press, 1994.
 DeGraff, Eric A., State Regulation of Non-Public Schools: Ties that Bind, BYU Education and Law Journal 386 (2003).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Lemon v. Kurtzman*, 403 U.S. 602 (1971)
Myer v. Nebraska, 262 U.S. 390 (1923)
Pierce v. Society of Sisters of the Holy Names of Jesus and Mary, 268 U.S. 510 (1925)
Wisconsin v. Yoder, 406 U.S. 205 (1972)

STATE RELIGIOUS FREEDOM STATUTES

In the mid- to late 1990s, thirteen states passed enactments designed to protect religious practices from unnecessary government restriction. The state provisions emerged from the dispute over the U.S. Supreme Court’s decision in Employment Division v. Smith (1990), which held that the First Amendment’s free exercise clause seldom, if ever, gave religiously motivated conduct protection from the burdens of a “neutral law of general applicability.” The Smith holding potentially exposes religious practices—especially those of unfamiliar minorities—to widespread restriction from a host of general secular laws, and this prospect triggered a congressional remedy in the Religious Freedom Restoration Act of 1993 (RFRA). RFRA reinstated, as a statutory right, the standard of previous constitutional decisions: even a facially neutral law or regulation that imposes a “substantial burden” on religious exercise must be justified on the ground that it serves a “compelling governmental interest” and is the “least restrictive means” of doing so. However, the Supreme Court in City of Boerne v. Flores (1997) struck down RFRA in part on the ground that it exceeded Congress’s power to enforce Fourteenth Amendment rights against state and local governments.

Smith and Boerne together prompted religious freedom defenders to seek protections from state legislatures themselves through statutes tracking RFRA and its compelling-interest test. Beginning in 1993, but primarily from 1998 through 2000, “state RFRAs” or “mini RFRAs” passed as statutes in eleven states (Arizona, Connecticut, Florida, Idaho, Illinois, Missouri, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, and Texas) and as a constitutional amendment in one state (Alabama). Of course, the state-autonomy arguments invoked in Boerne to invalidate congressional action are inapplicable when the state places limits on its own laws in the name of religious freedom.

State enactments generally track RFRA’s “substantial burden”/“compelling interest” formulation, but some either narrow or broaden protection. A few exempt certain categories of laws and regulations from scrutiny, sometimes in frequently occurring disputes: South Carolina excludes religious-freedom claims by state prisoners; Texas excludes claims by religious institutions against civil rights laws and claims by churches against local zoning regulations. On the other hand, some statutes seek to keep the “burden” threshold for triggering protection from being set too high: Arizona makes clear that a burden on religion is “substantial” unless it is “de minimis” or technical, and Alabama removes the “substantial” qualifier altogether, likewise suggesting that minor burdens on religious practice still must be scrutinized.

The state enactments to date have been the subject of only a few judicial interpretations. Several appellate decisions note that state-RFRA claims were not raised in the trial court, suggesting that lawyers are not yet familiar with them. A decision of the Florida Supreme Court, however, exemplifies the threat of judges willing to shrink the scope of the statute even by means irreconcilable with its text. Florida’s statute defines religious exercise as “an act or refusal to act that is substantially motivated by a religious belief, whether or not the religious exercise is compulsory or central to a larger system of religious belief.” But the Florida court in Warner v. City of Boca Raton (2004) held that a burden on religion is not “substantial” unless it “compels the religious adherent to engage in conduct that his religion forbids or forbids him to engage in conduct that his religion requires”—thereby reimposing under substantiality the very same restriction, that the conduct be religiously compelled or forbidden, that the legislature had rejected in defining religious exercise.

“Mini RFRAs” offer the promise that states will give religious freedom a degree of protection that the U.S. Supreme Court has been reluctant to give under the First Amendment. But the state enactments will have little effect if they are overlooked by lawyers or whittled down by state judges—or conversely, if protections under federal law rebound from the low point where they seemed to be in the early 1990s.

THOMAS C. BERG

References and Further Reading

- Berg, Thomas C., and Frank H. Myers, The Alabama Religious Freedom Amendment: An Interpretive Guide, Cumberland Law Review 31 (2000–2001): 47–78.
- Dolan, Mary Jean, The Constitutional Flaws in the New Illinois Religious Freedom Restoration Act: Why State RFRAs Don’t Work, Loyola University Chicago Law Review 29 (2000): 153–197.
- Gildin, Gary S., A Blessing in Disguise: Protecting Religious Minorities through State Religious Freedom Non-Restoration Acts, Harvard Journal of Law and Public Policy 23 (2000): 411–486.
- Symposium: Restoring Religious Freedom in the States*, University of California Davis Law Review 32 (Spring 1999): 511–854 (various articles).

Cases and Statutes Cited

- City of Boerne v. Flores*, 521 U.S. 507 (1997)
- Employment Division v. Smith*, 494 U.S. 872 (1990)
- Warner v. City of Boca Raton*, 887 So. 2d 1023 (Fla. 2004)

STATUS OFFENSES

Status offenses are acts committed by a juvenile that are illegal only because the person committing them is a child. Major examples of such offenses include running away, truancy, ungovernability (incorrigibility or being beyond the control of one’s parents), and underage liquor law violations.

Status offenses are typically handled by special juvenile courts—tribunals originally designed to provide treatment and guidance, rather than punishment. Depending on the state, status offenses may be framed as delinquency matters—where a child is technically charged with a crime—or as dependency matters. In the latter case, the child is not characterized as a delinquent, and courts do not formally treat the status offense as criminal.

Although the number of status offense cases is dwarfed by the number of delinquency cases handled by juvenile courts, they still constitute a significant portion of juvenile courts' caseload, and their numbers are increasing. In 1996, state juvenile courts formally disposed of approximately 162,000 status offense cases—more than double the number they handled in 1987.

Under federal law, states are required (under penalty of losing federal funds) to treat status offenders differently than delinquents. Under the terms of the Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention Act of 1974, states are required to exclude status offenders from correctional and juvenile detention facilities. The Act requires status offenders to be housed in community "shelter facilities," and detained juveniles must be strictly separated from adult offenders. This provision reflected a social work ethos that has grown less popular in recent years.

Despite diversion and deinstitutionalization mandates, status offenders continue to be detained or institutionalized—or both. In nearly 10,000 of the status offense cases in 1995, the juvenile court ordered the minor detained. Although only half of all status offense cases resulted in conviction (or "adjudication" in juvenile court parlance) and most of those resulted in probation, 16 percent resulted in placement outside the home.

Critics say these practices disproportionately affect minorities, who experience higher detention rates, and girls, who are more likely to be charged with running away. Some policy advocates, including the American Bar Association, have advocated elimination of status offenses. Abolition of status offenses is particularly appropriate if one believes that juvenile courts are unsuitable child welfare agencies. For many, provision of social services is a preferable model to creating a criminal record for young offenders.

DANIEL M. FILLER

References and Further Reading

Sickmund, Melissa. Juveniles in Court (U.S. Dep't Justice, Office of Juvenile Justice and Delinquency Prevention, June 2003), www.ncjrs.gov/pdffiles1/ojjdp/195420.pdf.

STATUTORY RAPE

Statutory rape is distinguished from the common law offense of forcible rape, of which force and resistance are elements. The state must merely prove beyond a reasonable doubt that a defendant engaged in sexual intercourse with a person under the statutory age of consent. The nonconsent of the minor is not required, because the minor is deemed legally incapable of giving consent. Thus, statutory rape is a strict liability crime.

Two interrelated policy goals underlie statutory rape laws: (1) to prevent innocent and immature teenagers from consenting to sex in an uninformed manner; and (2) to deter men from preying on young females and coercing them into sexual relationships.

Most state statutes have designated an arbitrary age of consent, ranging from ten to eighteen years old. The age of consent is not tied to physical development, but rather reflects differing views regarding an adolescent's capacity to consent and whether sex with an adolescent is dangerous or morally undesirable.

Some state statutes include two or more age limits, with a harsher penalty when the victim falls within the lower age limit. Others define a range of age differences between adolescent participants inside of which sexual intercourse is lawful, thus excluding from prosecution sexual experimentation between contemporaries. Only five states have gender-specific provisions, justified on grounds of pregnancy prevention and the disproportionate burden that teenage pregnancy places on women. More than a third of states and the Model Penal Code recognize in some instances the defense of reasonable mistake as to age.

DEBORAH ZALESNE

References and Further Reading

Oberman, Michelle, Regulating Consensual Sex with Minors: Defining a Role for Statutory Rape, Buffalo Law Review 48 (2000): 703.

Giggetts, Stephanie A. 65 Am. Jur.2d Rape §§ 11–14, 20, 26, 84 (2004).

LaFave, Wayne. 2 Subst. Crim. L. § 17.4(c) (2d ed. 2005).

See also Rape; Strict Liability

STAY OF EXECUTION

In civil cases, a stay of execution is a court order that prevents a legal judgment from being carried out until the order is lifted, by either the court that issued the stay or a superior court.

In capital cases, a stay of execution precludes the state from putting a condemned prisoner to death until the stay is dissolved. In addition to judicial stays of execution, executive officials—including some governors and the president—are authorized to grant reprieves to death row inmates. Virtually all capital prisoners in the United States receive one or more stays of execution before their cases are resolved.

At the Supreme Court level, a minority of four justices is sufficient to grant certiorari and to force the Court to conduct a full review of a case. On the other hand, only three justices are required to place a “hold” on any certiorari petition that they consider related to a case already pending before the Court. The purpose of the “hold rule” is to ensure that parties to every case still pending on certiorari will receive the benefit of whatever changes in the law the Court might announce in an upcoming decision.

When capital prisoners appeal to the Court with an execution date already set, a certiorari grant or a hold vote is meaningless unless the Court also grants a stay of execution. In other words, a case the Court decided to hear (by granting certiorari) or decided to hold (because issues in a case pending before the Court might benefit the capital petitioner) would be rendered moot by the petitioner’s execution. Absent a stay, which requires five votes, the petitioner would be killed before the Court took final action on his case.

On rare occasions, stays of execution have been issued after the condemned prisoner has been strapped to a gurney and an intravenous saline solution has begun to flow. As Justice William Brennan noted in a written dissent to the Supreme Court’s denial or certiorari and refusal to grant a stay of execution to Texas prisoner James Autry.

Mr. Autry has already endured the profound psychological torment of lying strapped to a gurney for over an hour with an intravenous needle in his arm, waiting to be put to death. That wait was brought to an end by the grant of a last-minute stay permitting him time to vindicate his constitutional rights. Following today’s decision [denying a second stay of execution], however, he will again have to under to the same indignity and psychological anguish, knowing that this time will probably be the last.

Justice Brennan’s words proved prophetic, as James Autry was lethally injected not long after Brennan’s dissent in Autry v. McKaskle, 465 U.S. 1090 (1984) was completed.

According to a pair of researchers, California’s death row prisoner-turned author, Caryl Chessman, received a telephonic stay after he was strapped into California’s gas chamber. Just before the telephonic reprieve alerted prison officials, the executioner released the cyanide tablets into the acid solution beneath Chessman’s chair. Because there was no way to halt the execution, Chessman died.

In another case involving a California death row inmate Robert Alton Harris, during a nine and one-half-hour period, Harris received four separate stays of execution from various courts. The fourth stay of execution was issued telephonically while Harris was sealed in the gas chamber awaiting death. The state succeeded in getting all four stays of execution overturned, and Harris died in California’s gas chamber twelve hours after the entry of the first stay of execution, and only after the U.S. Supreme Court issued an extraordinary order directing lower courts to desist from issuing any further stays of execution.

RANDALL T. COYNE

References and Further Reading

- Gray and Stanley. A Punishment in Search of a Crime. Avon Books, 1989, p. 153.
Lungren and Krotoski, Public Policy Lessons from the Robert Alton Harris Case, U.C.L.A. Law Review 40 (1992): 295, 322–326.

Cases and Statutes Cited

- Autry v. McKaskle*, 465 U.S. 1090 (1984)

STEM CELL RESEARCH/RESEARCH USING FETAL TISSUE

What Are Stem Cells?

Stem cells are unspecialized cells that have the potential to develop into specialized cells that could form any part of the human body.

Why Are They Important?

Stem cells are important precisely because they can develop into any part of the human body. This opens the possibility that they could be used for regenerative therapies to treat illnesses and injuries. Some potential applications of this type of therapy might include the creation or regeneration of damaged organs to eliminate the need for transplantation, the treatment of degenerative neurological conditions such as Parkinson’s and Alzheimer’s disease, and the regeneration of nerves for those with spinal injuries. Although science is only just beginning to investigate the potential medical applications of stem cells, at this stage their potential seems almost unlimited.

Where Do Stem Cells Come From?

In adults, there are very small quantities of stem cells located inside tissues throughout the body. These cells are difficult to isolate and seem to possess the ability to develop into only a limited number of types of cells determined by their location within the body. Stem cells that can only develop into a limited number of specialized cells are called multipotent stem cells.

Stem cells can be recovered from embryos in the blastocyst stage of development (five to seven days after fertilization). These cells are easier to recover and possess the ability to develop into any type of specialist cell. These are called pluripotent stem cells. Once the cells are isolated, they can be made to produce a theoretically unlimited number of genetically identical stem cells. This self-sustaining group of cells is called a stem cell line. At any time, a group of these cells can be removed and stimulated to grow into the required type of cell.

Stem cells can also be recovered from later stage embryos and fetuses. Such recovery would destroy the viability of the embryo or fetus and usually occurs after an abortion. Fetal stem cells are multipotent but easier to acquire and isolate.

Why Are Stem Cells Controversial?

Embryonic and fetal stem cells are controversial primarily because the process of their collection destroys the embryo or the fetus. This divides opinion roughly along the lines of abortion, although the collection of embryonic stem cells has the additional dimension of the destruction of the embryo possibly leading to lifesaving and life-enhancing therapies for thousands of people. The source of adult stem cells makes them less controversial.

History and Early Use of Stem Cells

Although the potential of stem cells is only just being explored, they have been used for medical purposes for a number of years. Starting in 1959, scientists began successfully transplanting bone marrow, which introduced hematopoietic stem cells (cells capable of developing into blood) into patients whose own stem cells were destroyed in cases of leukemia or as a side effect of chemotherapy treatments. In the 1990s, these hematopoietic cells were also found to be present in the blood of the umbilical cord, which was also less prone to rejection than cells from adults, leading to the creation of banks to store umbilical cord blood and calls for collection to be made a routine part of child delivery.

Early stem cell procedures mainly involved the transplantation of fetal stem cells, which required a steady stream of aborted fetuses. It was not until 1998 that the University of Wisconsin successfully created the first self-sustaining lines of pluripotent cells, opening the possibility of manufacturing the required cells in a laboratory setting rather than harvesting them directly from the fetus.

Early research focused on embryonic stem cells, with the origin and presence of stem cells in adult tissues remaining a mystery. Scientists later discovered more than forty different types of stem cells in the adult body, each capable of forming a limited variety of specialized cells. This limited ability to develop into other types of cells made them less attractive for study and therapeutic use than the pluripotent embryonic stem cells. More recent studies have shown that adult stem cells are capable of developing into broader range of specialist cells than first thought, although a long-term goal of scientists working with adult stem cells is to find ways to make them pluripotent by reverting them to the blastocyst cell type. If this were to be achieved, it would eliminate the need to harvest stem cells from embryos and fetuses.

Sources of Embryonic Stem Cells

The potential sources of embryonic stem cells are from unwanted in vitro fertilization (IVF) embryos and from embryos created specifically for experimental and therapeutic purposes.

Since IVF techniques were pioneered in the 1970s, one of the hallmarks of the treatment has been the creation of multiple fertilized embryos. Drugs are given to stimulate ovulation and allow for the harvesting of multiple eggs. The eggs are fertilized, frozen, and then implanted one at a time until a successful full-term pregnancy is achieved. Upward of twenty embryos can be produced because of the comparatively low chance of success with any one embryo. Many couples using IVF treatments end up with a number of frozen embryos that they do not intend to use. These embryos are stored and eventually destroyed. Because these frozen embryos are not going to be used for implantation and are at a very early stage of development, they are seen by some as an ideal source of stem cells, others who believe in the sanctity of life from conception argue that the destruction of any embryo is immoral regardless of any reason behind its destruction.

Apart from harvesting stem cells as a by-product of the destruction of unwanted embryos, the embryonic stem cells can be created for the specific purpose of scientific and therapeutic purposes. This can be achieved with the fertilization of an egg and sperm given expressly for experimental purposes, although the creation of an embryo for the sole purpose of its destruction is viewed by many as highly unethical.

Stem cells can also be created by a process known as therapeutic cloning. This involves removing the nucleus of a donated egg and replacing it with the genetic material of the patient to be treated with the stem cells. The cell is then made to divide and ultimately produce the required cells, which can then be implanted into the patient with no chance of provoking an immunological rejection. The distinction between this and reproductive cloning is that there is no intention to implant the clone into a uterus and ultimately bring about the birth of a genetic clone. However, the unease that many feel about cloning is added to ethical issues surrounding the creation of something that could develop into another human life solely to acquire cells for medical treatment to make this highly controversial.

Ethical Approaches

The principal ethical position against the use of embryonic and fetal stem cells relies on the absolute right of the fetus to life that begins at the moment of conception. For proponents of this position there can never be any factor capable of mitigating the destruction of the fetus/embryo and draw the analogy between this and killing an otherwise healthy person solely to harvest their organs to give to others. This position is associated with many of the more conservative strands of Christianity and in particular with the position of the Catholic Church. They argue that the creation of any human life for scientific experimentation or medical treatment cheapens and commodifies all human life.

Those in favor of the use of stem cells argue for a balancing approach to evaluate its moral status. They argue that a right to life is not an absolute right. It may be a very important right, but it should be balanced against the potential good to be gained from the use of stem cell-based therapies. Some also argue that an embryo does not have an independent right to life before the point of viability, or that this right to life is lessened until the fetus reaches viability.

Embryonic Stem Cells as a Political Issue

The United States was one of the leading countries in the development of embryonic stem cells and related medical treatments. However, ethical concerns over the development of this branch of science led to this becoming a politically charged issue. In 1995, Congress initiated a ban on the use of federal funds for projects involving the destruction of an embryo. This continued until August 2000, when President William J. Clinton issued guidelines allowing the use of federal funds for embryonic stem cell research if the embryo would have been destroyed anyway and only if private money was used to finance the actual destruction of the embryo and recovery of the cells.

The role of the federal government in funding stem cell research became an issue in the 2000 presidential election and President George W. Bush to announce his compromise policy on the use of federal funding for embryonic stem cell research in his speech on August 9, 2001, stating that federal funds would only be available for research using any of the more than sixty preexisting stem cell lines. This compromise would ensure that federal funding would not aid in the destruction of any future embryos but not ignore the scientific potential offered by stem cells derived from embryos that had already been destroyed. The compromise was criticized by opponents of the use of stem cells claiming that this legitimized the prior destruction of the embryos. Advocates of stem cell research criticized the policy for hampering the development of new stem cell lines and treatments and placing the United States at a disadvantage to other countries in this emerging branch of science. The policy was also criticized for the moral arbitrariness in picking a cutoff date for stem cell lines to be eligible for federal funding.

The Bush compromise on federal funding for stem cell research did not stop the ethical and political debate over whether the U.S. government should sponsor scientific research in this field, and if so, what the extent the sponsorship should be. Several high-profile campaigns by celebrities with diseases or conditions that could potentially benefit from stem cell-based therapies ensured that the issue remained in the media spotlight. Perhaps the most important development was the position of the family of President Ronald Reagan who died in 2004 from Alzheimer's disease. Stem cell-related therapies offer the possibility of developing a cure for this condition, and the Reagan family, including former First Lady Nancy Reagan, voiced an increasingly public support for federal funding of stem cell research, with Ronald Reagan, Jr. speaking against the compromise in the 2004 Democratic Party convention. This was all the more significant given President Reagan's association with the religious right and strongly pro-life sections of the Republican Party.

Although scientists in the United States were constrained in their research by the Bush compromise, different political climates in other countries have aided stem cell research abroad and placed increasing pressure on the United States to follow suit. In May 2004, Britain became the first country in the world to open its own national stem cell bank as part of its policy of assisting researchers by increasing their access to as many stem cell lines as possible. In July 2004, President Bush announced plans for the United States to create its own national stem cell bank but only containing the stem cell lines created before August 2001.

Stem cell research is a very young field that offers the hope of miraculous leaps in medical capacity. That the clinical applications of its more extreme possibilities are decades away from realization have not dampened the hope and enthusiasm for a new dawn of medicine. The ethical debate over embryonic stem cell use seems to be insoluble, but without great advances in adult stem cell research, the pressure of international competition and the promise of this new age of medicine seems to be pushing the United States toward greater support for its scientific community in this area.

GAVIN J. REDDICK

References and Further Reading

- Green, Ronald M. The Human Embryo Research Debates: Bioethics in the Vortex of Controversy. Oxford University Press, 2001.
- Holland, Suzanne, Karen Lebacqz, and Laurie Zoloth, eds. The Human Embryonic Stem Cell Debate: Science, Ethics, and Public Policy. MIT Press, 2001.
- Kiessling, Ann A., and Scott C. Anderson. Human Embryonic Stem Cells: An Introduction to the Science and Therapeutic Potential. Jones and Bartlett Publishers, 2003.
- The President's Council on Bioethics. "Monitoring Stem Cell Research" (2004–) <http://www.bioethics.gov/reports/stemcell/>
- Ruse, Michael, and Christopher A. Pynes, eds. The Stem Cell Controversy: Debating the Issues. Prometheus Books, 2003.
- Snow, Nancy E. Stem Cell Research: New Frontiers in Science and Ethics. University of Notre Dame Press, 2004.
- Waters, Brent, and Ronald Cole-Turner, eds. God and the Embryo: Religious Voices on Stem Cells and Cloning. Georgetown University Press, 2003.

See also Planned Parenthood of Missouri v. Danforth, 428 U.S. 52 (1976); Reproductive Freedom; Roe v. Wade, 410 U.S. 113 (1973); Webster v. Reproductive Health Services, 492 U.S. 490 (1989)

STENBERG v. CARHART, 530 U.S. 914 (2000)

Carhart represents another episode in the continuing abortion controversy. Leroy Carhart, a physician specializing in abortions, filed an action seeking a preliminary injunction against the enforcement of Nebraska's 1997 "Partial-Birth Abortion Statute" because for abortions performed after the sixteenth week he attempts a partial-birth abortion: he delivers alive the body of the unborn child intact, except the head, then crushes the skull and evacuates the contents of the brain so that the compressed skull can be more easily pulled through the cervix.

Justice Breyer, writing for a five-justice majority, held Nebraska's partial-birth abortion ban unconstitutional. According to Justice Breyer, three "established principles" control all abortion cases. "First, before 'viability . . . the woman has a right to choose to terminate her pregnancy.'" "Second, 'a law designed to further the State's interest in fetal life which imposes an undue burden on the woman's decision before fetal viability' is unconstitutional." "Third, 'subsequent to viability, the State in promoting its interest in the potentiality of human life may, if it chooses, regulate, and even proscribe, abortion except where it is necessary, in appropriate medical judgment, for the preservation of the life or health of the mother.'"

Applying the three principles to Nebraska's statute, the Court held that the statute violates the Constitution two independent ways: "First, the law lacks any exception 'for the preservation of the . . . health of the mother.'" "Second, it 'imposes an undue burden on a woman's ability' to choose a D&E abortion, thereby unduly burdening the right to choose abortion itself."

The Court held that to pass constitutional muster Nebraska's statute needed a "health of the mother" exception even though the Court acknowledged that (1) "[t]here are no general medical studies demonstrating comparative safety" of the D&X procedure; (2) the American Medical Association has a stated policy announcing "that 'there does not appear to be any identified situation in which the intact D&X is the only appropriate procedure to induce abortion'"; and (3) the American College of Obstetricians' panel "'could identify no circumstances under which [the D&X] procedure . . . would be the only option to save the life or preserve the health of the mother.’” Despite this supporting medical evidence, the Court held “Nebraska has not convinced us that a health exception is ‘never necessary to preserve the health of women.’”

The Court also opined that because an ambiguity in the statute regarding whether Nebraska’s attempt to ban the rarely used D&X procedure may also cover the commonly used D&E procedure, the ban also places “an undue burden upon a woman’s right to make an abortion decision.”

In her critical swing-vote concurring opinion, Justice O’Connor, commented that “a ban on partial-birth abortion that only proscribed the D & X method of abortion and that included an exception to preserve the life and health of the mother would be constitutional in my view.”

Whether Carhart remains an important case essentially establishing abortion on demand will depend on how the Court responds to future legislation narrowly tailored to the D&X procedure, which also includes legislative findings on the health-of-the-mother issue.

RICHARD COLLIN MANGRUM

STEVENS, JOHN PAUL (1920–)

John Paul Stevens took his seat on the Supreme Court of the United States on December 19, 1975. In three decades as associate justice, Stevens has established himself as a highly independent thinker distinguished for his originality and lack of ideology. A prolific writer, Stevens’ opinions have evinced a dedication to restrained decision making in the common law tradition of case-by-case adjudication, a deep faith in the judicial exercise of reason and judgment, and a profound commitment to fulfilling the Constitution’s fundamental purposes, including especially its promise of liberty.

Life

Stevens was born on April 20, 1920, in Chicago, Illinois. He grew up in its Hyde Park neighborhood and attended the nearby University of Chicago Laboratory School from grade school through graduation. He pursued his college education at the university as well, where he studied English literature and graduated Phi Beta Kappa in 1941.

A love of Shakespeare inclined Stevens toward graduate school in English and teaching as a career. However, as Stevens began graduate studies at Chicago, a dean of the college who was an undercover recruiter for the Navy encouraged him to take a naval correspondence course on cryptography over the summer of 1941. As a result of this coursework, the Navy offered Stevens a commission as an intelligence officer, and he joined the service on December 6, 1941, the day before the attack on Pearl Harbor. In later years, Stevens would joke that his commission provoked the attack, because it demonstrated the country’s desperation.

Stevens served in the Navy at Pearl Harbor as a code breaker deciphering intercepted Japanese transmissions, a task that he enjoyed and that earned him a Bronze Star. During this time, he met a future colleague on the Supreme Court, Byron White, who also was stationed in the Pacific as a naval intelligence officer.

While in the Navy, Stevens received a letter from an older brother asking him to consider a career in law. This older brother, whom Stevens much admired, related from his own experience as a young lawyer the opportunities the profession presented for helping others and serving the public. This appeal won over Stevens, who enrolled at the Northwestern University School of Law after completing his naval service in 1945.

Stevens loved law school and excelled in it. He served as editor-in-chief of the law review and graduated magna cum laude in two years, with the highest grade point average in the history of the law school.

Stevens’ superlative academic performance landed him a Supreme Court clerkship with Justice Wiley Rutledge from 1947 to 1948. That service left an indelible imprint on the future justice, as discussed below.

After the clerkship, Stevens began practicing as a litigator in Chicago with an established law firm and then cofounded his own a few years later. He developed an expertise in antitrust law that earned him national respect and led to his appointment, from 1951 to 1952, as associate counsel to a congressional subcommittee that investigated monopoly power in professional baseball and other markets, and from 1953 to 1955, as a member of an Attorney General committee that also studied antitrust issues. In the meantime, joining his earlier interest in teaching with his professional expertise, Stevens taught antitrust law at Northwestern from 1950 to 1954, and at the University of Chicago Law School from 1955 to 1958, and he published articles in the field.

Stevens continued his highly successful private practice into the 1960s. His reputation in legal circles for excellence and integrity contributed to his appointment, in 1969, to head an investigation into a bribery scandal on the Illinois Supreme Court. This investigation led to the resignation of two justices of that court, and Stevens' widely praised performance led the following year to his appointment by President Richard Nixon to the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals.

On the Seventh Circuit, Stevens proved extremely capable of mastering the facts and law in the cases that came before him, deciding them without any apparent agenda, and producing opinions of "consistent excellence" in "an astonishing number of areas," according to an American Bar Association member who evaluated his subsequent nomination to the Supreme Court.

That nomination was suggested on Justice William Douglas' retirement by Attorney General Edward Levi, who had supervised Stevens as former dean of Chicago's law school. President Gerald Ford considered Stevens a natural choice, a nominee whose indisputable merit would help heal divisions in the aftermath of Watergate. On December 17, 1975, the Senate confirmed the president's choice less than three weeks after it was announced, by a vote of ninety-eight to zero.

Jurisprudence

